FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

So, during the civil strife, the Confederate States appointed no elect-s. The majority required was of the electors appointed by the Federal States.

But suppose, in such cases as Louisiana and Florida, both parties claim to be elected and no one can decide which claim is valid; has there been an appointment † Doubtless there has been. Our inability to decide does not negative the fact of an election of some one. And hence, where a legal election has been held, and electors have been voted for, though the result may remain undecided and in dubio, the legal conclusion is that electors were appointed, though we permit none to vote and reject all.

WHO SHALL DECIDE WHEN THE CONTINGENCY HAS ARISEN ON WHICH THE RIGHT OF EITHER HOUSE TO ELECT RESULTS TO IT!

When the contingency of no election by the colleges has happened, the House elects the President, and the Senate the Vice-President.

But who shall decide whether it has arisen? The Senate and the House are present. They act as separate bodies in judging upon the election, and with co-equal authority.

If the views already presented are sound, the decision can be made without difficulty; for the counting must be made by a concurrent vote of both House

when therefore the House, watching its own duty in the elective function, hanging on the contingency of no election by electors, shall adjudge that there has been no such election, what shall hinder its exercise of its prerogative? Who can stay its hand? Who can call it to account? Can the President of the Senate? That has been fully answered. Can the Senate? Who made it the final arbiter of duty, or the giver or withholder of prerogative power for the House? What is there or withholder of prerogative power for the House? What is there in the Constitution which gives color to the claim of a body representing, it may be, one-fifth of the people to become a ruler of the great representative of a majority of the people? When the contingent power to elect a President was expressly taken from the Senter and given to the House will be Senter and given to the House will be Senter and given to the House will be Senter as t ate and given to the House, will the Senate be now heard by construction to revive its power, by paralyzing the authority of the House and denying the use of a prerogative which the convention had taken from the Senate in order to vest it in the House? When the House says there has been no election, what gives constitutional potency to the Senate's declaration that there has been ?

The Senate declares A is President by vote of colleges. The House declares he is not. The Senate cannot elect him, or any one else, President. What gives its declaration the effect of an election?

But not so with the House. Its declaration is the precursor of its constitutional action. It can act on an event happening. The Senate cannot as to the President. The counter-declarations of the two Houses hang in even balance. But the House has another function not dependent upon the Senate—which it neither gave nor can take away, but which was given to the House in confidence by the Constitution, and was taken away from the Senate from jealousy.

stitution. It has no mentor, nor master, nor guardian, nor guide. It is its own. As the representative of the populations of the States it holds a power in trust which it must, under the solemn sanctions of a sworn duty, execute without fear and for the best interests of the country. To hold its hand on the dictation of any power would be treason to its duty and infidelity to the trust reposed in it by the Con-

All authority, unless under express or clearly implied control of another, must ultimate in autocracy. The power of the Senate to confirm an appointment, or to ratify a treaty, the House cannot question. It is autocratic, for it is irresponsible, and cannot be checked, except that the results of its action may be tested by the judicial power. The President appoints to office, commands the Army and Navy. What authority can check him in the exercise of clearly granted power?

And it has been even decided that he is the exclusive and final judge when the exigency has arisen for the call of the militia under the law of 1795. (Martin rs. Mott, 12 Wheat., 19; Luther rs. Borden, 7 How., 1.)

Now, it is utterly beyond comprehension why these special powers, vested in the Senate and President, and to be exercised upon contingencies named in the law or Constitution, are properly assumed upon the decision of each of them that the contingency has arisen, and yet that this House has no like right to decide upon its powers, but must bend to the bidding of others before it asserts its prerogative or

But it has been said that such action by the House would be revo-lutionary and an offense to the Government of the United States.

It is easy to answer such an averment. Against whom the House would revolt in this action it is difficult to conceive, unless it be the Senate or the President. It would be well to remember that the Gov-crnment of the United States is not centered in either the Executive or the Senate, and that the House is not centered in either the Executive or the Senate, and that the House is not only a part but a most powerful branch of it in its functions and authority; and it would be well for every department and officer to understand that while it cannot be revolutionary for the House to exert a constitutional power, though the other departments are not favorable to it, a resistance to the power exercised is an offense clearly revolutionary and against the Government of the United States and its Constitution.

But it has been said that in the evenly balanced scales of the two Houses the incumbent of the executive chair might decide according to his views of the Constitution and against the action of the House.

I will not attribute such a purpose to any man occupying the Presidency. For nothing can be more clear than that whatever others may have to say and do in the matter of the election of a President, his predecessor, the incumbent, has neither by law or Constitution, by suggestion, hint, or express grant, the shadow of right to speak or act in the decision of such a conflict. Whatever be the relative powers of Senate, House, and the President of the Senate, one department and one officer is never named in the twelfth amendment, under discussion, and that is the President in being; and the suggestion that, in some way, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, the sword may decide a civil conflict of power between the two Houses, is as perilous to the peace as its realization would be fatal to the liberties of the country.

WHAT ARE THE PRECEDENTS

The conclusions reached by this discussion are strengthened and fortified by the uniform practice of the Government.

The precedents are properly divisible into three classes. provisional and pre-constitutional; the second, those which are constitutional, having constructively been sanctioned by the adoption of the twelfth amendment in 1804; and the third, those which are persuasive, post-dating the adoption of said amendment.

We will consider them in their order. First,

THE PROVISIONAL AND PRE-CONSTITUTIONAL PRECEDENT.

When the convention of 1787 was about to adjourn, it took into consideration the preparatory steps to the starting of the new Gov-ernment under the Constitution it had framed and proposed to the ernment under the Constitution it had framed and proposed to the States for their ratification. It was not binding on any until ratified by the conventions of nine States, which "shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same." (C. U. S., art. 7, sec. 1.) This was a part of the Constitution itself, and immediately preceded the words, "Done in convention by the unanimous consent of the States present," &c.

PROVISIONAL ARRANGEMENT ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY.

Some preparatory arrangements were needed to launch the reformed ship from the stocks upon which the old Confederation had been lying for repairs. The machinery for launching her was necessarily different from that proper for navigating her. The Constitution could not go into effect of itself. The operations of the new Government required its own laws and its own organism to be perfected before it could be automatic. While therefore the convention did not hinge the establishment of the Constitution on the will of the Congress of the old Confederation (3 Med. Pap. 1541) it decided to use it as the the old Confederation, (3 Mad. Pap., 1541,) it decided to use it as the means of starting the machinery of the new Government of the Constitution.

Accordingly, a letter was prepared, and two resolutions, (which neither the papers of Mr. Madison nor the official journal of the convention show were adopted,) which were transmitted as the advisory action of the convention to the United States in Congress assembled. The resolutions are as follows, (3 Mad. Pap., 1570-1; Journal of Convention, 370-1:)

Resolved, That the preceding Constitution be laid before the United States in Congress assembled; and that it is the opinion of this convention that it should afterward be submitted to a convention of delegates, chosen in each State by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its Legislature, for their assent and ratification; and that each convention assenting to and ratifying the same should give notice thereof to the United States in Congress assembled.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this convention that, as soon as the conventions of nine States shall have ratified this Constitution, the United States in Congress assembled should fix a day on which electors should be appointed by the States which shall have ratified the same, and a day on which electors should assemble to vote for the President, and the time and place for commencing proceedings under this Constitution; that after such publication, the electors should be appointed, and the Senators and Representatives elected; that the electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of the President, and should transmit their votes, certified, eigned, scaled, and directed, as the Constitution requires, to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled; that the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned; that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate, for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President; and that, after he shall be chosen, the Congress, together with the President, should, without delay, proceed to execute this Constitution.

The need for such resolutions was obvious. The convention adjourned sine die. To whom could the ratification of the "constitutional nine" States be made known, which was the pre-condition to the establishment of the Constitution? When known, how was the election of the executive of the Government to be made, and when ? election of the executive of the Government to be made, and when for the time for choosing electors and their day of voting, was left to Congress to be determined by law which could not be passed until a President approved? When was the Congress to come together though elected under State law. How could the electors direct their certificates to an unappointed President of a non-existent Senate. And when the Houses convened how could they legislate until a President (whose approval was essential to law-making) was sworn in?

Again, when the two Houses met could they constitutionally act before being sworn in? and there was no rule and there could be no law for administering the oath. All was inchoate; no part of the organism was established.

A provisional arrangement was made, for a constitutional procedure was impossible. Hence, the mode in which the first presidential election was passed upon was not and cannot be a model for the mode prescribed by the Constitution. Let us now analyze these resolutions. They express "the First. They do not pretend to be authoritative. opinion of this convention." They are advisory.

Second. The old Congress fixed the day of appointment and voting of the electors, not the Congress under the Constitution, for it was not and could not be organized for the purpose without a President to pass on its legislation.

Third. The resolutions declared that the electoral certificates should be directed "to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled." The Constitution required them to be directed to the President of the Senate; but this was impossible, for there was no Senate, and hence it had no President.

Fourth. "The Senators and Representatives" were to convene at the time and place assigned by the old Congress. It does not say the Senate and the House should meet, but the Senators and Representatives. The language imports an unorganized meeting of men, not the Senate and House, organized out of them into the constitu-does not say "the Senate shall choose a President," as the Constitution provides. (Constitution United States, article 1, section 3.) Indeed it could not do so under that clause, for it provided for the choice of a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President; and as yet there had been no Vice-President elected.

Sixth. He was appointed, says the resolution, "for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President." This excluded the idea of any organic Senate or President thereof, but was simply a provisional appointment of one, who was named "President of the Senate" because the Constitution named that officer to receive and open the certificates.

Seventh. But all this is clearly confirmed by the closing sentence of the resolutions—of the resolutions-

And that after he (the President) shall be chosen, the Congress, together with the President, should without delay proceed to execute this Constitution.

After and not before the President is chosen, the Congress shall with him (having awaited his appointment) proceed to execute the Constitution.

It is, then, most clearly settled that the preliminary operations in the choice of President were preconstitutional, and were not con-ducted under the Constitution because Congress under the terms of the resolution was not to proceed (that is, go forward) to execute it until the President was chosen.

As a matter of fact the proceeding as to the election of President was on April 6, 1789, and the members of the House were never sworn in until April 8, 1789, nor Senators until June 3, 1789, after a law of Congress had prescribed the manner of doing so. (1 Ann. of Cong., 44, 102.) Thus, at the moment of the joint convention on the presidential election, no member of either House had been sworn to support the Constitution, which is a prerequisite to all official duty, exthe mere process of organization. (C. U. S., article 6; McCrary cept the mere process of organization. (C. U. S., article 6; McCrary on Elections, section 512.)

The actual punctum temporis of constitutional government was, therefore, after the President was chosen, though by a fiction, and agreeably to the order of the old Congress, the terms of office under it related back to the first Wednesday in March—March 4, 1789.

Nor was this provisional procedure without proper sanction of the ratifying States. The resolutions suggesting it were sent to them with the Constitution itself, and they acted under them in the election of Senators, Representatives, and electors. And the recognition of this sanction was evidenced in the proceedings of Congress, which resulted in its resolution of September 13, 1788. (4 Journal of old Congress, 781-2, 866-7.) Congress, 781-2, 866-7.)

ANALYSIS OF THE PRECONSTITUTIONAL PROCEDURE.

Having thus conclusively shown that the first elective procedure of April 6, 1789, is no constitutional precedent, but was a provisional arrangement, when no action under the new Constitution was intended or was possible, let us examine the action then taken and see whether it really indicates any conflict with the principles we have maintained.

The language of the entry on the order of the Senate is this: "that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors," &c. This seems to indicate that the counting was done by the President of the Senate, and is claimed to be a contemporaneous exposition, &c.

But it will be observed that this is the exact language of the resolution of the convention, expressly sanctioned as the provisional and preconstitutional mode, by the conventions of the ratifying States. It had the impress of that same ratifying power as a preconstates. It had the impress of that same rathying power as a preconstitutional method, which established by other language the fixed and permanent mode of post-constitutional procedure. The Senate obeyed the conventional power which ordained this process in the launch of the ship of state, but is bound equally to obey the same power expressing itself through the Constitution for all procedure after it is

But mark what follows these words in the order of the Senate: "and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed, in the presence of the House, to discharge that duty." To what duty does the relative "that" refer? It can only refer to the opening or counting or to both. It proposes to discharge its duty, but requires the presence of the House, in deference to the terms of the resolution under which it was acting and to the new Constitution just about to be excepted. ecuted.

And observe how its members proposed to guard the counting: "The Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their mem-

The House responded that it was ready "to meet them to attend the opening and counting of the votes," &c.; and two members were "appointed on the part of this House to sit at the Clerk's table with the member of the Senate and make a list of the votes as the same shall be declared."

It is obvious from the record that the listing was done by the agents (we call them now "tellers") of the Senate and the House, and not by the President. He was the organ of their action, for it appears that the tellers of the House, on the return of the House to its Chamber, "delivered at the Clerk's table a list of the votes " " as the same were declared by the President of the Senate in the presence of the Senate and of this House; which was ordered to be entered on the Journal." So that the tellers made the lists as the agents of the respective Houses, and the President of the Senate declared or announced that he in their presence had opened and counted the votes, &c., which were the lists so made mediately through their the votes, &c., which were the lists so made mediately through their tellers by each House.

The House then sent a message to the Senate, agreeing that the Senate should notify the election of the President and Vice-President, as the Senate should be pleased to direct. "Whereupon the Senate should be pleased to direct."

ate appointed Charles Thompson, esq., to notify," &c.

This preconstitutional precedent therefore shows that the count of the electoral votes was made in the presence of the two Houses, meeting together, by their respective tellers, whose lists of votes were declared by the President of the Senate, that each House spread those lists upon their Journals, and that by the concurrence of the two Houses the title to his office was notified to the President and the Vice-President, respectively. It shows that even under this preconstitutional method, which in its terms put the counting of votes, as well as the opening of certificates, in the hands of the Senate's President, he exercised no controlling authority, but was subordinated to and was governed by the Houses in whose presence, and as the mere voice of whose tellers, he acted in declaring the will and decision of the two Houses, and that in the notification of title to the offices, he was ignored, and that was done under the absolute and exclusive orders and by concurrent votes of the two House

So far from being a precedent militating with the views previously maintained, this preconstitutional precedent confirms it, and for the reason that, if these things were so conducted under the resolution of the convention, a fortiori, they must not be disregarded, but more strictly conformed to under the terms of the Constitution; and we may well say, "If these things were done in the green tree, what should be done in the dry ? "

THE SECOND CLASS OF PRECEDENTS.

On the 5th of February, 1793, the House appointed a committee to On the 5th of February, 1785, the House appointed a committee to "join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate to ascertain and report the mode of examining the votes," &c., "and of notifying the persons who shall be elected," &c. The Senate concurred.

The report was made to each House by its own committee and was agreed to by both Houses. The action was concurrent.

It provided "that the two Houses assemble in the Senate Chamber," &c.; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the House and the part of the Senate "to make a list of the votes as they shall be one on the part of the Senate "to make a list of the votes as they shall be one on the part of the schale to make a test of the votes as they shall be delivered; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to both Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President, and, together with

of the persons elected President and vice-President, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses. On the 13th of February, 1793, the Senate notified the House it was ready to meet them to attend the opening and counting the vote, &c. This entry then follows on the Senate Journal:

"The two Houses having accordingly assembled, the certificates of the electors of the fifteen States in the Union, which came by express more by the Vice President council and and declared to the or the electors of the liteen states in the Union, which came by express, were by the Vice-President opened, read, and declared to the tellers appointed for the purpose, who, having examined and ascertained the votes, presented a list of them to the Vice-President, which list was read to the two Houses, and is as follows:" Here follows the list. The entry then proceeds: "Whereupon the Vice-President declared George Washington," &c.

The same joint committee reported a resolution which each House adopted, that a committee of each House be named, who should wait on the President and notify him of his election, &c.

Now let us observe what is settled by this precedent.

1. The absolute equality in dignity and authority of the two House

The concurrence of the two in order to any action.

2. The concurrence of the two in order to any action.
3. They resolved upon a mode of examining the votes.
4. The examination and ascertainment was made by one teller of the Senate and two of the House, who delivered the result of their examination to the President of the Senate.
5. The President of the Senate announced the state of the vote and the persons elected; that is, the result of the examination, according to the order of the two Houses.
6. This was entered on the Journal of each House.

6. This was entered on the Journal of each House.

7. The two Houses, by distinct committees appointed by each for itself, notified the persons elected.

Some expressions in the order of procedure are explained by the

Some expressions in the order of procedure are explained by the entry. For example: The tellers made a list of the votes as they were declared. By whom is this declaration and what does it import? The entry shows when it details what the President of the Senate did and what the tellers did. He "opened, read, and delivered" the certificates to the tellers. "Declare" means to show openly, to pronounce and proclaim. When he opens, reads, and delivers to the tellers of the two Houses he "declares" the votes, and this is all he did before the tellers acted; this is all his function, as settled by his acts in this precedent. And even this was done by order of the two Houses. His And even this was done by order of the two Houses. His precedent. And even this was done by order of the two Houses. His power to do it was derivative, not original.

Again, the order says the tellers shall make a list and deliver the result to the President of the Senate. The entry shows what they did. They received the open certificates and "examined and ascertained the votes," and presented a list of them, which was read by the President of the Senate. He did not; they did examine and ascertain the votes. He read the list which they made. He was the physical organ through which their determinant act was made known to the two Houses.

WHAT IS THE TELLERS' WORK OF EXAMINING AND ASCERTAINING THE VOTE?

What is imported by the words "examine and ascertain?" Richardwhat is imported by the words "examine and ascertain" Richardson says, "examine" means to weigh, to balance, to try or prove the weight, and then generally to search, to inquire into, to question.

Richardson says ascertain (ad and certu) means to be or made sure or certain, to assure, to be or make surely or certainly known, to de-

It follows that the acts of examining and ascertaining done by the tellers in order to a report of the result, means a weighing, a trial, and proof of, a searching into, an inquiry into and question of the votes, as a means of making the resultsure, and determining and establishing it. With all this the President of the Senate had nothing to do. He delivered the certificates to the tellers for them to do this. When they determined the result he declared their result, and did not declare his own judgment at all. They were the determinant power, of whom he was but the mouth-piece.

The title of tellers first found in this precedent is significant. Richardson says: To tell means to reckon, to count. It means, moreover, to declare, to make known, to utter. So that a teller is a counter, who makes known his count. Thus in the very title used to designate the persons engaged in counting the votes in this precedent is realized the constitutional interpretation of the phrase "and the votes shall then be counted;" that is, counted by the tellers whom each House appoints to do its will in counting and delivering the result of the election.

An amusing and striking confirmation of this meaning of the word "tell," and its synonym "count," and of the disciminating process involved in it, is found in the following passage from Sir Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe," in the interview between Gurth, the improvised squire of the hero, and Isaac, the Jew, when paying the hire for the use of the good steed by the knight in the lists of Ashby:

"Nay, nay!" said Isaac; "lay down the talents—the shekels—the eighty zecchins, and thou shalt see I will consider thee liberally."

Gurth complied; and telling out eighty zecchins upon the table, the Jew delivered out to him an acquittance for the suit of armor. The Jew's hand trembled for joy as he wrapped up the first seventy pieces of gold. The last ten he told over with much deliberation, pausing, and saying something as he took each piece from the table and dropt it into his purse.

"Seventy-one, seventy-two, thy master is a good youth; seventy-three, an excellent youth; seventy-flour, that piece hath been clipt within the ring; seventy-five, and that looketh light of weight; seventy-six, when thy master wants money, let him come to Isaac of York; seventy-seven, that is with reasonable security." Here he made a considerable pause, and Gurth had good hope that the last three pieces might escape the fate of their comrades; but the enumeration proceeded: "Seventy-eight, thou art a good fellow; seventy-nine, and deservest something for thyself."

Here the Jew pansed again and looked at the last zecchin, intending, doubtless, to bestow it upon Gurth. He weighed it upon the tip of his finger and made it ring by dropping it upon the table. Had it rung too flat, or had it felt a hair's-breadth too light, generosity had carried the day; but, unhappily for Gurth, the chime was full and true, the zecchin plump, newly coined, and a grain above weight. Isaac could not find in his heart to part with it, so dropt it into his purse as if in absence of mind, wit election.

But it is important to notice that this function of the tellers is the power of each House appointing them. Their determinant power is derivative, that of each House original and autocratic.

Now observe further that the result so made out by the tellers was reported after the Houses separated to each House by its tellers, and was spread on its journal. It was its act, by its agents, reported to it and sanctioned by its order entered on its own journal.

Again, neither House pretended to act without the concurrence of the other. The declaration of election was sanctioned by each, and the election was notified by both concurrently.

This analysis of the first precedent (I trust not too much in detail) sanctions fully all the principles already established by the fair interpretation and history of the clause. It shows that the real counting was a searching scrutiny into the legality and fairness of the votes, under the direction and control of the two Houses, as distinct and independent and co-equal guardians of the executive department from lawless and fraudulent machinations; that the scrutiny and questioning imported in the examination and ascertainment of the vote was a challenge to every vote by the two sentinels, without whose concurrent consent it could not be counted, and that neither House alone, but both together, must give title to the executive office, under the election by the electoral colleges, by notifying the person chosen of his admission to the office by the joint sanction of the two Houses present on the angust occasion of its determination.

In the election of 1797 the same mode was adopted in almost every respect. In one or two particulars there was a variation, which I will

Mr. John Adams was then Vice-President and a candidate for the Presidency. When the two Houses met in the Hall of the House of Representatives Mr. Adams said that "the purpose for which we are assembled is expressed in the following resolutions." They were entirely like the concurrent resolutions passed by the two Houses in 1793. He proceeded to say he had received packets containing the certificates of the votes, &c.

I quote the Journal:

He then "took the packet from the State of Tennessee, and after having read the superscription, broke the seal, and read the certificate of the election of the electors. He then gave it to the clerk of the Senate, requesting him to read the report of the electors, which he accordingly did. All the papers were then handed to the tellers, namely, Mr. Seigwick, on the part of the Senate, and Messrs. Sitgreaves and Parker on the part of the House of Representatives.

Here note the separate agency of the tellers for their own Houses respectively, as showing not only their representative character, but the distinctness of the two Houses in their action. The entry proceeds:

And when they had noted the contents, the President of the Senate proceeded with the other States in the following order.

Here follows a list of the votes.

All the returns having been gone through, Mr. Sedgwick reported that, according to order, the tellers appointed by the two Houses had performed the business assigned them, and reported the result to be as above stated.

The entry then proceeds:

The President of the Senate then thus addressed the two Houses: "Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives: By the report which has been made to me by the tellers, appointed by the two Houses to examine the votes, there are 71 votes for John Adams. * * The whole number of votes are 138; 70 votes therefore make a majority. So that the person who has 71 votes is elected President." * *

President." * * *

The President of the Senate then sat down for a moment, and rising again thus addressed the two Houses: "In obedience to the Constitution and law (act of 1792) of the United States, and to the commands of both Houses of Congress, expressed in their resolution passed in the present session, I declare that John Adams is elected President." * *

Nothing could more emphatically exclude the idea of any authority of the President of the Senate to count the votes than this clear self-disclaimer by the elder Adams, as in obedience to the Constitution and law; nothing could more emphatically assert the commanding presence of the two Houses over the determination of the election, and nothing could more emphatically express the fact that the tellers, as the appointees of the Houses, examined the votes in order to the constitutional counting required.

Let the question now be asked, suppose the teller of the Senate

Let the question now be asked, suppose the teller of the Senate had decided to count Kentucky, from which no duplicate return had been received, and the two tellers of the House had refused to count it, could the vote have been counted by the one teller against the dissent of the two? The report affirms that Jefferson received that vote. Could that affirmation be sustained by the one teller when the other two negatived it?

This requirement of concurrence is illustrated by a disagreement between the Houses at this election as to the mode of notifying the between the Houses at this election as to the mode of notifying the Vice-President of his election. Upon the disagreement no action was taken until upon a report of a committee of conference the Houses concurred in action. So that it appears on the question of notifying the Vice-President, who was to be the presiding officer of the Senate, the Senate claimed no right to act against or without the consent of the House. How can this fact be reconciled with an assertion of paramount power in the Senate, much less in its President, to override the dissent of the House, and to inhibit it from its constitutional right to elect a President, in respect to which the Senate has no right at all? no right at all?

This precedent of 1797 greatly strengthens the conclusions from that of 1793.

We come now to the election of 1801.

This was the great conflict between Jefferson and Burr, which shook the Union, and imperiled the peace of the country; for the party then in power menaced such proceedings for retaining it as were revolutionary, and armed resistance by the people was threatened to usurpation.

The usual concurrent resolution to report a mode of examining the votes was passed; and in view of the known equality of votes cast for Jefferson and Burr, the mode adopted had a clause referring to that fact.

The two committees could not agree upon a plan, and each adopted its own resolution for its own action. They were almost counterparts of each other, as they had been on the previous occasions, but each regulated its own action; and there was no concurrent agreement as to the mode of action.

The resolutions, however, differed from those previously adopted in this, that the result ascertained by the tellers was to be delivered to the President of the Senate, who should announce the state of the vote, which was to be entered on the Journals; "and if it shall appear that a choice has been made agreeably to the Constitution, such entry on the Journal," ["Journal" in the Senate resolution; "Journals," in the House resolution,] "shall be deemed a sufficient declaration thereof."

This resolution was followed by the assembling of the two Houses in the Senate Chamber, when Vice-President Jefferson "opened and delivered" the certificates "to the tellers appointed for the purpose, delivered" the certificates "to the tellers appointed for the purpose, who, having examined and ascertained the number of votes, presented a list thereof to the Vice-President, which was read, as follows." Here follows the list. "Whereupon the Vice-President declared the result of the votes, as delivered by the tellers, was that Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, had 73," &c. "The whole number of electors who had voted," continued the Vice-President, "was 138, of which number Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr had a majority; but the number of those voting for them being equal, no choice was made by the people, and that consequently the remaining duties devolve on the House of Representatives.

The House Journal reads: "As the votes were read," (that is, declared,) "the tellers on the part of each House counted and took lists of the same, which, being compared, were delivered to the President of the Senate, and are as follows." Here follows lists. "The President of the Senate, in pursuance of the duty enjoined upon him, an nounced the state of the vote to both Houses," &c.

The resolution did not, as former ones had done, authorize the President of the Senate to declare who was elected. It would seem that the federal party, then in power in both Houses, left out that part of the announcement formerly made by the President of the Senate lest it might have given Mr. Jefferson the opportunity of declaring himself President. Be that as it may, the result reported by the tellers, entered on the Journals, was made the basis from which it was to appear that a choice had been made.

The resolutions required that from the Journals of both Houses a choice must appear. The language is, after stating that the result must be entered on the Journals: "And if it shall appear" (that is, from the entries on both Journals) "that a choice has been made agreeably to the Constitution, such entry on the Journals shall be agreeably to the Constitution, such entry on the Journals shall be deemed a sufficient declaration thereof." This indicates that both deemed a sufficient declaration thereof." This indicates that both Houses must concur in such an entry of a choice.

But if from the House Journal such a choice did not appear to the House, however it might appear to the Senate from its Journal, the power of the House to elect was clear, and would be exercised; and no objection from any quarter could prevent the House from performing its duty by the exercise of its power.

This self-determining power of the House is further sustained by the House entry.

The two Houses then separated; and the House of Representatives, being returned to their Chamber, proceeded in the manner prescribed by the Constitution to the choice of a President.

It did not await the permission of the Senate, much less of its President, nor still less of Mr. Adams, the then President; but on its own motion it assumed to judge when its constitutional power to elect re-

These three precedents all occurred before 1804, when the twelfth amendment was adopted. They were open and well-considered modes of action; not objected to, as far as history tells us, upon any suggestion that they were not according to the true interpretation of the words we have discussed in the original Constitution.

In 1804 these words were re-adopted as part of the twelfth amendant of the base adopted ways were re-adopted in view of the con-

In 1804 these words were re-adopted as part of the twelfth amendment. Can there be a doubt they were re-adopted in view of the construction placed upon them in 1793, 1797, and 1801, and as a constitutional sanction of that construction? Their meaning is interpreted by those precedents, and that interpretation is sanctioned by the twelfth amendment; for it is obvious, if the precedents had erroneously interpreted the language of the original Constitution, the Constitution-making power would not have re-adopted it without qualification to guard against any future abuse. The absence of all change of phraseology makes these precedents a constitutional interpretation of these words. pretation of these words.

When the terms of a British statute have been construed by a long series of judicial decisions, and it is adopted by any American State, the courts conclude, and wisely, that the settled interpretation of the statutory words is adopted by the Legislature and must prevail in the construction of the law. The analogy to the present case is

We are therefore justified in concluding that the practice from 1793 to 1801 has been authoritatively sanctioned as a just interpretation of the constitutional phrase we are considering; and that the order of procedure deduced from these precedents may be regarded as ingrafted upon that phrase as establishing its real meaning.

THE THIRD CLASS OF PRECEDENTS.

These are cases arising after the adoption of the twelfth amend-

In 1805 the House proposed a joint committee to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes. The Senate nonconcurred, so that no common plan was agreed on between them. But each House passed a resolution for its own action and the two resolutions were counterparts.

This resolution is identical with that adopted by each House in 1801, when they could not concur in common action, so that the prec-

was followed in 1805.

Under the precedents of 1793 and 1797, the joint resolution of the Houses decided that the declaration by the President of the Senate of the person elected, according to the tellers, list and result, should be deemed a declaration of the persons elected. But when, in 1801 and 1805, the Houses passed no joint resolution, but each its own for its own guidance, no declaration is made by the President of the Senate of the person elected, but each House takes to its own Journal the list and result, and resolves that, if it shall appear (i. e., from the Journal entry) that a choice has been made agreeably to the Constitution, the entry shall be deemed a declaration of election. In other words, it is clear that, without joint action, each House is a law to itself, and the Senate's president has no power not allowed him by the resolution of each House, and that, where there is no joint resolution, but separate resolutions, each House assumes to decide from the entry on the Journal whether a choice has been made agreeably to the Constitution, without reference to the action of the other. If, therefore, the result as spread on its Journal does not appear to its judgment to show a choice agreeably to the Constitution, each House, the Senate for itself, the House of Representatives for itself, must do its duty and exercise its power, as the Constitution requires in case of Senate for itself, the House of Representatives for itself, must do its duty and exercise its power, as the Constitution requires in case of the non-choice by the colleges.

Thus it is beyond doubt that the precedent of 1801, created in view of the probability of the failure to elect a President by the colleges, looked to the House of Representatives acting in respect of its resultant elective function, as the result should appear to it from its own Journal entry, and as it should adjudge the law to be from that entry, without any power by the Senate or its president, much less of the President of the United States, or any other officer, to molest and interfere with its own determinant act. And this precedent of 1801 is presumptively sanctioned by the twelfth amendment, re-adopting the same words as were in the old Constitution, and in one year afterward both Houses followed the precedent of 1801, so constitutionally sanctioned.

If, therefore, the two Houses shall adopt no joint rule of action, nor pass any law on the subject, each must, in the case now imminent, be a law to itself, subject to the Constitution; and following the precedents of 1801 and 1805, sanctioned by the twelfth amendment of 1804, each House, for itself and to guide its own action, must decide whether a choice appears to have been made agreeably to the Constitution. If it so appears, that will declare sufficiently the election. If it does not so appear to the Senate, it is empowered and bound to elect the Vice-President. If it does not so appear to the House, it is empowered and bound to elect the President.

I propose now to examine only the salient points in the precedents since the adoption of the twelfth amendment. I call the attention of the House to one or two peculiarities in the precedent of 1805.

since the adoption of the twelfth amendment. I call the attention of the House to one or two peculiarities in the precedent of 1805. Aaron Burr, of whom it may be said (whatever differences of opinion may exist as to his character) that he was one of the most eminent statesmen, and possessed one of the most acute minds of the age in which he lived, (then Vice-President Burr,) announced that he had received packets which by indorsements thereon appeared to be the electoral votes, and he then addressed the Senate and the House: "You will now proceed, gentlemen, to count the votes as the Constitution and laws direct." He broke the seals and handed them to the teller of the Senate, who read them aloud, with the attestations of tution and laws direct." He broke the seals and handed them to the teller of the Senate, who read them aloud, with the attestations of appointment, and the House tellers compared them with the duplicates "lying before them." After the returns had all been examined, without any objection having been made to receiving any of the votes, Mr. Smith on the part of the tellers communicated the result, and the Vice-President said: "On this report it becomes my duty to declare," &c. In the House Journal the language is somewhat different: "As the votes were read the teller, on the part of each House counted them, and the President of the Senate in pursuance of the duty devolved. and the President of the Senate in pursuance of the duty devolved upon him announced the vote." A committee of each House joined in waiting upon the President and notifying him of his election.

First, that the President of the Senate disclaimed for himself, and in favor of the power of the two Houses to count the votes. Second that the Journals expressly declare that the tellers counted the votes Third, that there was no objection made to receiving the vote, and the question of receiving was therefore an affirmative one. Fourth, the question of receiving was therefore an aliminative one. Fourth, that the tellers reported and upon that report the President of the Senate declared the result of the vote in accordance with the duty enjoined upon him. Fifth, that the two Houses concurred in the notification of the election. Sixth, that the President of the Senate was not empowered to declare who were elected, but the entry was to be made upon the Journals of the respective Houses, as in the year 1801.

In 1809 there was a joint resolution as to the mode of procedure; and except in this respect, the Journal entries are like those on previous occasions. The President of the Senate in that case said: "Pursuant to the joint resolution of the two Houses I announce the state of the vote and declare the persons elected." There was one vote from Kentucky not counted, because the elector though elected was not present and did not vote, and his vote was excluded by the tellers. In that case you will find that the President of the Senate acted merely in a ministerial capacity as to the counting and declaring, and he did so nursuant to the order of the joint resolution. The tellers, who were so pursuant to the order of the joint resolution. The tellers, who were the agents of each House, did all the counting, and they were appointed for that purpose. They counted the votes cast, not the electors appointed. There was on this occasion a joint resolution which vested in the President of the Senate the power to declare the election. The absence of such joint resolution in 1801 and in 1805 made it the duty of the President of the Senate only to announce the result, but with no power to declare the election. The point was raised by Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, that the President of the Senate could not take the Speaker's chair except by the courtesy of the House; that he was in no way superior to the Speaker of the House in the meeting of the Houses, except as he opened the votes; and the House sustained the point so made.

In 1813 the precedent was almost exactly the same. In 1817 it was the same with a single exception. The returns were read aloud by the tellers and were recorded on the Journal of the Senate and the Journal of the House of Representatives by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, respectively, before there was any announcement; and the House again declared that the President of the Senate should be introduced to the Speaker's chair by the Speaker of

In this case there was a difficulty about the vote of the State of Indiana, and I beg the attention of the House for a moment to that branch of the precedent. Indiana it seems had hardly got into the Union, or at least there was a doubt raised about it. The question was, Union, or at least there was a doubt raised about it. The question was, Shall the vote of Indiana be counted? An objection was raised to the counting of the vote of Indiana by a member of the lower House, and the two Houses separated. The House of Representatives, after debate, determined to lay upon the table the resolution against counting the vote of Indiana, and did no more about it. They then returned to the Senate Chamber and the Speaker informed the Senate that the House of Representatives had not deemed it necessary to come to any resolution on the subject which had produced a separa-tion of the two Houses; and then the vote of Indiana was counted.

Now I beg of gentlemen to say if the theory now propounded be true that the vote of one House was sufficient to count the electoral vote of a State, what was the necessity of a separation of the two Houses by reason of objections arising in the House of Representa-tives, if the Senate were willing to count the vote of Indiana? And it nowhere appears that the Senate made or considered any objection In other words, if Indiana could be counted by the voice of one House alone, there was no reason for the Houses to separate when the House of Representatives objected, because the Senate would have said to the House: "There is no need for your going over to your Hall, for the Senate will count the vote of Indiana, and whether you consent or not it must therefore be counted." But the two Houses separated, and the Senate waited the return of the House of Representatives, which House declared that they had taken no action for the rejection of the count, and then the vote of Indiana was counted by the concurrent voice and judgment of the two Houses. In all this Procedure, as in the former ones, I beg to note as I go along that the President of the Senate had no voice except as he was the organ of the will of the two Houses under the joint resolution. He was their organ—their minister—acting under their orders, with no claim of any original power by himself, and no concession of it to him by either House

In the year 1821 a similar difficulty occurred about Missouri, and Missouri was then counted hypothetically by the concurrent voices of the two Houses. In that case the President of the Senate was also utterly ignored. And the President of the Senate, in pursuance of the resolution to which the two Houses came in respect to the State of Missouri, announced the result counting Missouri in the de-

In 1825, in 1829, and in 1833 there was nothing that I need note, except that in 1833 for the first time the entry of the procedure on the Journals is made "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives." There is a separate entry made of the joint procedure of the two Houses on the Journal of each.

In the election in 1837 I call the attention of the House to the precision with which the gentleman who was then a prominent statesman made the announcement as President pro tempore of the Senate; I mean the late Hon. William R. King, of Alabama, whose nice and discriminating precision in all matters of form was very celebrated in discriminating precision in all matters of form was very celebrated in his day. He, as President of the Senate, said:

The two Houses being now convened for counting the electoral votes of the several States for President and Vice-President of the United States, the President of the Senate will, in pursuance of the provision of the Constitution, proceed to open the votes and deliver them to the tellers in order that they may be counted.

If Mr. King had been attempting by the use of phraseology to fit the present exigency, he could not have adopted an apter form of words. He proceeded—

I now present to the tellers the electoral votes of the State of Maine.

The entry then goes on-

The tellers then counted the votes and announced them, the tellers also reading the qualifications of the electors and the certificates of their election. The President pro tempore of the Senate then announced the result as reported by the tellers.

Now it is curious that in this same year 1837 there was no election of a Vice-President by the electoral colleges. There was a declara-tion to that effect entered on the Journal of the Senate; and the Senate by its own judgment declared that, as there was no election of a Vice-Presidant, it would now proceed to that election. By its own judgment it decided that the contingency had arisen for the exercise of its elective function, and it proceeded to the discharge of this constitutional duty.

In 1841 and 1845 the same entries were substantially made. In 1845,

Mr. Mangum, of North Carolina, a gentleman as distinguished for precision and accuracy as Mr. King, and a member of the whig party, was President of the Senate. He said that the object of the two Houses in assembling was to count the votes, and he then added-

I deliver to the gentlemen tellers the votes of the electors of Maine, in order that they may be examined by the tellers.

In 1849 the language of Vice-President Dallas is very precise, but

In 1853 the same entry is made.

In 1857, notwithstanding the discussion in reference to the count of the electoral vote of Wisconsin, like action was taken. Mr. James M. Mason, of Virginia, President of the Senate, despite all averments. to the contrary, expressly and with emphasis disclaimed all power for himself to count or decide upon the vote of Wisconsin, and declared it belonged to the two Houses. While many members almost passionately insisted on such disclaimer, no one in either House asserted the power for the President of the Senate or denied it to the House

I now come to three very important precedents to which I will call attention for a few moments. I mean the precedents under the twenty-second joint rule of the two Houses, adopted when the republican party were in power in both branches of Congress and when the democratic party was in a most woful minority. In 1865 the the joint resolution was passed "to exclude the electoral votes of the rebel States;" and it was passed by both Houses, Mr. Lincoln signing it are forms only disclaiming any right of interference on his contribution. it pro forma only, disclaiming any right of interference on his part in the matter. He said the two Houses in his view "have complete power to exclude from counting all electoral votes deemed by them on the other side that it was not in legal force because not re-adopted. In 1869 Louisiana was counted under this rule on an affirmative vote of each House, and Georgia was hypothetically counted under a rule adopted by both Houses, modifying the twenty-second joint rule. In 1873 the first entry that I find on the Journal is that the President of the Senate was authorized to appoint a teller on the part of the Senate. Magnificent power possessed by the President of the Senate, and possessed under an authority conferred upon him by the body over which he presided!

I now ask that gentlemen on the other side who now maintain the power of the President of the Senate will look at the twenty-second joint rule. Whether it was right or wrong on the question of requiring the concurrence of the two Houses to count a vote, one thing is settled by that precedent: the twenty-second joint rule ignores ut-terly the power of the President of the Senate in this matter, and asserts the exclusive power of the two Houses. Under that rule the last three presidential elections have been determined, by a tacit sub-mission to its authority, without re-adoption, though now it is claimed on the other side that it was not in legal force because not re-adopted.

Now, there was an objection to Georgia; and it was not counted because the two Houses did not concur. There was also an objection to Mississippi; but the votes were counted because of the concurrence of the two Houses. In the case of Texas the objection was overruled, and the vote was counted by the concurrence of the two Houses.

ruled, and the vote was counted by the concurrence of the two Houses. In the latter case the objection is curious, and it may apply to the Oregon case in some respects. The objection was that there were only four electors who met, when eight constituted a full college; and that they did not constitute a quorum in a body of eight, and therefore had no right to fill vacancies. But the vote was counted by the concurrent voice of the two Houses. Arkansas lost its vote by the non-concurrence of the two Houses; and the vote of Louisiana was also rejected.

Now, I beg the House to observe that not only was the twenty-second joint rule adopted by the republican party and followed in three presidential elections, but under the authority of that rule the voice of three States was stifled. The President of the Senate was by it ignored; and the concurrence of the two Houses was required by it ignored; and the concurrence of the two Houses was required in order to count any vote. Acting under that rule, the two Houses went into questions as to the legality of the votes and of the electors and of the election. They raised the question of the power of particular States to choose electors at all, and denied it to them. Let our new-born State-rights men on the other side of the Chamber explain how it was that in 1800 they stifled the voice of many Southern States, refusing them the right to vote at all, and yet now deny to this House any authority to say that the fraudulent action of a returning board shall not stand in lieu of the voice of a sovereign State.

RESULT OF THE PRECEDENTS

Now, I sum up on this point; that from 1793 to 1801 the prece-Now, I sum up on this point; that from 1793 to 1801 the precedents sanctioned the power of the Houses and the subordination of the President of the Senate to them as to counting and as their mere organ; and that these were all constitutionally sanctioned by the constitution-making power in the amendment of 1804; that from 1805 down to this time, though the power of the President of the Senate has been uniformly denied and disclaimed, and that of the Houses has been uniformly asserted and exercised, no proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States because it has been violated in these respects by the later precedents has ever been made in Congress or out of it. So that until now there is a perfect uniformity of precedents for eighty-six years; and by the silence of the constitution-making authority those precedents have its sanction as being in conformity to the Constitution.

Now, I need not say to the lawyers of this body how potential in the construction of any law, and of constitutional law, the opinions of lawyers and statesmen have always been held by the judicial authorities in England and in this country. Where the construction has been uniform for a long period of time there has been acquiescence in the interpretation as sound and fair. And it is on this ground that, where the law-making authority does not intervene to amend a law under the construction of which a practice has grown up, it is concluded that the power which could and does not change assents to the interpretation of the law by those who execute it. And so, where for eighty-six years the supreme authority of the two Houses has been uniformly exerted, and the President of the Senate has been uniformly treated as an agent under their orders and not superior to or co-ordinate with them, and when in the face of this an perior to or co-ordinate with them, and when in the face of this an amendment was made, which, however, retained the very language under discussion, and no proposal has ever since been made to change it, in order to correct a supposed false and unconstitutional practice, can there be a doubt that these precedents have the sanction of the constitution-making authority? (See Ex parte Exeter, 70 G. C. L. R. 157; Gorham vs. Exeter, 69, ibid., 74.)

One single word in reference to the two tentative legislative acts of 1800 and 1824. In the act of Congress proposed in 1800, which in one form or another, although there was not a concurrence between the two Houses, was passed by both, the President of the Senate was wholly ignored, and the two Houses were directed to count. There was an amendment proposed and voted for by Mr. Pinckney and others, who were in the minority, also ignoring the President of the Senate, and claiming the power of counting for the two Houses. The bill passed with a claim of power to inquire into the returns, but with a proviso not to go into the votes cast at the polls. This proviso was of itself a self-imposed restraint upon the power of Congress, and indicated that without that self-restraint the power was claimed to exist, and might have been conferred by the bill.

At the risk of tediousness, I beg to note that this bill, to which in its general features Marshall and the great statesmen of that period gave their sanction, without any notable exception, was followed by the twelfth amendment, without any change of the language under discussion from what it originally was. Can it be denied that the constitution-makers did not see in that bill any violation of the Con-

In Mr. Van Buren's bill, in 1824, the President of the Senate was ignored, as you will find by the language of the first section and of the fourth. The concurrence of the two Houses was required in order to reject an electoral vote. It passed the Senate. In the House it was reported back by Mr. Webster to the House of Representatives without amendment, but failed to be acted upon. So that again, after a quarter of a century, the general opinion of the country was expressed that the President of the Senate could not, and the Houses must, count the electoral votes.

Now, I assert that there is nothing that I have seen in this whole history which furnishes a pretext for the claim of the President of the history which furnishes a pretext for the claim of the President of the Senate but one single fact, on which reliance is had, that the certificate of the President of the Senate in 1789 and down through several presidential elections was, that he had "opened and counted the vote."

As to this, I remark:

First. That ceased since 1817, sixty years ago, because it was regarded as an empty form and a sham.

Second. It never meant anything, for (1) it was never adopted by both Houses, but only by the Senate. (2) The Senate by its own order directed its President to make out the certificate and to sign it. order directed its President to make out the certificate and to sign it. He did not do it ex mero motu, but as the organ and minister of the Senate and under its mandate. (3) All that he says in it is that he opened all the certificates and counted all the votes. Suppose he did; yet it may not show any original authority to do it, or anything but his ministerial act, done by the authority of the two Houses, or a mere enumeration; and I suppose he never did it as a personal act, but as presiding officer of the Senate, and as its official organ he certified the truth of that which he knew, and which its Journal avouched as true. (4) The insufficiency of the certificate to prove the fact that he did the counting is shown by reference to the facts as appearing by the record. What does it say he did? We will interpret his words by his acts. The record shows that he never did count the votes in the sense of controlling and determining the count. Looking at what he did and what the tellers or the counters for the Houses did, the meaning of his certificate is satisfied without attributing to it a claim by him to have done what the facts of record show was never done by him to have done what the facts of record show was never done by him?

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Garfield] the other day referred to the fact that in the early precedents there was no sufficient time allowed for a contest, no time for inquiry. The gentleman from Ohio knows very well that there was nothing in the Constitution of the United States which fixed any time for the presidential election, or any time for the electors to vote, or any time for a determination of the result of the vote. That was unfixed by the Constitution entirely, and left to the law-making power. And the only precedent that the gentleman can claim is that the law-making power in 1792 had not the prescience to see that there would ever be an occasion for such a contest, and therefore supposed that thirty-four days allowed between the time of choosing electors and the day they were to vote would be sufficient to settle the difficulty of a pres-

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I wish to make a remark. I am sure he wishes to answer the point I did make.

Mr. TUCKER. I yield to the gentleman. Mr. GARFIELD. I said the Constitution and the laws together made the contest impossible. I referred to no particular precedent or case. I said between the time the law fixed for the general election and the time the electors were to meet there was no possibility of a contest. The rest of the time, two months and a half, the whole proceedings were locked up under the seals of the electoral colleges and there could be no contest. And after the time when the votes were opened certainly there could be no contest.

Mr. TUCKER. Then there is no contest between the gentleman

Mr. TUCKER. Then there is no contest between the gentleman from Ohio and myself and it will not take much time to settle the fact. He only relies upon the precedent of a law of Congress, which never anticipated such a state of things as disgraces the year 1876. Thus far I have discussed the question from a consideration of the Constitution itself; of the history of the convention which adopted it; of the three classes of precedents: those which were preconstitutional, those which being sanctioned by the twelfth amendment have the force of a constitutional interpretation of the language used, and those precedents subsequent to the adoption of that amendment; from a consideration of the laws passed by both Houses, and from the a consideration of the laws passed by both Houses, and from the opinions of statesmen and lawyers; and I have endeavored to show, with the aid of all these sources of light upon our inquiries, the resolutions of the committee are sustained fully and beyond doubt.

I now ask the indulgence of the House to express a few thoughts upon the bill for the tribunal, which has been reported by the committee of which the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] is chairman. This bill obviously does four things:

First. It utterly ignores the power of the President of the Senate to count the electoral votes.

Second. It claims the power of both Houses to count the votes.

Third. In all cases of one return from a State, it requires a concurrence of both Houses to reject a vote.

Fourth. In all cases of double returns, it submits the controversy to a tribunal whose decision is conclusive, unless overruled by the concurrent votes of both Houses.

If, therefore, the tribunal rejects a vote, both Houses must concur to count it. If the tribunal decides to count the vote, both Houses must reject it.

It is obvious that the first and second principles above stated are in conformity with the first four resolutions of the committee on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House, of which I am a member. To this extent the bill has my cordial support.

The third principle of the bill is contrary to the views of the said

The fourth principle is partly in accord with the said committee, and partly not. But it makes the case in which a concurrence is required to reject a vote a very different one from that I have discussed; for if this tribunal decides to count a vote, it is like a judgment nisi, a strong case of presumptive right, against which a concurrence of the two Houses to reject is not unreasonable.

In candor I confess that upon this point I do not favor the bill. But it is a compromise between the two conflicting ideas; that is, whether the Houses must concur in counting or in rejecting an elect-

But this conflict is one in which I find very great authorities against me in the past; and now, with earnest convictions of the soundness of my conclusions, I am not prepared to stake the peace or the regular order of the Government on such an issue. In 1800, in 1824, and now, the difference has existed, and now (for we cannot shut our eyes to facts) probably exists between the two Houses.

It is this difference between the two Houses which makes some law necessary and proper to be passed.

Consider the status of the country in view of this conflict.

Take one State as the pivotal State in this contest. Two branches

Take one State as the pivotal State in this contest. Two branches of conflict are likely to arise. The first, one House may favor the count of its vote, and the other its rejection. The second, in the event of the conflict just named, one House may say it must be counted, because both Houses do not reject; the other, it must be rejected, because both do not agree to count.

The first conflict is one of fact; the second, one of power. It is in this last that I find "the nettle, danger," out of which I would "pluck candor to say that my humble conception differs from that presented It was to let each House work out the elective procedure according to its own idea; and even, perhaps, to elect different persons, as a result; and constitute a tribunal, exclusively judicial, to decide upon the title to the executive offices of each of the contestants, upon a hearing of the case between them. By this method each House would have done its duty according to its own views of their related powers, and left the decision of a case between claimants of the offices under the titles accruing to each from the diverse action of the Houses.

But I am not prepared now to venture a substitute of my own invention for the plan proposed, and which has been so fully digested by some of the best minds in both Houses of Congress. That plan comes with imposing force before us. Thirteen out of fourteen members of the two committees commend it to us for adoption. Time The crisis is at hand. We have no opportunity for full de-

And, indeed, when I come to look at this scheme, though it has not the form, it realizes the substance of my conception. For if a judicial tribunal would be proper to decide between the titles of Mr. Tilden and Mr. Hayes, after our conflict had resulted as I have indicated at the control of the con cated, may not this tribunal as well decide it in advance? We know cated, may not this tribunal as well decide it in advance? We know that the case would be after the fact what it is to-day. We provide for the event to come as we would propose for that which is past.

And I am the better reconciled to this scheme because I am not certain we could agree upon the tribunal to determine after the event. The very power of this House, which I would jealously watch, may be lost in the future struggle now so imminent, or be overborne by the advantages of the antagonistic claim in the circumstances of this hour. I may be called to save so much of this right, as Imay by such a scheme as this, rather than peril all by its rejection.

We may thus be in a tri-lemma—not a di-lemma—a trilemma, of a tame surrender of our right to what we believe would be unconstitutional and arbitrary dictation; or armed conflict to maintain the right, as we conceive it; or mutual concessions between differences of opinions on a doubtful issue, not expressly fixed by the Constitution, through a tribunal of honorable arbitration.

If this be a fair statement of the condition of things, I feel I would not be justified, upon a conflict of power such as this, to reject the only measure which is offered to preserve the peace and secure the happiness of the country.

Let it be considered that this bill is really a joint arrangement for the execution of a power and duty confided to two Houses for the present election. If it were for a future one the difficulty would be very great, for we would be conceding the constitutional functions of a future House by a rule which it may prescribe for itself, but by which we cannot bind it. This is a rule for this case, in which this House and the Senate must now do our duty or leave the Government

But can we delegate our duty and power? it is asked. I do not think we can by irrevocable act put beyond our control and into other hands the duty devolved on us. But it will be perceived this bill does not do this. Where one return comes from a State we retain the whole power. Where there is more than one, we devolve on a commission to decide, subject to our review; and though in that review this House may not singly reverse the decision, yet it yields no more power in this regard than it is called on to do by the claim that both Houses must consumt to reject an electronly vote; and that claim both Houses must concur to reject an electoral vote; and that claim by the Senate we would have to meet without hope of a favorable issue, if we establish no commission.

And it may be added that, by passing this law, we do give the consent of this House to the counting of a vote which the commission decides to count, unless both Houses agree to reject it.

But it is clear by this bill we do not surrender our power to count or reject by creating this commission, for the final action is with both Houses, though the advisory action is with the commission.

But can Congress pass a law to prescribe the procedure of the two Houses ?

If we recur again to the twelfth amendment of the Constitution, we find its mandate "and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President," &c.

This clause is mandatory on us, on the two Houses, not only in terms but because if we do not count there will be no Executive, and if none, there can be no legislation and no execution of law, and

and if none, there can be no legislation and no execution of law, and if so there can be no judiciary. Upon our action depends the existence of the Federal Government. We must act. We must exercise our delegated power and duty. We have no alternative.

Our power and duty are to count the votes and decide who is President. It devolves on two bodies. But how can we do the duty if we differ ou the fact and as to the legal result of that difference? How can the conflict he harmonized? can the conflict be harmonized? If on distinct claims of power one House declares Tilden and the other declares Hayes elected, how are we to avoid a declaration of a dual Executive? And, if we do, how avoid armed conflict?

I repeat, upon the carrying into execution of this one power of counting electoral votes the execution of all the powers confided to the Government may depend.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. Mr. HUNTON. I believe my colleague is nearly through, and I ask that his time be extended.

Mr. COX. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. TUCKER. Is there no remedy in such a case? I believe there is, for it is a constitutional axiom that all granted power not self-efficient must be executed by means furnished by the co-efficient power of the law-making department. Ours is a Constitution which makes law the solvent of all problems of conflict between the departments of the Government itself. Within the organism no disorder can arise from the friction of its parts which will not be cured by the agency of law.

find these important words:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

We have power to pass the law necessary to carry this counting power into execution, without which the powers of the executive department are paralyzed and on the paralysis of which the legislative and judicial powers depend. This law will do it. Reject it, and is there any hope of any other that will? I see none. This is tabula in naufragio; yes, the only plank in the shipwreck.

"Necessary and proper" are words of limitation. "Necessary" is said from its roots (ne and cesso) to mean that which cannot cease or said from its roots (ne and cesso) to mean that which cannot cease or stop, because, if it did, ruin would follow. Give to the word even this, its most stringent meaning, and this bill meets that necessity. For, if I have succeeded in showing that, if this power fails or ceases to operate, the executive department falls, and all its powers and of the whole Government will fail; that the very functions which each House claims cannot be exerted in this struggle between them unless and the struggle between them unless that the struggle between them the struggle between the struggle between the struggle between them unless that the struggle between the struggl mediation quells it, how can it be denied that something is absolutely necessary to be done to heal this dissension, from which such fatal results may flow?

All necessary laws which are proper, that is, "bona fide appropriate to the end" (1 Story, Constitution, section 1251) of preventing such a conflict between the departments or branches of the Government as will destroy it or paralyze its essential powers, are constitutional.

The power to count and thus declare a President must not fail because the operators fall out. They must be unified in action by law, so as to secure the execution of the power. Congress must pass the necessary law to carry this power into execution; that is, the power to count the vote, upon which all the other powers depend. Is not such a law, without which the machinery of Government would stop, a necessary law? A law which will adjust this conflict of claims between the Houses in respect to the execution of this power must be constitutional. And it is all the easier that the law-makers are the contestants for the power; that is, the two Houses, who must concur in the law which will unite them, though now in conflict in the cooperative act of counting the electoral votes.

The law, as an umpire, directs an abatement of the claim of each, to save each from the usurpation of the other and the country from civil strife. It cannot but be constitutional to create such a tribunal to avoid such dire alternatives. We must find a channel for the ship of state between the Scylla of arbitrary dictation and the Charybdis

With these views of my duty and without going into the details of the tribunal provided by the bill, I avow that I will gladly embrace the solution of the present political problem which it proposes without allowing it as a precedent for the future, when, I trust, some law may satisfactorily put at rest the difficult questions which now embar-

If it is said we must stand by our rights, I answer that, while my convictions are very strong, yet I feel I am not infallible, and cannot expect to have my own views conformed to by others absolutely. He "who so wishes," says Mr. Bagehot, "cannot have weighed what Butler calls the doubtfulness things are involved in; to be sure you are right; to impose your will, or to wish to impose it, with violence upon others; to see your own ideas vividly and fixedly, and to be tormented till you can apply them in life and practice; not to like to hear the opinion of others; to be unable to sit down and weigh the truth they have, are but crude states of intellect in our present civilization.

At the same time I am free to say that the tribunal I look to as proper for the crisis is one which will "unkennel fraud," though clothed in the stolen robes of State sovereignty, and will protect the United States from the lawlessness of those who use State power to inflict State wrongs and to trample on State rights. If our tribunal of justice turns away from the scent of fraud or refrains from conof justice turns away from the scent of fraud of refrains from con-demning illegal action because done by men who, dressed in a little brief authority, play such fantastic tricks before high heaven as make the angels weep, "I would have none of it; for if fraud is to triumph, if tricks are trumps, if lawless power is to usurp places of authority, with a passport from the tribunal we constitute, let it be done without the mockery of judicial decision and by the mailed hand of military despotism.

If the chicanery and false devices of the day shall succeed in placing in the Presidency one whose title is tainted with fraud, then may we,

in the language of an unpublished poem of a half century ago, follow the method therein described in respect to our children:

Hence, if you have a son, I would advise—
Lest his fair prospects in the state you spoil—
If you would have him in the state to rise,
Instead of Grotius, let him study Hoyle! A turn for petty tricks, indulge the bent;
A dextrous cut may rule some great event,
And a stocked pack may make a President!

God forbid, Mr. Speaker, on the threshold of our second century, a President should ascend the chair of state with hands stained with blood or begrimed with fraud. His triumph would be fruitless. A people's wrath would

Mr. BUCHARD, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from New York, before he presses that motion, allow me to ask unanimous consent that an order be made for the printing in the RECORD of the views of the minority of the committee on this subject?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Certainly.

There was no objection, and the order was made.

The views of the minority on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House in reference to counting the vote are as follows:

the House in reference to counting the vote are as follows:

The undersigned dissent from the propositions contained in the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee and question the necessity and propriety of presenting them at this time for consideration by the House.

In our judgment it was not our province, nor within the scope of the inquiry we were directed to make, in any manner to investigate and ask the House to pass upon the powers of the President of the Senate. Unless compelled to do so in order to ascertain the powers of the House, it seems to be an impropriety to present or pass at this time upon the question of his power. The grave duty devolving upon the committee cannot be fully performed by framing and reporting resolutions for the consideration of the House without eccompanying them with a statement of the facts and reasons which have led thereto. We therefore feel impelled to present our reasons for dissenting from the resolutions of the majority. We realize the grave responsibility of taking a false position or leading the House to a wrong conclusion. To ascertain and inform the House what powers and privileges it possesses, and what duties it has to perform in counting the electoral vote, requires the investigation of great constitutional and legal questions, concerning which contrary opinions have been menintained by the foremost statesmen and best jurists of the present and preceding generations. The majority, to justify the assertion of the extreme and arbitrary power claimed for the House, should show that their construction of the Constitution is unmistakably correct. The resolution under which the committee act requires them to ascertain and report what are the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

NATURE AND EFFECT OF THE ELECTORAL COUNT.

NATURE AND EFFECT OF THE ELECTORAL COUNT. What is the count, mentioned in the Constitution, required to be made upon opening the electoral certificates?

Does it include more than the clerical or ministerial duty of making the arithmetic.

metical computation of the number of duly certified and properly authenticated electoral votes cast for each candidate; or does it involve a right of judgment upon the action of the State in appointing the electors holding prima facts evidence of their appointment and transmitting their votes, as required by the Constitution and law?

Does the count, which the House attends as a witness or participant, have the effect of a final judicial investigation?

The settlement of this question would have aided the committee in considering whether the House is authorized or can be authorized, under the Constitution, to exercise such judicial power.

The power to decide contested elections other than of its own members is not conferred by the Constitution upon the House. The election of President and Vice-President, in all that relates to the appointment of the electors, was reserved to the States. No power was conferred upon Congress or either House to judge or decide upon their qualifications or invalidate their votes. Such power is clearly not among the enumerzated powers of Congress.

It has not been conferred upon the two Houses or either of them by any law carrying into execution powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States.

On the contrary, the judicial power of the United States is, by the third article

On the contrary, the judicial power of the United States is, by the third article of the Constitution, vested in the courts of the United States, and made to extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, &c.

States, &c.

The count upon opening the certificates, made simply by virtue of the directions of the Constitution, and without statutory provision, is merely a ministerial, and not a judicial, act, requiring only the arithmetical enumeration and summing up of the votes duly authenticated found in the certificates forwarded by the several electoral Such count and action taken upon its announcement, and the recognition by the other departments of the result declared, doubtless constitute or secure a prima facie right to be inaugurated and hold the executive office.

WHO IS UNDER THE CONSTITUTION EMPOWERED TO MAKE THIS COUNT

WHO IS UNDER THE CONSTITUTION EMPOWERED TO MAKE THIS COUNT?

The Constitution does not expressly say. It requires the votes to be counted. The first three resolutions of the majority affirm that the Constitution confers mon the President of the Senate no power to count, but does confer such power upon the two Houses of Congress.

In respect to the first and second resolutions of the committee, the undersigned are unable, either from an examination of the Constitution itself or from the action and expressed opinions of its framers, to come to the conclusion that the President of the Senate has no voice in counting the electoral vote. On the contrary, the early practice strongly confirms the opinion of Chancellor Kent. He says:

"The President of the Senate, on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, in the presence of the members of both Houses of Congress, opens all the certificates, and the votes are then to be counted. The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes and a closely contested election this power may be all important, and I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two Houses are present only as spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors."

By express provision of the Constitution the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two Houses, for anght that appears in the Constitution to the celetoral votes cast. He is enjoined to open the certificates. He is not required to deliver them when opened to any other person, officer, or body. Opening them in the presence of the two Houses, for anght that appears in the Constitution to the countrary, they still remain in his custody. The votes when opened are then to be counted. If it was intended that

VOTES IN CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

VOTES IN CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

That the constitutional convention intended to confer upon the President of the Senate power to count the votes, or cause the count to be made, seems probable, if not certain, from the votes and proceedings in the convention, in the votes upon modifications of the original proposition.

The clause relating to the electoral count in the article on the executive, as reported by Mr. Brearly, September 4, 1787. reads:

"The President of the Senate shall, in that House, open all the certificates; and the votes shall be then and there counted."

The proposition was taken up on the 6th of September, and, by the vote of six States to four, the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" were added after "counted;" so that the clause would read:

"The President of the Senate shall, in that House, open all the certificates; and the votes shall then and there be counted, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives."

The requirement that the counting should be "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives."

The requirement that the counting should be "in the presence of the Senate and House of Represence would be meaningless tantology. There is no record of any change of this provision by a vote of the convention, and the committee on revision reported the clause as it stands in the Constitution as a more concise and elegant form of conveying the expressed understanding of the convention.

CONTEMPORANEOUS CONSTRUCTION.

CONTEMPORANEOUS CONSTRUCTION.

This is a case in which we may be aided by contemporaneous construction. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, page 67, says:

"Contemporaneous construction may consist simply in the understanding with which the people received it at the time, or in the acts done in putting it in operation, and which necessarily assume that it is to be construed in a particular way. In the first case, it can have very little force, because the evidence of the public understanding when nothing has been done under the provision in question must always necessarily be vague and indecisive. But when there has been a practical construction which has been acquiesced in for a considerable period, considerations in favor of adhering to this construction sometimes present themselves to the courts with a plausibility and force which it is not easy to resist. Indeed, where a particular construction has been generally accepted as correct, and especially when this has occurred contemporaneously with the adoption of the Constitution, and by those who had opportanity to understand the intention of the instrument, a strong presumption exists that the construction rightly interprets the intention."

If, then, any action was taken by the framers of the Constitution and those who adopted it in regard to this question, that action will throw strong light upon the question of the true meaning of the Constitution in this particular.

ACTION OF THE CONVENTION.

ACTION OF THE CONVENTION.

The framers of the Constitution in submitting their labors to Congress passed a resolution in regard to this very question. One week after voting upon the mode of counting the electoral votes, a resolution was reported by the committee on revision in regard to the first count of the votes under the Constitution. It was adopted and appended to the Constitution. The convention—
"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this convention * * * that 'the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned; that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President.'"

And thus in doing an act in reference to putting in operation the Constitution they had framed, they used language which intrusted the President of the Senate with the counting they had provided should be made.

If they had understood that, under the Constitution, the President of the Senate had no power to count the votes, surely they would not have declared it to be their opinion that, after the ratification of that Constitution, the Senate should elect a presiding officer for the purpose of counting as well as receiving and opening the votes for President.

ACTION IN THE FIRST CONGRESS.

When the First Congress convened under the Constitution, the Senate organized, as suggested by the constitutional convention, and "proceeded by ballot to the choice of a President for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States." John Langdon was elected. When, the Senate "ordered, that Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives" of its action, "and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed, in the presence of the House, to discharge the duty" of opening and counting of the votes. To this message the House responded that it was "ready forthwith to meet the Senate, to attend" at the execution of that duty.

The Journal of the Senate states that "the Speaker and House of Representatives attended in the Senate Chamber for the purpose expressed in the message delivered by Mr. Ellsworth, and, after some time, [after the counting of the votes,] withdrew;" that "the President elected for the sole purpose of counting, withdrew;" that "the President the Senate and House had met, and that he, in their presses ee, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States;" whereby it appears that George Washington, esq., was unanimously elected President and John Adams Vice-President of the United States."

Upon the return of the House to its own Hall, the Speaker resumed the chair, and Messrs. Parker and Heister "delivered in at the Clerk's table a list of the votes of the electors of the several States in a choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States."

The following members of the Federal convention that framed the Constitution were members of this First Congress assembled under it: In the Senate, John Langdon, of New Hampshire; William S. Johnson and Oliver Ellsworth, of Connecticut; William Paterson, of New Jersey; Robert Morris, of Pennsylvania; George Read and Richard Basset, of Delaware; Pierce Butler, of South Carolina; and William Few, of Georgia. In the House, Nicholas Gilman, of New Hampshire; Roger Sherman, of Connecticut; George Clymer, of Pennsylvania; Daniel Carroll, of Maryland; James Madison, jr., of Virginia; and Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia. Nearly all of them were present at the counting of the electoral votes, and tacitly assented to the proceedings and count and announcement by the President of the Senate in that Congress.

PROCEEDINGS AT THE NEXT THREE SUCCEEDING ELECTIONS IN COUNTING THE ELECT-ORAL VOTES.

1. Appointment of joint committees.

At each of these counts the Houses passed resolutions for the appointment of joint committees "to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President."

2. Reports of committees and orders of House thereon

2. Reports of committees and orders of House thereon.

The committees appointed in 1793 and 1797 severally reported to each of their respective Houses resolutions, which were adopted, directing the time and place at which the two Houses shall assemble, the appointment of one teller on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House "to make lists of the votes as they shall be declared;" that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid; which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

3. Notifications of readings to attend the counting

3. Notifications of readiness to attend the counting.

At each of these three counts the notifications of readiness to attend specified the purpose, namely, "to attend the opening and counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, as the Constitution provides," and followed substantially the same form at each count.

In each count, the President of the Senate followed the joint direction of the two Houses and the mode of procedure in the First Congress, opened the certificates, delivered them to the tellers, who examined and ascertained the number of votes, presented a list to the Vice-President, which was read, and the result declared by him to the two Houses.

delivered them to the telefers, who examined and ascertained the presented a list to the Vice-President, which was read, and the result declared by him to the two Houses.

At these several counts the President of the Senate not only opened the certificates, but made all the announcements of the purpose of assemblage, action taken, and results. If there was any presiding officer on the occasion, he was such officer. The tellers were only authorized "to make lists of the votes as they shall be declared;" the result was delivered by them to the President of the Senate, and he announced the state of the vote and the persons elected.

At the third count of the electoral votes John Adams, then Vice-President, declared the result of the electoral votes John Adams, then Vice-President, declared the result of the Constitution and laws of the United States and to the commands of both Houses of Congress, expressed in their resolution"— and then delivered to the Secretary of the Senate the votes of the electors, which apparently thus far had remained in his custody.

4. Certificates of election stated the President of Senate had counted the votes.

4. Certificates of election stated the President of Senate had counted the votes.

4. Certificates of election stated the President of Senate had counted the votes.

The certificates of election issued by the orders of the Senate and House stated expressly that the President of the Senate had counted the electoral votes. Upon the completion of the first count James Madison, a member of the House of Representatives, was directed by that body "to inform the Senate that the House have agreed that the notifications of the election of the President and Vice-President of the United States should be made by such persons, and in such manner, as the Senate shall be pleased to direct;" when the Senate adopted and entered on its journal the following certificate, prepared under its order, by a committee of its members, consisting of Messrs. Patterson, Johnson, and Ellsworth, (who were also members of the constitutional convention,) and Mr. Lee:

"Beit known, that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened in the city and State of New York, the sixth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, the underwritten, appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes of the electors, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and for a Vice-President; by which it appears that George Washington, esquire, was unanimously elected, agreeably to the Constitution, to the office of President of the United States of America.

"In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal.

"JOHN LANGDON."

John Langdon, who signs this certificate, and who was elected by the Senate its President for the duty which he certifies he had performed, was also a distinguished member of the constitutional convention. In 1797 the Senate again adopted practically the same form. It was reported under its order by a committee consisting of Messrs. Mason, Hillhouse, and Sedgwick, and at successive counts, up to and including the tenth, the presiding officers of the Senate (respectively John Langdom, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, Aaron Burr, John Milledge, William H. Crawford, and John Gaillard) states, under the order of the Senate, order of the House, that he—

"The underwritten, Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, for President of the Senate, for President and for a Vice-President of the United States and President and for a Vice-President of the United States and President and for a Vice-President of the United States."

It is the resolutions of the majority of this committee affirm, the Constitution gives the President and for a Vice-President of the United States."

It is the President and for a Vice-President of the United States.

It is the President of the Senate no authority to count the electoral votes, it is very remarkable that for a period covering almost half the history thus far of the Republic, this officer did this very thing, and the Senate and House of Representatives thus repeatedly and formally acknowledged his right to do this.

Fifteen membrase of this constitutional convention were members of the Senate or House at the presidential count in 1789; twelve at the count in 1793; and six at each of the counts in 1797 and 1801.

They participated in the proceedings and were witnesses or actors at these counts. The manner in which the count was conducted, the power asserted and exercised on these occasions by the parties required by the Constitution to be present when the act was performed, are practical expressions of the understanding of the framers of the Constitution as to the powers and duties of the Senate and House, and of the President of the Senate, in regard to the electoral votes.

These precedents are more; for, as they were the public and well-known exercise of a power or duty under an article of the Consti counted.

"If any difficulty arises, in point of order, during the division, the speaker must take upon himself to decide it peremptorily, for as it cannot be decided by the house, and so have a division upon a division, there is no other mode but to submit implicitly to his determination." "Subject, however, to the future censure of the House if that determination appears to be irregular or partial."—2 Hatsell Precedents, 198.

BUBSEQUENT POLITICAL ACTION OF THE FRAMERS OF THE CONSTITUTION IN REGARD TO INTRUSTING THE COUNTING OF THE VOTES FOR STATE EXECUTIVE OFFICERS TO THE PRESIDING OFFICER OF ONE OF THE LEGISLATIVE BRANCHES.

Subsequent Political action of the Fermess of the Constitution in Regard to Intrusting the Counting of the vortes for State executive officers to the Pressident of the new States applying for admission. Such convention was held in Pennsylvania the year following the inauguration of Washington. Two delegates from the State who were members of the Federal constitutional convention, James Wilson and Thomas Mifflin, were members of this State constitutional convention, James Wilson and Thomas Mifflin, were members of this State constitutional convention, James Wilson and Thomas Mifflin, were members of this State constitutional convention, and signed the constitution there devised and adopted. Thomas Mifflin was president of the convention.

This State constitution, adopted in 1790, required that the returns of every election for governor shall be sealed up and transmitted to the seat of government, directed to the speaker of the senate, who shall open and publish them in the presence of the members of both houses of the Legislature.

The State of Delaware formed a constitution in 1792. John Dickinson and Richard Bassett, delegates from the State in the Federal convention, signed the constitution framed for the State. It provided that the returns of every election for governor be * * * delivered to the speaker of the senate, who shall open and publish the same in the presence of the members of both houses of the Legislature.

In 1796 the State of Tennessee was formed out of a portion of the territory belonging to and eeded by North Carolina to the United States. Its constitution is signed by William Blount, as president of the convention, who signed the Federal Constitution as delegate from the State of North Carolina. The constitution is finely william Blount, as president of the convention, who signed the Federal Constitution as delegate from the State of North Carolina. in 1876.

In the proceedings under these State constitutions, where the powers have been given to a presiding officer of one of the houses of the Legislature to open and publish the returns in the presence of the Legislatures, the houses have usually attended the count simply as witnesses or spectators, without doing more than recording the proceedings in their journals or appointing tellers, unless additional powers were conferred upon them by their State constitutions.

It is sufficient to cite as an illustration the proceedings as they appear in the legislative journal of the State of Indiana, in opening and publishing the returns for governor in 1837, when the late Speaker of this House was a member of the Legislature of that State, and indicated his understanding of the duty to be performed under the constitution.

The speaker of the house of representatives of the State of Indiana on the 12th of January, 1857, made the following announcement:

"That the constitution of the State of Indiana requires that the speaker shall open and publish the returns of the election of governor and lieutenant-governor in the presence of both houses of the General Assembly, and, as the official terms of the governor and lieutenant-governor elect commence this day, I have communicated an invitation to the senate requesting them to meet the House in this hall, and in obedience to the constitution I shall, so soon as the senate appear, proceed to publish the returns for governor and lieutenant-governor."

Mr. Kerr offered the following preamble and resolution:

"Whereas the speaker of this house has announced his intention to proceed forthwith in this hall to open and publish the election returns for governor and lieutenant-governor, in pursuance of the requisitions of the constitution, and has given the senate notice thereof:

"Resolved, That the house will attend upon the appointment of the speaker in the discharge of the duties devolved upon them by the constitution, and that seats be provided for the members of the senate on the right of the speaker in the discharge of the duties devolved upon them by the constitution, and that the house is now ready to proceed to said business."

Which was agreed to.

The senate then, in pursuance of the invitation of the house, communicated through the speaker, came into the hall of the house, preceded by the president of the senate.

When,

through the speaker, came into the hall of the house, preceded by the president of the senate. When,

The joint convention was called to order by the president of the senate.

The president then declared:

"GENTLEMEN: We have assembled in joint convention, in accordance with the provision of section 4, article 5, of the constitution of the State of Indiana, which reads as follows: 'Section 4. In voting for governor and lieutenant-governor, the electors shall designate for whom they vote as governor, and for whom as lieutenant-governor. The returns of every election for governor and lieutenant-governor shall be sealed up and transmitted to the seat of government, directed to the speaker of the house of representatives, who shall open and publish them in the presence of both houses of the General Assembly.

"The speaker of the house of representatives will now proceed to open and publish the returns for the election of governor and lieutenant-governor of the State of Indiana.

WHAT PRIVILEGES. POWERS. AND DUTIES IN RESPECT TO THE COUNT DEVOLVED UPON

WHAT PRIVILEGES, POWERS, AND DUTIES IN RESPECT TO THE COUNT DEVOLVED UPON THE HOUSE.

First. The Constitution expressly confers upon the House of Representatives the power and privilege of being present at the opening by the President of the Senate of the electoral certificates, and in case, upon a count of the votes, there is not a majority for any one candidate, the power and duty are expressly devolved upon the House itself to elect a President from the three highest candidates voted for by the electoral colleges.

The fact that no candidate had received a majority of the votes cast by the electors is jurisdictional to the action of the House. Its existence is essential to a subsequent valid election by the House of the existence of the fact would not make the election by the House legal. The House is not vested by the Constitution with the power to determine the extent of its own jurisdiction, and the courts will and have held repeatedly the invalidity of the acts of Congress which transcended the constitutional powers of the legislative department.

POWERS OF THE HOUSE.

As the only express power given by the Constitution to the House in regard to the count itself is to be present with the Senate when the certificates shall be opened by the President of the Senate, any further power must be implied in this or some other express power found in the Constitution, or be conferred by law under the power given to Congress by section 8, article 1, of the Constitution. The power to be present at the opening of the certificates, or at the count, if that is included, does not imply a power to direct, control, or make the count. If the Constitution required the count to be made by an officer amenable to, and whose action was subject to revision and reversal by, the House alone, the latter might claim a constitutional power to control or direct the count.

But if such power exists, it cannot be the sole power of the House, but a power to be exercised by the Senate and House, or not at all.

The absurdity of supposing it was the intention that two independent legislative bodies, with different rules of procedure, having each its own presiding and subordinate officers, meeting in one hall and simultaneously considering, debating, and deciding upon its own action in regard to the reception of each certificate and the counting of each electoral vote found therein, without power to decide in case of disagreement between the Houses, is apparent upon a bare statement of the proposition. How should order be maintained? What an anomaly in legislative bodies! Two Houses in session and deliberating in the same hall, under different presiding officers, discussing at the same time different or even the same questions.

The conviction forces itself upon the mind that the proceeding under the count, in the absence of the prior exercise of congressional legislative power or of the concurrent direction from the two Houses, must be conducted and controlled, in the disposition of all questions that arise during the count, by the peremptory decision of the presiding officer charged with the custody of the pap

HAS THE HOUSE ANY POWER TO TAKE PART IN THE COUNT BY VIRTUE OF THE TWENTY SECOND JOINT RULE?

This rule has never been adopted by the vote of the present House of Representatives, and its existence as a joint rule governing this Congress has been expressly denied by vote of the Senate at present and last session. We attach the vote of the Senate by which, at this session, on an appeal from the decision of the President pro tempore that the joint rules were not in force, such was sustained. The vote was as follows:

"The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 50, nays 4; as follows:

"NAYS—Messrs. Maxey, Merrimon, White, and Withers—4."

By the Constitution each House has the power to make rules for its own government, and each can adopt a rule in todidem verbis for the government of such House in its intercourse with the other House. It becomes a joint rule governing both Houses while assented to, but of no force under the Constitution to bind the House withdrawing its assent. Otherwise, one House would be incapacitated from its constitutional power to make rules for its own government.

The House has therefore no power derived from the so-called twenty-second joint rule that it can exercise at the approaching presidential count.

The mode of count under that rule is questionable as to its constitutionality, giving, as it does, the power to either House, without consideration or deliberation, or even assignable reason, to reject any electoral vote and at any time transfer the election of President and Vice-President from the electors appointed by the States to the House of Representatives and to the Senate respectively.

Practically, the choice of the people for President, expressed at the election, could be defeated when a majority of the Representatives of a majority of the States and a majority of the members of either House were opposed to the successful candidate. The numerical minority in the House of Representatives, happening to have a majority in the State delegations under an election occurring two years prior thereto, could, by the action of the Senate, defeat the popular will expressed at the later election.

The impropriety of the rule, its dangerous character and unconstitutional fea-

The impropriety of the rule, its dangerous character and unconstitutional fea-tures, have been pointed out and admitted, and by none more clearly and forcibly than Senators and Representatives of both parties who have seen its practical than Senators and Representatives of both parties who have seen its practical workings.

The pernicious principle of the twenty-second joint rule is again re-asserted by the fifth resolution, that any electoral vote may be rejected and excluded from the count by the sole action of either House.

Of this rule, because of this doctrine, a distinguished Senator, Mr. Randolph, less than a year ago, said:

"That rule, now abrogated, is admitted on all sides to have been iniquitous in conception, dangerous in existence, and constitutionally without warrant."

We cannot refrain from expressing our alarm at the dangerous and, as it seems to us, revolutionary assumption of power in the House to defeat, on its sole motion and without law or other provision authorizing such action, the choice made by the electors pursuant to the Constitution and law.

The doctrine would virtually wrest the control of the election of President from the States and place it in a single branch of the legislative department when its members desired. A power clearly and expressly reserved by the Constitution to the States would by the exercise of power claimed by the resolution be usurped by one department of the General Government.

Under such a construction of the Constitution the House can defeat the election by the electoral colleges, for by excluding votes from the count it could prevent any candidate from receiving a majority, and itself, at every election, make the choice from the three candidates receiving the highest number of votes. We especially deprecate the assertion of such power in either House as a revolutionary attempt to arrogate to itself the power to choose an Executive.

We submit the following proposition, as expressing more accurately the nature of the constitutional count, and privileges, powers, and duties of the House in relation to it:

1. That the count required to be made upon opening the certificates is a ministerial duty.

2. That the so-called twenty-second joint rule is not now in force, so as to require

1. That the count required to be made upon opening the trial duty.
2. That the so-called twenty-second joint rule is not now in force, so as to require the proceedings at the count to be conducted under its provisions.
3. That it is the duty and privilege of the House to attend with the Senate at the opening of the certificates transmitted to the President of the Senate by the electors appointed by the several States, and to appoint tellers to make lists of and register and compute the votes as declared.
4. That the House, conjointly with the Senate, has power to examine the votes upon opening the certificates, and to agree with the Senate upon a mode of doing so.

50. That the privileges, the powers, and the duties of the House of Representatives, in the matter of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, are no more and no less than those of the Senate.

While measures are being considered by joint committees of the two Houses to harmonize the differences and agree upon a satisfactory method of settling all disputed questions, we believe it to be injudicious, if not unpatriotic, to attempt, by any separate action of the House, to thwart the accomplishment of the object for which the joint committee was appointed; and, in lieu of the resolutions of the majority, submit the following resolutions:

*Resolved, first, That it is the power and duty of the House, conjointly with the Senate, to provide by law or other constitutional method a mode for fairly and truly ascertaining and properly counting the electoral vote of each State, so as to give effect to the choice of each State in the election of President and Vice-President.

truly ascertaining and property and give effect to the choice of each State in the election of President.

Resolved, second, That in the absence of legislative provision on the subject or authoritative direction from the Senate and House of Representatives, the President of the Senate, upon opening the certificates, declares and counts the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

WILLIAM LAWRENCE.

Mr. KASSON. Before the question is taken upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, I would ask whether it will exclude, if this motion prevails, the privileged report from the joint committee on the electoral vote? If they chose to take the floor at the close of the morning hour, would they have a right to it under this order?

The SPEAKER. That committee have a right to report at any time, yet they cannot take a gentleman from the floor when he has it upon unfinished business. The Chair would recognize the gentleman from Lowa [Mr. McDull as entitled to the floor.

Mr. KASSON. After the reading of the Journal?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. Wood, of New York; and it was agreed to, and the further consideration of the report was postponed until to-morrow.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I now call for the regular order of business, so that we may have a morning hour.

NEW YORK POST-OFFICE.

I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the select committee in reference to the investigation of the New York post-office. I ask that the report be laid before the House and recommitted, and ordered to be printed with the testimony.

Mr. HALE. I would inquire if this report covers anything except this post-office matter?

IN SENATE.

Wednesday, January 24, 1877.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved. CREDENTIALS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of WILLIAM WINDOM, elected by the Legislature of Minnesota a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1877; which were read and ordered to be filed.

He also presented the credentials of James E. Bailey, elected by the Legislature of Tennessee a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Andrew Johnson; which were read and ordered to be filed.

He also presented the credentials of Isham G. Harris, elected by the Legislature of Tennessee a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1877; which were read and ordered to be filed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 16th instant, correspondence with the diplomatic officers of the United States in Turkey, concerning the revolt in the Turkish provinces; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move in addition to the usual number of copies that five hundred extra copies of this correspondence be printed for the use of the State Department,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to print extra copies will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WALLACE presented a memorial, unanimously adopted by the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, praying for the passage of the electoral-count bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ALLISON presented the petition of J. T. Knapp and other citizens of Cedar Falls, Iowa, praying the repeal of the law imposing a tax on the deposits, circulation, and capital of national banks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William O. Newman, praying pay-ment of certain claims purchased by him for supplies and stores furnished the United States, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed; and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1128) to extend for two years the act establishing the board of commissioners of claims and the acts relating thereto, to report it favorably, with the recommendation that the bill do pass. I wish to say that I shall ask the Senate to-morrow morning, or as soon thereafter as I can, to proceed to the consideration of this bill, as I think it is important that it should be disposed of at an early day.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask leave, by unanimous consent, to introduce a bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of James T. Johnson, deceased. I will state to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. Windom,] who is present, that a bill now pending before his committee may accomplish the purpose of the bill I now present.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1184) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of James T. Johnson, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER IN THE GALLERIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Chair will lay before the Senate the resolutions of prior days. The resolution introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] will first be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SHERMAN on the 20th instant:

Resolved. That the Sergeant at Arms is hereby instructed to arrest, without further order, any person who by applause or dissent in the gallery shall disturb the order of the Senate, and hold him subject to the order of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator who introduced this resolution is not in the Chamber. If there be no objection, the Chair will put the question on concurring in the resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest that the resolution be passed over until the Senator from Ohio is in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa suggests that the resolution be passed over until the Senator from Ohio reaches the Chamber. The resolution will lie over.

GOVERNMENT OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following resolution, submitted by Mr. GORDON, December 29, 1876:

Resolved by the Senate, That the State government now existing in the State of South Carolina and represented by Wade Hampton as governor is the lawful government of said State; that it is republican in form, and that every assistance necessary to sustain its proper and lawful authority in said State should be given by the United States, when properly called upon for that purpose, to the end that the laws may be faithfully and promptly executed, life and property protected and defended, and all violators of law, State or national, brought to speedy punishment for their crimes.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator from Georgia is not in his seat to-day, and as the consideration of the resolution will necessarily lead to debate, I ask that it be passed over.

The PRESIDE: IT pro tempore. At the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia, the resolution will be passed over. This exhausts the resolutions of prior days. If there be no further morning business, the Chair will declare that the morning hour has expired. The morning hour has expired, and the Chair calls up the unfinished business.

COUNTING OF THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the bill the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] holds the floor.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from New York had not concluded his remarks at the time the Senate adjourned last night, and is entitled to the floor for the purpose of continuing. It has been suggested to me by several Senators, as I desire to speak on the bill, that I should proceed; but I shall have some delicacy in doing that in the absence of the Senator from New York, who may be here in the course of a very few moments; and perhaps it would be better to send for him to his committee-room, or otherwise. I should not like to be in-terrupted in the course of my remarks in order that another speech might be made, in case the Senator should come in, and at the same time I do not like to take advantage of the temporary absence of a Senator to interrupt his speech.

Mr. HAMLIN. I cannot doubt that the Senator from New York will be here very soon. I should hardly think it advisable for any other Senator to take the floor until after we have waited for a rea sonable time. I move that we take a recess for ten minutes and by that time the Senator from New York may be here.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of ten minutes

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of ten influtes the Senate re-assembled.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that the Senator from California be allowed to proceed in the absence of the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa suggests that the Senator from California be allowed to take the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course he is entitled to take it if he likes.

Mr. SARGENT. If that is the sense of the Senate, I will proceed, but I do it with great reluctance.

The Chair hears no objection, and but I do it with great reluctance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chathe Senator from California will proceed.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I have endeavored to bring my mind to an assent to the provisions of this bill, first, because I desire that a result may be worked out of this complication that will be that a result may be worked out of this complication that will be satisfactory to the whole country and, second, because I desire that equal and exact justice shall be done to every candidate who was voted for at the last presidential election, and to each of the parties who put those men forward. But I do not believe that every expedient which can be brought forward will bring about these results. I do not believe that this expedient will produce these results. I have been unable to find in the examination of this matter such proming of the results of the results of the results of the results. ise of satisfaction on the part of the people or such promise of justice to the candidates whose rights are involved or the people who have supported them, that I am confident that this unusual expedient is calculated for the emergency which it is intended to bridge

Our oaths forbid careless legislation where there are constitutional doubts as to our powers, and patriotism forbids doubtful expedients which may weaken fundamental powers and give rise to dangerous future complications. I am not satisfied that this bill will answer the hopes of its promoters. There are elements of weakness and indecision in it which should not characterize a bill designed to meet a crisis like this; and there are suspicions of unfairness about it-more than suspicions, almost grave certainties that there will be unfairness in the application of its provisions. Although the powers conferred by the bill seem ample—and it has been objected by my friend from Indiana [Mr. Morton] that the bill gives extraordinary powers in some directions, improper powers, powers to go behind the solemn decision of the States upon matters confided exclusively to them by the Constitution—yet in other directions the bill is not sufficiently ample or its provisions will not so work that some of the objections that ought to be considered by any tribunal deciding this question can be brought before the one formed by this bill or be entertained

I think that the constitution of this tribunal is unhappy if fairness is desired. The result depends upon one man. That man is entirely unknown except by some secret understanding, which may possibly have taken place and which would be in the nature of an intrigue if such understanding has been had. I propose to advert to these and other objections before I conclude what I have to say upon this bill, and more at length. I prefer, however, first to follow the argument which has been made by the supporters of the bill. Their arguments seem to be to answer two questions: first, is the bill constitutional? and, second, is it expedient? The terms of the Constitution and the construction placed upon it by its framers show conclusively to my mind that Congress was not to count the votes or to discriminate be tween returns. If it had been intended by those who framed this provision of the Constitution that this power should be lodged in the Congress, a very few words would have made that fixed and certain. The fact that they did not use such words shows that they did not intend that Congress should have such a dangerous power. I say dangerous power because by its exercise Congress may create the very exigency which gives them a pretense to elect both a President and Vice-President of the United States; and these become creatures of Congress, and not the creation of the people.

The Senator from New York [Mr. Conkling] argued at length to show that if it had been intended by the framers of the Constitution that the power to count the votes should reside in the President of the Senate that then apt words for that purpose would have been used, and it would have been said that he not only should open the certificates, but count the votes. The argument is just as strong that if it had been intended that Congress in joint convention or by the separate Houses should exercise this high power, then language would have been used to show that this was the intention, and it would have been provided that, after the certificates were opened, Congress

There are peculiar reasons why this power should not be lodged in Congress, why it should not count the votes in the sense of determining what are the votes and the effect that shall be given to the cermining what are the votes and the effect that shall be given to the certificates. One reason springs from the necessity that the Executive of this country shall be independent of the legislative power. A dependent Executive, an Executive depending upon the varying will of Congress, would be a pitiable object. The framers of the Constitution intended that that co-ordinate branch of the Government should be as independent of the legislative and the judicial as that the legislative should be superior to the dictation of the President or that the judicial authority should exercise its judgment freely and untrammeled by either of the other departments. But there are other reasons. There is liable to be, and is now, a variance between the two Houses of Congress leading to discordant and it may be tumultuous action. Our history has shown such instances. A tribunal, great in its numbers, conflicting in its interests, and liable to be swayed by passion, is to decide on at least a semi-judicial question. Who does not know that every wave of passion that sweeps over the people beats its surges high in these legislative halls? Who does not know that if questions like this can be submitted to the two Houses of Congress for their final arbitrament, questions of what the States of Congress for their final arbitrament, questions of what the States have done in this matter placed by the Constitution solely in their power, the decision is liable to be the result of bargain and intrigue? One of the most illustrious men that this country ever produced wore One of the most illustrious men that this country ever produced wore to his grave the stigma, or at least the suspicion, that he had taken high office at the hands of an Executive whom he had caused to be made such by his action in the House of Representatives. If such suspicions can attach to men of such eminent service as Henry Clay what man within the sound of my voice or within the Halls of either House of Congress can escape suspicions of this character? You give the temptation was given the compostunity for bargain and intrigue by the temptation, you give the opportunity for bargain and intrigue by submitting to the legislative power the opportunity to create the exigency under which its highest and farther functions may be oper-

The argument of the Senator from New York proceeded further upon the assumption that there were somewhere in the laws or in the Constitution some provisions or inferences which made it incompatible with the duties of the President of the Senate or the Vice-P dent of the United States occupying that position to count these votes, and that this same Constitution and laws, by some provisions not distinctly stated, necessarily devolved those powers upon the two Houses of Congress. I regret that the Senator was not able to finish his remarks last night, so that we might have had the benefit of reading them in the Record this morning. Relying upon my memory, it seems to me that one of the illustrations was that a writ naturally was served by a sheriff because the law provided sheriffs should serve writs; and by a sheriff because the law provided sheriffs should serve writs; and other illustrations of that character were given by him, some facetious and some otherwise. When it shall be shown that the Constitution or the laws have determined this matter, have so marked out the duties of the President or of Congress that this duty falls upon one side of the line or the other, as it does in the case of the sheriff, then such argument might be competent. All such illustrations have very little worth. They can be changed according to the fancy of the person who deals in them. I saw a somewhat witty illustration the other day alleged to have been given by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House, wherein it was said that upon persons being invited to a dinner, when it was provided that the bill of fare should be opened by the steward and then the dinner should be eaten, the implication necessarily was that the guests, not the steward, the implication necessarily was that the guests, not the steward, should eat the dinner. Now, that is all very funny; but suppose it was provided that at a concert a trombone should be delivered on the stage and the trombone should then be blown, would anybody say it was the audience who were to blow the trombone? [Laughter.] I say such illustrations may be varied according to the fancy of the person who deals in them. Illustrations at best are deceptive and all such illustrations are hardly worth the time taken up in the Senate to call the attention of Senators to them.

The earth hath bubbles, as the water has, And these are of them.

The power to determine with reference to these matters before the certificates reach the hands of the President of the Senate, before they are opened in the presence of the two Houses, is plainly fixed by the Constitution of the United States, and I have not found any citation from any authority, from the Constitution itself, or any commentator upon it, certainly none has been presented in this debate, which weakens the plain intendment of the Constitution in this part. ticular. Article second, section 1, of the Constitution provides that:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

There is the whole power of the appointment, of the modes in which their appointments shall be certified to the President of the Senate. The whole subject is exhausted in those few terse and comprehensive lines. It was intended that they should be solely and supremely within the power of the States themselves. I object to this bill because it proceeds upon the theory that a tribunal is to be formed partly composed of members of Congress and partly of judges of the Supreme Court who are to have the power to revise the action of the States, to go behind their certificates, to go to the bottom of the poly, which they must do provided their action is to have any effect what, which they must do provided their action is to have any effect what-ever. They are not only to determine whether a governor has certified to a certificate, whether the electors met at a particular time, whether those electors were elected, but in order that the latter branch of the inthose electors were elected, but in order that the latter branch of the inquiry may be effectual to the purposes their proceedings must be in the nature of a quowarranto and they must call the last man in any disputed State whose vote is challenged to ascertain whether that man voted as he is assumed to have voted by the action of the States in sending the certificates to the President of the Senate. This is the function, in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States, which it is assumed to assign to this tribunal, not to assign to Congress but to a mixed commission partaking of none of the elements of Congress. They are not even a committee of Congress made up exclusively of persons who are members of Congress, but intermixed with persons foreign entirely to these halls, who have no executive power whatever, and whom we have no right to make a committee of Congress. This power is confided in their hands and for these purposes and

This power is confided in their hands and for these purposes and with the result if possible that it may be found as a conclusion that there was no election by the States, no matter what these have certified to, that the House of Representatives may make the President of the United States and that the Senate may make the Vice-President dent, both creatures of legislative will.

The fathers of the Republic have not been silent upon the powers which they designed should be conferred upon the legislative body. They looked with extreme jealousy upon the encroachment of one department upon another. Some of them, notably James Madison, feared that there would be an encroachment upon the executive by the legislative power. He feared that even where there were cases not of doubtful construction even, that in moments of passion, or under strong prejudice or great temptation, the power of the executive might be invaded as well as of the judicial department.

You, sir, sitting in that chair to perform the function of opening the certificates and of counting the vote, belong to the executive department of this Government. It makes no difference that you took that place by virtue of the votes of the Senate of the United States, It makes no difference, as insisted by the Senator from New York that the votes which put you there may by a change place some one else in that position. While you occupy that position you do it as the Vice-President of the United States to all intents and purposes. as much so as though you were a Vice-President elected by the people, certainly as much so as if there being a failure to elect by the people the Senate of the United States had chosen a person as Vice-President of the United States. That which the fathers of the Republic feared I think is now taking place, that the Senate or Congress and experience to invest the shear exercise property. is endeavoring to invade the clear executive powers which are lodged in your hands under the Constitution of the United States.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the remarks of Mr.

Madison, found on pages 228 and 229 of the Federalist, wherein this distinction of powers between the legislative and the judicial departments is commented upon; and he, nearly contemporary with the adoption of the Constitution itself, points out the dangers which, in the operation of Congress, are liable to arise from legislative usurpation. He says:

tion. He says:

It is agreed on all sides that the powers properly belonging to one of the departments ought not be directly and completely administered by either of the other departments. It is equally evident that neither of them ought to possess, directly or indirectly, an overruling influence over the others in the administration of their respective powers. It will not be denied that power is of an encroaching nature, and that it ought to be effectually restrained from passing the limits assigned to it. After discriminating, therefore, in theory, the several classes of power, as they may in their nature be legislative, executive, or judiciary, the next and most difficult task is to provide some practical security for each against the invasion of the others. What this security ought to be is the great problem to be solved.

Will it be sufficient to mark with precision the boundaries of these departments in the constitution of the government, and to trust to these parchment barriers against the encroaching spirit of power! This is the security which appears to have been principally relied on by the compilers of most of the American constitutions. But experience assures us that the efficacy of the provision has been greatly overrated, and that some more adequate defense is indispensably necessary for the more feeble against the more powerful members of the Government. The legislative department is everywhere extending the sphere of its activity, and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex.

In the spirit of the description here given by Madison was the remark of the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] that you, sir, are a feeble folk, that you have no power to enforce your decrees. Congress can rifle State archives, it can send for persons and papers, it can make a law which will bind all others, and by virtue of this supreme and insolent power it can deprive you of your prerogative, although guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, because you have no Army at your back, because you have no sergeant-at-arms that you can send forth through the country, because your process does not run beyond your chair.

The founders of our republies have so much merit for the wisdom which they have displayed, that no task can be less pleasing than that of pointing out the errors into which they have fallen. A respect for truth, however, obliges us to remark, that they seem never for a moment to have turned their eyes from the danger to liberty, from the overgrown and all-grasping prerogative of an hereditary magistrate, supported and fortified by an hereditary branch of the legislative authority. They seem never to have recollected the danger from legislative usurpations, which by assembling all power in the same hands must lead to the same tyranny as is threatened by executive usurpations.

In a government where numerons and extensive prerogatives are placed in the hands of an hereditary monarch, the executive department is very justly regarded as the source of danger and watched with all the jealousy which a zeal for liberty ought to inspire. In a democracy, where a multitude of people exercise in person the legislative functions and are continually exposed by their incapacity for regular deliberation and concerted measures to the ambitious intrigues of their executive magistrates, tyranny may well be apprehended on some favorable emergency to start up in the same quarter. But in a representative republic, where the executive magistracy is carefully limited, both in the extent and the duration of its power, and where the legislative power is exercised by an assembly which is inspired by a supposed influence over the people, with an intreplid confidence in its own strength which is sufficiently numerous to feel all the passions which actuate a multitude; yet not so numerous as to be incapable of pursuing the objects of its passions, by means which reason prescribes, it is a gainst the enterprising ambition of this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy and exhaust all their precautions.

And yet that jealousy is to be suppressed, and we are told it is to be done to bridge over a present danger. We are to remit all precautions instead of exhausting them, and we are to place within the power of this tribunal, so beset by passion, so incapable by its Constitution as pointed out by Mr. Madison to clearly and fairly decide these constitutions this approach the second of the secon these questions, this supreme power where the principal benefit of the exercise of the power is to give them the great prerogative of selecting the rulers of the country for the next four years.

The legislative department derives a superiority in our governments from other circumstances. Its constitutional powers being at once more extensive and less susceptible of precise limits, it can, with the greater facility, mask, under complicated and indirect measures, the encroachments which it makes on the co-ordinate cated and indirect measures, the engineering at departments.

If Mr. Madison had had in his mind a bill like that pending at like the could not have used more apt words of

It is not unfrequently a question of real nicety in legislative bodies whether the operation of a particular measure will or will not extend beyond the legislative sphere. On the other side, the executive power being restrained within a narrow compass and being more simple in its nature, and the judiciary being described by land-marks still less uncertain, projects of usurpation by either of these departments would immediately betray and defeat themselves. Nor is this all; as the legislative department alone has access to the pockets of the people, and has in some constitutions full discretion, and in all a prevailing influence over the pecuniary rewards of those who fill the other departments, a dependence is thus created in the latter which gives still greater facility to encroachments of the former.

Now, it is proposed by this process, by this bill, to make the executive power the mere creature of Congress, for that is its effect, and therefore make its dependence during the whole term of its administration still more dependent on these, its creators.

Mr. Jefferson's opinions upon these matters were clearly expressed, and he shared the fear that was so ably stated by Mr. Madison. In his Notes on Virginia, page 195, he said:

All the powers of government, legislative, executive, and judiciary, result to the legislative body. The concentrating these in the same hands is precisely the definition of despotic government. It will be no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands, and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one.

And so, sir, four hundred despots would be as oppressive as one despot they fear, who sits in your chair.

despot they fear, who sits in your chair.

Let those who doubt it turn their eyes on the republic of Venice. As little will it avail us that they are chosen by ourselves. An elective despotism was not the government we fought for, but one which should not only be founded on free principles, but in which the powers of government should be so divided and balanced among several bodies of magistracy as that no one could transcend their legal limits without being effectually checked and restrained by the others. For this reason that convention which passed the ordinance of government laid its foundation on this basis, that the legislative, executive, and judiciary departments should be separate and distinct, so that no person should exercise the powers of more than one of them at the same time. But no barrier was provided between these several powers. The judiciary and executive members were left dependent on the legislative for their subsistence in office, and some of them for their continuance in it. If, therefore, the legislature assumes executive and judiciary powers, no opposition is likely to be made, nor, if made, can be effectual; because in that case they may put their proceedings into the form of an act of assembly, which will render them obligatory on the other branches. They have accordingly, in many instances, decided rights which should have been left to judiciary controversy; and the direction of the executive, during the whole time of their session, is becoming habitual and familiar.

I ask if this is not an apt description of the tendency of the bill

I ask if this is not an apt description of the tendency of the bill which we have before us at the present time? I should like to ask the serious attention of Senators who are acting I have no doubt conscientiously, as I claim to be, under an oath to support the Constitu-tion of the United States, whether a matter that should be left to judicial controversy is not here dragged in before the Congress of the United States and by it left to be determined by an arbitrary tri-

If it is said that the time that intervenes between the election in November and the meeting of the electoral college in December is not sufficient for the operation of a writ of quo warranto under the judicial power of the States and in the States themselves, so as to leave their certificates simply for the action of the President of the leave their certificates simply for the action of the President of the Senate of the United States, then this is the fault of the States themselves. The States can provide that remedy, and it is not for Congress to step in and usurp that function of the States. The Constitution says that they shall exercise and exhaust that power; that they shall determine the mode by which electors shall be appointed, and they shall take all proceedings necessary to inform the President of the Senate of their action. The remedy is ample and complete under the laws of every State in the Union, except it may be alleged that the time is too short. Then bring a wider form between the that the time is too short. Then bring a wider term between the meeting of the electors and their election in order that this power may be exercised in the States themselves, and not assume by Congress to decide a judicial question, if it is alleged that this is a judicial question requiring the intervention of judges of the Supreme Court in order to determine it.

He cites another case:

He cites another case:

The other State which I shall take for an example is Pennsylvania and the other authority the council of censors which assembled in the years 17:3 and 17:4. A part of the duty of this body, as marked out by the constitution, was "to inquire whether the Constitution had been preserved inviolate in every part, and whether the legislative and executive branches of government had performed their duty as guardians of the people, or assumed to themselves or exercised other or greater powers than they are entitled to by the constitution." In the execution of this trust the council were necessarily led to a comparison of both the legislative and executive proceedings, with the constitutional powers of these departments; and from the facts enumerated, and to the truth of most of which both sides in the council subscribed, it appears that the constitution had been flagrantly violated by the Legislature in a variety of important instances.

A great number of laws had been passed, violating, without any apparent necessity, the rule requiring that all bills of a public nature shall be previously printed for the consideration of the people; although this is one of the previously printed for the consideration against improper acts of the Legislature.

The constitutional trial by jury had been violated, and powers assumed which had not been delegated by the Constitution.

Executive powers had been usurped.

The salaries of the judges, which the Constitution expressly requires to be fixed, had been occasionally varied; and cases belonging to the judiciary department frequently drawn within legislative cognizance and determination.

I will not pursue these citations further, although they might be

I will not pursue these citations further, although they might be extended to any length and are most useful as showing how legislative power encroaches upon the executive and the judicial; how it continually arrogates to itself a power supreme in the state to the sacrifice of the co-ordinate departments of the Government, and to sacrifice of the co-ordinate departments of the Government, and to infringement of the rights and liberties of the people. The history of the world has shown that bodies springing from the people, assuming to exercise their power and to speak directly for them, have continually absorbed powers not intended by the constitution of the government that they should hold. The history of England shows that Parliament is now the supreme body and the House of Commons is the Parliament. The powers of the Crown have been reduced to a mere shadow. The original conflict between the House of Commons and the English Crown showed a weakness on the part of the Commons. They were often ruthlessly overruled, unfairly and illegally snubbed, and a powerful executive, the king or queen, placed the foot upon many prerogatives which would naturally, speaking from our light, belong to that body. But the conflict was unequal, and it light, belong to that body. But the conflict was unequal, and it might almost be said temporary. Parliament gained step by step until finally it enforced its demands upon the Crown and stripped it of nearly all its powers, so that for a long series of years the veto power has not been exercised by the Crown of Great Britain. The power has not been exercised by the Crown of Great Britain. The queen assents to eyery measure, and year after year at every session "the queen advises" or "the king advises," concurs, as to the measures which Parliament dictates and passes. They brought to bear upon the Crown that same power alluded to by Jefferson, the power to withhold supplies. They held the purse of the nation. When the king endeavored to do without Parliament and sought by extraordinary, improper measures to obtain supplies the effort failed and produced only tumults and sometimes revolutions. The recourse was necessarily to Parliament again. Parliament then came back with new and greater demands, and as the price of its supplies wrested one after another the prerogatives from the Crown until there is a mere shadow of kingly power in England. The monarch of England could well say, with Macbeth—

Upon my head they placed a fruitless crown, And put a barren scepter in my gripe.

Jefferson shows that this is the tendency in one of the free States of this Republic, the great State of Pennsylvania; that even in his time, when constitutions were fresh and might be supposed to be most sacred, most within the hearts of the people, the legislative power, true to its tendencies, was absorbing to itself all these powers, encroaching upon the judiciary and the executive departments. Therefore I say that this bill tends in a dangerous direction, stripping the executive—ay, and the judicial power—of their proper function, and, more grave than all, depriving the States of the exercise of a power given to them in express language by the Constitution of the United States, upon which there can be neither doubt nor dissenting comment.

As I remember the argument of the Senator from New York, he said that the power of the President of the Senate to count these votes rested upon two implications, and he therefore inferred that those implications should not be drawn, or, in other words, that that power cannot exist. Why, sir, if there be anything in an argument like that, I think it can be very well shown that the power of Congress to dispose of this matter rests not upon two implications, but gress to dispose of this matter rests not upon two implications, but upon four: First, upon their right to be present. Their right to be present at all rests upon an implication that, because the President might open and count in the presence of the two Houses, therefore they must be present. If it is in their presence, then they must be present and have the right to be there. Second, because they must be present for some particular purpose, Third, because they must be present for some particular purpose, therefore it is implied that that purpose is connected in some way with the counting of the electoral votes. Fourth, because it is supposed to be in some way connected with the count. nected in some way with the counting of the electoral votes. Fourth, because it is supposed to be in some way connected with the counting of the votes, therefore it is implied they have the power to count the votes. And a further implication arises out of this bill, that they not only have power to count the votes, but they have power to go behind the votes and the action of the States guaranteed by the Constitution. Here are implications at least four deep; and, taking the theory of this bill, they are piled up five deep; and it seems to me that it would be a natural and logical course to take that which implies the least implication, that which can be reached by the shortest and most direct course of reasoning.

Now, sir, instead of such frail reasoning as this—and all this reasoning from implication is sophistical—I venture to go to the language of the Constitution, and the contemporary construction of the fathers of the Republic. They have furnished direct evidence of their own understanding of their own language. In this matter he who runs may read; and it is necessary to refine away their language and deny their action in order to avoid the necessary conclusions that they intended that the occupant of that chair should discharge all the functions that were necessary to be discharged in this matter which had not before that time been discharged by the States under the Constitution, and that it should be in the mere presence of the Senate and House of Rep-

The language of the Constitution as originally submitted and ratified was as follows:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

The Madison Papers, volume 3, page 1486, show that this clause was originally reported September 4, 1787, as follows:

The President of the Senate shall, in that House, open the certificates, and the otes shall then and there be counted.

September 6 this clause was considered by the convention, and, on several motions, the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" were inserted after the word "counted," &c. Ibid, page 1509.)

The clause, therefore, as deliberately adopted, was intended to read, and did read:

The President of the Senate shall, in that House, open the certificates, and the votes shall be then and there counted in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives.

On the 9th September the proposed constitution, with the amendments as made by the convention, were submitted to a committee on grammatical revision, whose duties were solely to redraft the Constitution as amended, correct clerical errors, and give it literary polish, without changing the obvious meaning.

September 12 that committee reported the redraft of that instrument, and, in the process of condensing and polishing, the above clause was reported as it stands to-day, namely:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

Here is a plain statement of construction on the part of Hamilton and Madison and others of the revising committee; for they were members of the committee. They said, by the very report of that clause now existing in the Constitution, and the convention itself by subsequently adopting it said, that its meaning was the same substantially as that of the clause they had adopted. In other words, all the framers of the Constitution when they finally placed in the all the framers of the Constitution when they finally placed in the Constitution the words, "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted," intended them to mean what they had with great deliberation agreed on, namely, "The President of the Senate shall open the certificates, and the votes shall be then and there counted in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives," making the Senate and the House of Representatives mere spectators of the proceedings that then and there took place. No language more apt could be devised for that purpose; and however gentlemen may argue from policy, and however they may argue that the framers of the Constitution could not have designed a result like that, nevertheless they used language when they deliberately passed upon each word and re-arranged sentences by which they said that this was all to be done in the mere presence of the Senate and House of Representatives. They took no means to make an organized body of "the Senate and House of Representa-tives." An implication might possibly arise in the minds of these tives." An implication might possibly arise in the minds of these gentlemen who are so fond of implications that these were first to be opened and the result to be declared in the Senate, and that then the opened and the result to be declared in the Senate, and that then the same process should be gone through in the House of Representatives, or first in the House of Representatives and afterward in the Senate. They did not provide otherwise than by implication that these bodies should be together at all. It was to be in their presence; naturally, therefore, they were to assemble. But how? Simply as witnesses of the proceedings that were going on. Not a single function was devolved on either House, and the Constitution does not recognize them in a joint capacity, certainly not for the purpose of counting the electoral votes, certainly not to perform any functions whatever except as witnesses; and if there has been since that time an infringement upon this plain meaning of the Constitution of the United States by upon this plain meaning of the Constitution of the United States by gradual steps of encroachment, by assuming first a power to examine, by afterward passing joint rules which gave to a single House the power to disfranchise a State, which has been repudiated by the Senpower to disfranchise a State, which has been repudiated by the Senate as monstrous during its present session; if any of these steps of legislative encroachment has taken place, it does not necessarily obscure the clear light of the Constitution upon this matter; and no argument of mere expediency can destroy the fundamental principles of the Constitution. Else we are adrift upon a boundless sea, we have no guide for us in the future, and those who come after us may well curse their fathers who broke away from the barriers of the Constitution and launched out in directions of crude experiment when the Constitution itself and a long course of construction gave a suffi-

As if to emphasize precisely what they meant, to place the proper construction of the clause beyond the shadow of a doubt, the same re-vising committee the very next day introduced a resolution, and the

*Resolved*, That it is the opinion of this convention that as soon as the conventions of nine States shall have ratified this Constitution, the United States, in Congress assembled, should fix a day on which electors should be appointed by the States which shall have ratified the same, and a day on which the electors should assemble to vote for the President, and the time and place for commencing proceedings under this Constitution. That after such publication the electors should be appointed and the Senators and Representatives elected. That the electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of the President, and should transmit their votes, certified, signed, scaled, and directed, as the Constitution requires, to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled; that the Senators and Representatives should convenie at the time and place assigned; that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President; and that after he shall be chosen the Congress, together with the President, should without delay proceed to execute this Constitution.

The Senator from New York says that these votes were not required to be sent to the President of the Senate but to the Secretary of the Confederation. It is most true. There was, at the time of writing this order or resolution, no President of the Senate to whom these documents could be sent. They were to the Secretary of the Senate documents could be sent. They were to the Secretary of the Senate who was required—

Mr. CONKLING. No.
Mr. SARGENT. The Secretary of the Confederation, who was required himself to deliver them to the presiding officer of this body who should thereafter be appointed. That officer was required to receive them in the same manner that he now is required to receive them, and to receive papers made up by illegal bodies, but to receive certificates coming from States, under the authority of the States, under the sanction of the clause of the Constitution which I have read, the duty of receiving these was lodged in the presiding officer of this body, and what was his duty with reference to them? Said the committee on revision, who when they made the revision of that clause changed the order of its language, but who by the obligations of their position were not to change its meaning, and who knew therefore just what they meant—they said that this presiding officer, appointed in the manner in which we now appoint one, "should be appointed for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting appointed for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President."

That embraces within its scope all the duties which were confided to any officer or any person or any body. He was not only to receive, not only to open, not only to count; but to receive, open, and count the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. Here was contemporary construction of the highest value, materials which must not be overlooked by Senators who are conscientiously looking for the meaning of the Constitution, springing from the very bosom of the constitutional convention itself by its highest committee, chosen from men in whose discretion and knowledge there was peculiar confidence reposed, for they had been made the committee of revision, and in their hands, almost without examination, so far as the debates show, was confided and by them was executed the power of arranging the Constitution so as to give effect to the meaning of its framers and at the same time polishing its style so that there might be no verbal inaccuracies therein. The convention ratified this action coming from this committee so created, and made this an ordinance accompanying the Constitution to bind Congress and prescribe the powers of the presiding officer.

But the Senator from New York sees the fatal force of this and, therefore, he avoids it by saying—eloquent as he always is in figures—that here was a ship to be launched, and it was not of importance whether it should be launched by means of its sails or by some exwhether it should be launched by means of its sails or by some exterior power or by the machinery within it. On the contrary, all the analogies named in this resolution are those which are named in the Constitution itself. The two Houses are to assemble. The Senator says that this was not necessarily in the presence of the two Houses as the Constitution itself requires, and yet this very resolution requires Congress to be in session on that day. If he can draw implications so rapidly I should like to ask, if Congress is required to be in session on that day is so required by the resolution and the Sanata is reon that day, is so required by the resolution, and the Senate is required to select its presiding officer for this purpose, does not a simple, clear implication arise that this function was to be performed in their presence? But if in the idea of the framers of that order the presence of the two Houses while this act was being performed was of such slight importance that it was not even enjoined upon them, of such slight importance that it was not even enjoined upon them, whence now springs its importance? Ay, what magnifies it into a necessity, not only of being present, but that they shall usurp all power in the matter, go behind its certificates of States, depose the President from any function except that which might as well be performed by the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives; that is to say, become a common carrier or messenger to deliver them into the hands of tellers appointed by these ger to

The two Houses, as I say, were to assemble. The President of the Senate is the Deus ex machina by this resolution. He receives the votes, receives them from the officer in whose temporary custody they are. He opens the certificates and he counts the votes. Is there votes, receives them from the officer in whose temporary custody they are. He opens the certificates and he counts the votes. Is there any doubt what the framers of the Constitution meant under such a conspicuous example? Why should they not follow closely the analogies of the Constitution? Why not closely follow the provisions, as they did, of that instrument which they were to launch out for the government of this people for all time? Was it not necessary that it should be properly launched? The Constitution was formed in no fair weather. It was necessary that the ship should not only be staunchly built, but that it should leave its ways safely in order that it might combat the waves of passion and prejudice which then surged in the country. Various were the opinions of statesmen as to its provisions; varying were the degrees of friendship for it in the different States, at that very time it not being determined whether it would be ratified at all. But, says the Senator from New York, the functions which this man performed at that time, John Langdon, who was elected President of the Senate, as the Senate itself said, "for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes," performed only a formal duty; George Washington was unanimously elected. Ay, sir, but he was not unanimously elected or otherwise elected at the time that the original convention promulgated that order. It was not yet known which of the chieftains who had distinguished themselves in the way of the Recolution might even to the frent end box. not yet known which of the chieftains who had distinguished them-selves in the war of the Revolution might come to the front, and how much force there might be used in order to gain that glittering prize, so eloquently described by the Senator from New York. The surges were still beating and all was uncertainty, and our fathers looked out upon a dark and rainy sea. They could not penetrate the future. No man living at that day could tell that the Constitution would be ratified and safely placed in operation. At the time when this ordinance was promulgated it was uncertain whether George Washington or any other man would be President of the United States. These high and delicate duties were put exclusively in the hands of the President of the Senate. That is admitted by the argument of the Senator from New York, who seeks to belittle them on the ground that the action was merely formal, and, therefore, it mattered not whether they were put in his hands or those of some one else. It matters to the argument in whose hands they were put, because that man to whom this power was intrusted by the framers of the Conso eloquently described by the Senator from New York. The surges man to whom this power was intrusted by the framers of the Constitution, by logical reasoning, was the man that they designed should exercise those powers in all time, until the Constitution should be amended.

I contend that this resolve of that convention was a fair interpretation of this clause of the Constitution, and conferred the powers on the presiding officer that the Constitution, and the rest that the First Congress met. John Langdon, who had been a member and a prominent one of the constitutional convention, was chosen the President of the Senate contemplated by that resolution. He was elected the Presiding officer; and the Senate made the order which I will read. Now the Constitution was launched; now the President was elected; now the ship was moving by the machinery within itself, again to borrow the illustration of the Senator from New York, and the Senator ate ordered-

That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States.

Was that language carelessly used? Does any Senator, a member of this body in 1877, say that the Senate was careless in the use of language in 1789; did not know the purport of the messages which it sent to the House of Representatives, and that when it said in plain and unequivocal terms that an officer had been elected to open the certificates and "count the votes" it did not mean to "count the votes," or did not understand the language it did use? And yet such reserving as that is preserved to do ever with the sets and language. reasoning as that is necessary to do away with the acts and language of the framers of the Constitution and of the Senate at that day And they further say:

And that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed in the presence of the House to discharge that duty.

"What duty?" says the Senator from New York. He says the duty "What duty?" says the Senator from New York. He says the duty which the resolution says the President of the Senate is to do. I should like to ask if that is fair reasoning? I would like to say, had I not so much respect for the Senator's intellect, that it is absurd. What is the "duty?" The duty enjoined upon them by the Constitution was to be present; and they notified the House that they were ready to perform the duty devolved on them. They had previously will that they had released a President to every account the votes. said that they had selected a President to open and count the votes, and it would be an absurdity to say in the same resolution that they assumed by an implication that they were to do a duty which they had enjoined on the President.

That was all the duty devolved on their members, to make a list of votes. It was a mere clerical duty. They could just as well have devolved it on Mr. Otis, the Secretary of the Senate, to make this list, to make up a table. That is all that was done—(and the table follows in this proceeding,) to tabulate the vote, to be the pen of the presiding officer; his mind, under the Constitution, being the directing power—"to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared." Further proceeding in this process of refining, the Senator from New York says the word "declare" means "deliver." I beg to differ respectfully with the Senator in any such construction.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not say that any more than I said the other That was all the duty devolved on their members, to make a list

Mr. CONKLING. I did not say that any more than I said the other

Mr. CONKLING. I did not say that any more than I said the other thing which the Senator ascribes to me.

Mr. SARGENT. I am quite unfortunate in not being able to read the Senator's speech this morning in print. I assure him that I do not desire to do him injustice. What I say I shall leave unchanged in the RECORD; and, if I find that I have done him injustice, I will take early opportunity here to do him justice.

Mr. CONKLING. I will say to the Senator that my remark was this, that "declare" there, as I supposed, meant "read" or "report." I said nothing about "deliver."

Mr. SARGENT. Very well, the argument is not stronger in that respect; a part of the "declaration" of course is to read the votes. But that duty is devolved upon the President by the very terms of this resolution. He is to open the certificates and count the votes; and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] said that counting the votes necessarily implied that he was to open them; and counting them would necessarily imply that he was to read them. So that the argument of the Senator from New York would not be stronger even had I not made the misconception of his language which he even had I not made the misconception of his language which he thinks I did. They are simply to make a list of the votes:

Submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their mem bers for the like purpose.

That is, sitting at a table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared. Declared by whom? Declared by the tellers? Read by the tellers? Not at all, but declared to them. And the Senate— Ordered, That Mr. PATERSON be a teller on the part of the Senate

The description in the minutes of that which took place carries out the same idea:

The Speaker and the House of Representatives attended in the Senate Chamber, and the President elected for the purpose of counting the votes declared the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, which were as follows.

And then comes the tabulated list made out by the tellers. Did anybody dissent? Did any of these Senators, many of whom had been members of the constitutional convention, arise and object that the order which I first read was unconstitutional? Did any one say that the President of the Senate had not this power which the minutes I have read recite he exercised? On the contrary, the action of the Senate and the description of their proceedings all concur in the same idea that this power was lodged by the Constitution in the hands of the presiding officer.

Now, the certificate, completing the provisions under this first election, tersely and clearly shows the powers that were exercised by John Langdon, the presiding officer of the Senate. He certifies:

John Langdon, the presiding officer of the Senate. He certines:

Be it known that, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America being convened in the city and State of New York the sixth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, the underwritten, appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes of the electors, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and for a Vice-President; by which it appears that George Washington, esq., was unanimously elected, agreeably to the Constitution, to the office of President of the United States of America.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal.

JOHN LANGDON.

And a certificate in the same form was made out for the Vice-President. In other words, the Constitution provided that he should open the certificates, and the votes should then be counted. The ordinance of the convention provided that a presiding officer should be elected by the Senate for the sole duty of receiving, opening, and counting the votes. The Senate took order, and by its message informed the House of Representatives that it had elected an officer for these specific purposes, these ample purposes, covering the whole ground, and that it had appointed a teller to make a list of the votes as they should be declared. Their minutes show that this was exactly performed, all being done by the President of the Senate except the mere tabulating, the mere clerical duty. Then follows the certificate of John Langdon, that officer certifying that he had performed these very duties; and no question was raised by the fathers of the Republic who sat in that Senate or those who were in the House of Representatives, but that everything was regular and in order and strictly in accordance with the Constitution of the United States.

Now, I ask Senators whether the same procedure is not objected to to-day; if they do not object that the President of the Senate has not the power to receive, to open, and to count the votes, and if they would be willing to send a message to the House of Representatives not the power to receive, to open, and to count the votes, and if they would be willing to send a message to the House of Representatives which should declare that the Senate is now ready to sit in the presence of their presiding officer while he should open all the certificates and count all the votes and needed their presence, and that they should appoint tellers to do like the teller of the Senate, make a list of the votes as they should be declared? There is the test of the whole matter. But you would drift away from that; you would refine all this away; you would give the word "count" meanings to suit the varying shades of your argument. In one case the word "count" means determination, discrimination between returns, going back of the electoral certificates; in another case, according to the arguments of these gentlemen, "count" means merely enumeration, that which may be done by a clerk, and not carrying with it any power of discrimination whatever. Why, sir, here were embraced the very word "count" and the very word "open" in the same sentence looking to the same purpose and no other function discharged by any other party whatever. If there is anything in contemporary construction, here is an example of the very highest value, and it cannot be overlooked. I say for myself that it bears upon my own oath and conscience.

I do not see how plainer language could be used to recognize the duty imposed on and performed by the President of the Senate. I do not see how the House and Senate could have been more passive spectators than they were at the scene which then took place. They themselves so arranged the matters that they should be mere passive spectators. The original Congress well understood that in joint convention they had no organized existence; and that idea was carried down through Congresses to the very last, and it was seen that there was no cohesion original Congress well understood that in joint convention they had no organized existence; and that idea was carried down through Congresses to the very last, and it was seen that there was no cohesion between the two Houses of Congress when they met to act on this matter of the electoral votes. Eminent members of the House of Representatives made a point upon this distinction, and when they were assembled in the same room would address the Speaker of the House of Representatives instead of the President of the Senate, and Senators would address themselves only to the President of the Senate; and it was understood by these men, so explained in their debates, that they considered that the House and Senate were separate Houses in session and were not a joint body. So far as this was concerned in session and were not a joint body. So far as this was concerned they were mere passive spectators. They had provided the clerical assistance necessary to enable the President of the Senate to carry out his high function. As this commission by this bill is empowered to employ clerks to act as their agents in writing out their opinions, if opinions they may have, their distinctions, their judgments, so tellers were appointed by the House of Representatives to make out a tabulated list of the votes as they were declared—declared to them—giving them no power otherwise to interfere; and neither House attempted it.

This renders the chain of evidence complete as to the meaning of the electoral-count clause in the Constitution, as understood by the framers themselves of that charter of our liberties. To summarize: The revising committee, and the convention of the fathers itself, agreed that the clause as finally adopted was the same in essence and substance as that which they first adopted, and by resolution declared that the essence and substance thereof was, and is, not merely the "receiving," not merely the "opening," not merely the "counting,"

"receiving," not merely the "opening," not merely the "counting," but the "receiving, opening, and counting the votes" by the President of the Senate "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives." And in adopting and signing the Constitution, the States adopted that full, clear, and undeniable meaning.

For a long series of years this power was uninterruptedly exercised by the President of the Senate. The two Houses appointed tellers to assist him in tabulating, but they did not otherwise interfere. At the second election, in 1793, the joint committee of the two Houses reported a resolution, which was agreed to in each House, which resolution declared the functions of the tellers to be "to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared," for the use of the Vice-President. the votes as they shall be declared," for the use of the Vice-President. The declaration of what were votes, and what was to be counted, was left to the President of the Senate, and merely clerical labor, such labor as might be performed by the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, was confided to the tellers. Neither House by itself, or through its tellers, interfered with the discharge of the duty of the President of the Senate of opening and counting the votes. The message of the Senate to the House on that occasion conforms strictly to this idea.

The Constitution was now launched. It was working by its arms

The Constitution was now launched. It was working by its own machinery. The Senate message corresponded in all its terms with the order of the old convention. It may be useful to call attention briefly to this order as showing that at the second election, fours years removed from the first, still further removed from the constitutional convention, the Senate and House of Representatives clearly understood that the original interpretation and practice at the first election was regular and constitutional. The message sent by the Senate to the House of Representatives, through Mr. Otis, their Secretary, was:

I am also directed to inform the House that a President of the Senate is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready in the Senate Chamber to attend with this House on that occasion.

The House assented to this idea, for it resolved-

That Mr. Speaker, attended by the House, do now withdraw to the Senate Chamber, for the purpose expressed in the said message.

† The purpose expressed was that the presiding officer should open the certificates and count the votes of the several States, functions still entirely lodged in his hands. It is true, probably, that in following closely the precedent of the first election the Secretary of the ing closely the precedent of the first election the Secretary of the Senate in his report made an error of supposing that the presiding officer at that time was elected for a special duty. John Adams was the presiding officer of the Senate, and he discharged the functions of the place, as he certified, of opening the certificates and counting the votes; but the material part of the message is not that which refers to the personality of the presiding officer, but that which declares that he was to act in the counting of the votes.

The proceedings at the third election were the same. The tellers were to sit at the table, as at the first and second elections, and make

The proceedings at the third election were the same. The tellers were to sit at the table, as at the first and second elections, and make a list of votes declared. The certificates authorized by the two Houses recognized that the counting was by the Vice-President.

At the fourth election the resolutions still more clearly expressed the fact that the function of the House was to be present only, but the usual tellers were appointed to make a list. This is their resolution, and certainly the Constitution was well launched by this time, propelled by powers within itself, no longer a question whether some outside power should give it a push, as was implied in the figure of the Senator from New York, it was acting by its own vigor, and Congress had become experienced in its duties and there had been discussions upon these very questions; a bill brought forward with regard to settling contested elections, and both Houses were familiar with all considerations arising out of them. If there was at that time, or had been suggested in debate, any doubt of the power of the President of the Senate to count the certificates regularly sent up by the States, it is not found in any of these debates, and it is not found in any of the subsequent orders made by the Senate or the House. In 1801 the Senate resolved:

That the Senate will be ready to receive the House of Representatives in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock, for the purpose of—

What? Counting the votes? Not at all-for the purpose of being present at the opening and counting the votes for President of the United States.

That is all. This comes even so late that it can hardly be called contemporary construction. It had become incrusted into usage. It was the mere presence of the Senate and House of Representatives at the counting of the votes; and this idea so distinctly stated up to this point in the resolution obviously was not considered by its authors to be modified by the further provision.

† That one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate to make a list of the votes for President of the United States as they shall be declared, and that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, &c.

· This was all the function they assumed to have in the matter, and the power of the President of the Senate remained unchanged and was the power of the President of the Senate remained unchanged and was exercised unchanged and unquestioned up to 1803-'04, when a notable event took place in the history of this country. The twelfth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was submitted for the ratification of the people of the United States, and its design was to correct errors and supply deficiencies in the casting, reception, and counting of the electoral votes, or, in other words, any deficiencies which had been revealed connected with that subject.

† The Constitution before had provided that the President of the Senate should receive the certificates, should open them, and that they should then be counted. Contemporary and subsequent construction, down to 1803-'04, (for I have read the proceedings at every session down to that time,) at every election had recognized this power as existing in the President of the Senate; and if it was an unconstitutional assumption on his part, if, in the judgment of Congress or the people, the President of the Senate should not exercise that high function, this was the time to modify that provision and to use language which should assert that this power which, by disuse, Congress has lost, and which the original Constitution intended it should have. On the contrary, while modifying the Constitution by the twelfth has lost, and which the original Constitution intended it should have. On the contrary, while modifying the Constitution by the twelfth amendment in many other particulars in regard to the electoral votes, it leaves that language unchanged. The President of the Senate, by the twelfth article of amendment, is still to receive the certificates, to open them in the presence of the two Houses, and the votes are to be counted. How counted I have shown by the practice up to that time. It was considered a good argument in this Hall a few months ago that England before the adoption of our Constitution had certain forms of procedure, and those were in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, and that therefore it was legitimate and right to interpret the Constitution by reference to those forms of procedure. Here pret the Constitution by reference to those forms of procedure. Here we have forms of procedure under the Constitution itself, the original Constitution, unvarying from the time the convention formed it first, expressed in their ordinance and then at each successive election of President of the United States down to the time they amended the President of the United States down to the time they amended the Constitution; and if they did not amend the Constitution in this particular and left those forms of procedure to interpret it, I ask who can say that it is not right and legitimate for us, whether we are not bound by high obligations to look to that precedent practice in order to determine what they intended by the language which they again re-enacted in the Constitution of the United States?

Not only is this argument sound, not only does it go to the very root of the matter: but you will find for years and years, from Ham-

Not only is this argument sound, not only does it go to the very root of the matter; but you will find for years and years, from Hamilton to Hamlin, through a long course of illustrious statesmen, through federalists and whigs and republicans, through democrats from Jefferson to Andrew Johnson, the power was denied to exist in the Houses of Congress in this matter; and you will further find that during all that time it was held that the President of the Senate could open and count the votes, if there is any reliance to be placed on the records of Congress and messages passing between the two bodies. It was left for modern innovation to devise new methods to put this thing upon the shifting sands of expediency instead of upon the firm basis of constitutional law. That has been of recent time, by assumption of power on the part of the legislative branch, by gaining inch by inch upon the powers of the executive and the judicial department; and those recent constructions or practices are scarcely worth the weight of a hair as against the practices and constructions of the framers of the instrument and those who served in these Halls who had formerly served in the constitutional convention and gave their voice and counsel and their action, ay, their pen in framing resolutions and orders to interpret the Constitution and carry out its provisions

In the debates which arose upon the bill which was rejected or fell between the two Houses, providing that this power should be lodged in the two Houses of Congress, not even divided into a partnership with the members of the Supreme Court, but in fact conferred on committees of the two Houses, which might in some sense be considered the Houses themselves or their organs, those who sat in the constitutional convention were not silent, and they denounced such a scheme. It was Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, one of the framers, who stood in this body in 1800 and said:

Knowing that it was the intention of the Constitution to make the President completely independent of the Federal Legislature, I well remember it was the object, as it is at present—not only the spirit, but the letter of that instrument—to give to Congress no interference in or control over the election of a President.

Congress no interference in or control over the election of a President.

Does this bill give to Congress no control or interference in the election of a President? There is one contingency where it is possible that this bill will give to Congress no control over the election of President, and I will endeavor to advert to that before I conclude, but the theory of the bill is that it gives this control directly and conclusively to Congress. He says further:

conclusively to Congress. He says further:

They well knew that to give to the members of Congress a right to give votes in this election or to decide upon them when given was to destroy the independence of the Executive and make him the creature of the Legislature.

It never was intended nor could it have been safe in the Constitution to have given to Congress thus assembled in convention the right to object to any vote, or even to question whether they were constitutionally or properly given. This right of determining on the manner in which the electors shall vote, the inquiry into the qualifications, and the guards that are necessary to prevent disqualitied or improper men voting and to insure the votes being legally given, rests and is exclusively vested in the State Legislatures. If it is necessary to have guards against improper elections of electors and to institute tribunals to inquire into their qualifications, with the State Legislatures, and with them alone, rests the power to institute them, and they must exercise it. To give to Congress, even when assembled in convention, a right to reject or admit the votes of States would have been so gross and dangerous an absurdity as the framers of the Constitution never could have been guilty of. How could they expect that in deciding on the election of a President, particularly where such election was strongly contested, party spirit would not prevail and govern every decision? Did they not know how easy it was to raise objections against the votes of particular elections, and that in electroning upon these it was more than probable the members would recollect their sides, their favorite candidate, and sometimes their own interests?

O! says the Senator from Vermont, in this era of the millennium,

O! says the Senator from Vermont, in this era of the millennium, this happy time which is come, members elected to this commission from the House of Representatives for political proclivities and members elected by the Senate to counterbalance those political proclivities are to forget their party zeal; they are to act in harmony. The lion and the lamb are to lie down together. We are to have an era of peace and good feeling, where each will hasten to yield up his convictions. That very theory which he advances in support of the bill shows the absurdity of its provisions, and they are strongly shown by this extract from Pinckney. He further said:

Or must they not have supposed that in putting the ultimate and final decision of the electors in Congress, who were to decide irrevocably and without appeal, they would render the President their creature and prevent his assuming and exercising that independence in the performance of his duties upon which the safety and honor of the Government must forever rest!

Mr. HAMLIN. If agreeable to the Senator from California, I should O! says the Senator from Vermont, in this era of the millennium,

Mr. HAMLIN. If agreeable to the Senator from California, I should like to call his attention to a precedent which I think of very considerable importance in connection with that very part of the subject upon which he is now treating.

Mr. SARGENT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HAMLIN. I then call the attention of the Senator and the Senate to the precedent which is furnished to this body in the canvass of the vote in 1801. I refer to the vote of Georgia. I hold the returns in my hand. From the very condition of things when that vote was presented to the two Houses in convention, or by whatever form you may denominate the body, the decision that that vote should be counted must have necessarily been made by Thomas Jefferson. I can find no record of any objections being made to the counting of this vote. There is a tradition which comes down to us that the tellers returned it to Mr. Jefferson and that Mr. Jefferson in turn handed it back to the tellers and declared that the vote was to be counted; that that was his decision. That the transaction as it took place corroborates essentially that tradition I think is established beyond every doubt when that return is examined and the fact known that it was counted. No record of any question raised at the time can be found. That return is addressed to Thomas Jefferson, the Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate. There is no certificate upon it that it contains the votes given in the State of Georgia for President at that election. I turn on the back of the letter and I find this language:

We do certify the within to contain the votes of us, the electors on behalf of the State of Georgia, for a President and Vice-President of the United States.

JOHN MORRISON.

DENNIS SMELT.

HENRY GRAYBILL.

DAVID BLACKSHEAR.

I then open the return and I read:

GEORGIA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, Louisville, December 3, 1800.

List of voters and electors on behalf of the State of Georgia, authorized to vote for a President and Vice-President of the United States under the Constitution and an act passed and approved March 1, 1792, entitled, "An act relative to the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President in case of vacancies in the offices both of President and Vice-President."

General John Morrison, of Burke.

Dennis Smelt, of Richmond.

Henry Graybill, of Hancock.

David Blackshear, of Washington.

Certified to be a true list of the electors of Georgia, under the direction of the Legislature of that State.

Witness my hand and the executive seal of the State, at Louisville, the day and year above mentioned.

JAS. JACKSON. Governor.

Countersigned by the secretary of state.

Now, sir, I turn to find what was the vote given by the State, and there, upon that return headed on the left hand of the column, is the name of Thomas Jefferson. Directly opposite to it is the name of Aaron Burr. Following that return appears to be the names—I am not quite certain whether they are all in one handwriting or not, but I will assume they are not—of these electors. Under the name of Thomas Jefferson are the names of these four electors; under the name of Aaron Burr on the right of that are the names of these four There is no certificate that they met and balloted. There electors. There is no certificate that they met and balloted. There is no certificate that there was a vote given for anybody for President, as that was all that was required at the time. Consequently that paper, when presented, I affirm, showed upon its face nothing that could enable the body clearly and distinctly to determine that any votes were given for anybody. Clearly they did not comply with the Constitution where it says that the electors shall vote by ballot. There is no such declaration here. That is all there is on it. That the vote was counted is shown by the records. How could it be counted says on the decision of him in whose custody that vote was? counted save on the decision of him in whose custody that vote was ? That vote was in the custody of the President of the Senate. It was neither in the custody of the House or of the Senate; and these electoral votes never are in the possession of either the House or the Senate. How they are to count votes of which they are never in possession. sion has been a mystery that no gentleman has solved within my

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from California will allow me to add a word to what the Senator from Maine has stated, I might elucidate the paper he mentions. If the Senator from Maine will take the pains, as I have no doubt he has, to read the contemporaneous history of that event, he will see it stated substantially in this wise by those who were present and observed the ceremony, or whatever you call it, on that occasion: That Mr. Jefferson opened that paper, unsealed it, and handed it down to the tellers, who examined it, en-you can be, on that occasion: Inta air. Jenerson opened that paper, unsealed it, and handed it down to the tellers, who examined it, entered the number of votes for Georgia in the proper column, and passed it again up to Mr. Jefferson, who then declared that the State of Georgia had voted so many votes so, and so many votes so, without any observation, or question, or discussion, or decision of anything. I think I am correct in my recollection of the history of those proceedings in what I have stated.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator is correct. I have examined the papers and my recollection corroborates his entirely. I do not think, however, that it changes the fact that the Vice-President at that time did actually decide this question as a question of both right and power. Mr. SARGENT. At the election where that incident took place there were 63 votes for Thomas Jefferson and 63 for Aaron Burr. There was no choice by the people and it was well known by both Houses that there was no choice by the people, because there was an attempt by means of resolutions passing between the two Houses to come to some conclusion in that contingency, and the House itself was seeking to regulate the proceedings that it should take on being notified that there was no choice by the people. That occurrence gives additional significance to the fact that the decision then and there made was by the President of the Senate who opened and examined this paper and passed it to the tellers; who tabulated it, and then passed it back as usual.

The Senator from New York said that the President of the Senate in discharging his duties need not pronounce a single word. That is most true; and there was an instance in that historical case where the President of the Senate examined a paper with its defects patent upon its face, with the rapid operation of the mind of Thomas Jefferson, saw exactly its bearing, its legality or illegality, decided that that should be counted, and passed it to the tellers who were sitting at that desk for the simple purpose of making out a list, as the resolution of the Senate, concurred in by the House, directed, of the votes as they should be declared. By that act he declared that vote. It was the decision of his mind, a decision reached under the Constitution and reached under circumstances where, if ever, there might be supposed to be a jealous watchfulness on the part of both the Senate and the House to see that every proper vote was counted, and that no improper votes were counted, it was then when an apprehended tie in the vote was anticipated.

I was calling attention to the observations of Mr. Pinckney, a member of the constitutional convention, made upon this floor upon a subject somewhat kindred to that which now engrosses the attention of the Senate. I have shown how clear and express he was, not merely in the statement of his opinion on a given state of facts, but his recollection of the spirit of the constitutional convention, and their anxious desire to shield the executive from encroachments by the legislative power, to hedge around the legislative power from having any decision whatever as to the character of electoral votes, or the manner in which they should be disposed of, received, or rejected; because it would devolve upon them, if they exercised that power selfishly, as he holds that legislative bodies will exercise powers, the choice of a President of the United States who would not be the creation of the people, but the creature of the legislative power. It was less than twelve months since that a worthy bearer of that honored name, my honored friend from Maryland, [Mr. Whyte,] here, from his place in the Senate, denied that this power resided in Congress, and contended for the power in the hands of the President of the Senate as constitutional and necessary to the protection of popular rights.

One other observation with reference to the constitutionality of this bill and I leave that part of my subject. decision whatever as to the character of electoral votes or the manner

this bill and I leave that part of my subject.

The Senator from New York, in remarking upon the power of the President of the Senate, said that if you possess the power which was claimed for you under the Constitution, there was no power to intrude any one into partnership with you in the exercise of that power. I agree with that view, but I say that down to a very recent period there was no attempt on the part either of the Senate or of the House there was no attempt on the part either of the Senate or of the House of Representatives to intrude any partnership upon the President of the Senate in the discharge of his duty. The only function which they devolved on their teller was making a list, as I have said before. That duty is not devolved upon you by the Constitution; or if it is, it is one where you can call assistance to your aid, as we can call the assistance of the Secretary of this body to our aid. Is it intruding the Secretary of the Senate into partnership with the Senate because he reads the bills for us, or notes amendments, or performs other clerical duties, or makes out a list of votes when we vote for committees by hellots as required by a required by the lates of the committees. by ballots as required by our rules unless the rules are suspended? Is that an intrusion of an unauthorized person, unauthorized by the Is that an intrusion of an unauthorized person, unauthorized by the Constitution, into partnership with the Senate? In no higher or different sense was there an intrusion during the long scores of years in the history of the Republic when tellers were appointed for the purpose of tabulating the votes declared by the President of the Senate who counted them. Furthermore, we are told by the Senator from New York that if this power resides in you by the Constitution, this bill even if it passes would be void and of no effect; that it would not count in the decision of these matters. Unfortunately, sir, the history of the country shows that measures of this kind when wrongful do have a most deleterious effect. Who shall restore the rifled rights of the contestants for this office after this tribunal shall rifled rights of the contestants for this office after this tribunal shall have acted upon them? Who shall restore us to the pristine days of the Republic when this wide departure from the meaning of the Constitution shall have taken place? Who shall repair the demoralization which necessarily springs from bringing the Supreme Court into controversies of this character? Why, sir, this bill is not to be passed under the idea that it can do no harm if it is unconstitutional. It will be broad and far reaching in its effects, not merely upon the present time when its operations are to be deprecated, but upon the future, and I believe that its effect will be to weaken in the minds of our successors, if not in ourselves, our reverence for constitutional law and those interpretations which have been placed upon it by the fathers of the Republic.

If this bill is unconstitutional, no expediency can recommend it; if its constitutionality is doubtful, its expediency should be clear and unquestioned. I hold that its expediency is as doubtful as is its constitutionality. First, it degrades the Supreme Court and brings it into contempt by the necessary operations of the bill. Up to this time we have loved to think that there was one tribunal that was seated far above the influence of popular passion; that it was illuminated by the sunlight of reason beating upon its high eminence; that pure law was there administered, and that a man's political opinion or political action could have no effect in the decision of his private rights. We have had an idea of this highest judicial tribunal such as the framers of the Constitution intended should surround it. The court itself has sedulously refrained from deciding mere political questions resting within the legislative power. They have hedged themselves in sometimes perhaps with extreme jealousy in that particular. Now we tear down all guards, and now we take, not the Supreme Court, but we select members therefrom chosen with regard to preme Court, but we select members therefrom chosen with regard to their political opinions, bring them down to this muddy pool of politics and require them to wade through it. We degrade them, because we associate in the minds of the people the idea that they are political judges. We give them to think that these men are partisans. Whenever a great constitutional question shall arise, unless the bench is reconstituted and those whose usefulness has been destroyed shall have been reconstituted. is reconstituted and those whose usefulness has been destroyed shall have been removed from it, partisans on either side will say, "What else is to be expected from these men? Did they not decide so and so when it was questioned whether Hayes or Tilden was elected? Did they not act upon partisan motives? Were they not chosen because they would so act upon partisan motives?" You degrade the ermine. You weaken the judges in the confidence of the people of the United States, ay, in the estimation of Senators themselves; and I am approach to it for that reason. If axis asserted, these are revolutionary opposed to it for that reason. If, as is asserted, these are revolutionary times and we are legislating in the face of an exigency, then I say that a partisan judiciary is the greatest evil we can fear in revolutionary times. A partisan judiciary is always subservient to power, its motives spring from no high source. Subserviency is its rule. Jeffreys and Scroggs were partisan judges, and the bloody assizes were the fruits of judicial subserviency.

I object because this court or a majority thereof are required under oath to determine in advance the right of these respective contest-ants. The bill as brought forward here contains a provision that nothing in its operations shall conclude or prejudice the rights of any person claiming this office. Yet here the bench which must decide it, or a majority of them, are required under oath to make that deit, or a majority of them, are required under oath to make that decision, not hearing it according to the forms of law before their tribunal, but taken from the bench and thus disqualified to pass upon these rights. Tell me, sir, what is the process by which the man defeated before this tribunal is to regain those unprejudiced rights? Shall it be by quo warranto, where the decision must reach the highest tribunal? Every fact has been prejudged before, every principle of law has been applied; it may be against him. No, sir; it is one of the hypocritical pretenses of this bill—and I say it having all due respect to the able and judicious committee which reported it—I say it is one of the hypocritical pretenses of this bill, putting a mask upon a face of hideousness, that this is not designed to prejudice rights, but that the courts are to be left open in order to have a vindication of these parties.

dication of these parties. Again I object because these judges are selected for partisan purposes and a thin veil of pretense is thrown over it that they are selected on account of locality. The pretense of locality will not hold water, because there are other localities, vast areas of territory, not represented and not intended to be represented by the judges named under this bill. If it is pretended that they should have been selected hav-ing view to the political sentiments of the people of the region which they represent, tell me what justice there is in selecting the judge of the ninth circuit to represent the three great States of the Pacific who unanimously cast their votes in a different way from what he did and whose opinions are as diametrically opposite to his on all questions springing out of this election as the poles are asunder. No, did and whose opinions are as diametrically opposite to his on all questions springing out of this election as the poles are as aunder. Not, sir, these judges are selected for their political opinions, and the members of the House and the members of the Senate are to be selected for the same reason. The same thing may be said in reference to Judge Clifford. I do not single out these gentlemen because I have more objection to their serving than others. I am simply discussing the features of this bill and showing its unequal operation.

These men, I say, are selected for their partisan leanings, for their opinions already made up, and that is the fairness and judicial impartiality which is to be preserved, says the bill, in case one of them shall die or become physically incapable of discharging these functions! I should like to inquire what impartiality is intended where the phrase is used in the bill. An impartiality is intended where the phrase is used in the bill. An impartiality is intended where the phrase is used in the bill. An impartiality is intended where the phrase is used in the bill. An impartiality is intended where the phrase is used in the bill. opening remarks, there has been a secret understanding on the part of one side or the other which will partake of intrigue and would in that case be disreputable. Objection is made because there is under that case be disreputable. Objection is made because there is under one theory a one-man power residing in the executive department, and that you represent, sir, so far as this function is concerned, and not the legislative; they object to one man, removed from temptation, in that he may not himself at all be a candidate, passing upon these matters. Yet here is a power lodged in the hands of one man to overrule the will of the people. How much is it bettered when a single man, by the very necessity of the thing, and that a man whom you and I cannot intelligently consult about, that we cannot put into your chair by our vote or take out by reversing that vote, as the Senator from New York says, but a man perhaps to be chosen by lot, a man to be gambled for in some way, because if the two republican judges and the two democratic judges cannot agree upon a democrat or a republican, the bill fails, or else some method of lot has to be used by which that determination shall be reached.

I say this man, unknown to the Constitution, belonging to a body used by which that determination shall be reached.

I say this man, unknown to the Constitution, belonging to a body never intended to exercise legislative functions, unknown to any living man, with whose passions, prejudices, opinions, peculiarities, or fidelities we have no knowledge, is to be put in this position. He is to have all this power, never before contended for by Congress, of going behind certificates, reversing the action of States, put in his hands in order to decide the destinies of this people. Is it reasonable; is it expedient? Is this the best that can be done in order to tide over this emergency; a temporary expedient like that, not a permanent tribunal, not one that will be respected in future, but made now in order that somebody may cheat somebody else and thereby get the Presidency?

Presidency?

I think that I am not extravagant in my statement of the firm political attitude the other members will take upon that commission. litical attitude the other members will take upon that commission. I should like to ask if any one believes that our honorable Senators, Mr. Thurman, or Mr. Bayard, or Mr. Bogy—excuse my mentioning their names—are to be convinced, if they are on that commission, to surrender up their opinions? Is that supposed at all? Or is it supposed the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. Morton,] the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Sherman,] or the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Edmunds,] are to yield their convictions, that they are to assent to the election of a presidential candidate of the opposite party? Of course men of pronounced opinions will be placed on this commission, placed there more as advocates than as indeed from the very necessity of their pronounced opinions will be placed on this commission, placed there more as advocates than as judges from the very necessity of their situation, to try to convince the fifteenth man if possible. That is all their function. They are put there to represent an idea, and they cannot surrender that idea without a suspicion of dishonor, and they will not. Every one within the sound of my voice knows that this will be the practical operation, and I reason from that practical operation the inexpediency of this measure.

If the power is too great in your hands six why is it not too.

If the power is too great in your hands, sir, why is it not too great in the hands of this unknown man?

I object to this bill furthermore because it invites a political party, defeated by ordinary forms in a close election, to clamor for another chance. We set a conspicuous example of the weakness of our insti-What difference does it make whether a man is elected Pres ident by one majority or one hundred majority, in the title to this high office? But here you say all that is necessary is that in a close election the party defeated, whether republican or democratic, in all time has but to clamor at the doors of Congress, has but to talk of sending upon these matters. They know it is the mere decision of one individual, and they will go for the antecedents of that individual, and they will find weak spots which perhaps do not exist in the individual. They will go behind this "returning board" of yours, this congressional returning board. You will find that the partisan papers, disappointed, will load with smut and contumely this commission of yours, and these supreme judges that you drag down from the bench at your dictation to serve in a manner not intended by the Constitution. The people will not respect them; and those who are disappointed will be especially clamorous, and I do not believe that if civil war threatens—I think it does not—that this means will avert it.

I object furthermore to this bill, and I speak now as a republican Senator expressing the sentiments of the people of my State as they were at the time they elected me as a republican, and also speaking for my State at the present moment, which at the last election was consistent to the faith which it held at the time it elected me; repreconsistent to the faith which it held at the time it elected me; representing a constituency which is republican, on behalf of that great party of my State, pure as I know it is in its motives, desiring no injustice and disposed to yield to none, speaking on their behalf as well as my own convictions, I object to this returning board because it cripples, prevents the hearing of objections that might otherwise be raised by the republican party to the counting of the electoral vote of certain States in this Union.

If it is determined that the returns may be set aside that a tribunal

If it is determined that the returns may be set aside, that a tribunal may be formed which shall go to the bottom of the poll, that they shall determine whether there has been fraud in certain States, whether force has been employed or has not been employed, then I say that I want them to go still further in that direction and not permit advantage to be taken of the mere fact that the form of a sham electoral certificate has not been set up to figure by the side of a true one in other States. I want to know whether the terrible testimony taken recently with reference to proceedings in Mississippi, where in instances scores of men have been killed for political opinions, and whole districts have been revolutionized by force, and where that was not sufficient the lion's skin has been pieced out by the fox's hide and fraud has come in to complete the work-I want this tribunal, or any tribunal which is appointed to pass upon these things, to pass upon the question whether the certificate purporting to contain the vote of the people of the State of Mississippi, and perhaps some other States, represents the unbiased will of the people of that State, as it should in order to count in the election of President of the United States.

But, sir, before this tribunal—and I make the prediction—you will find abundance of red-tape, and you will find that unless there is a shade of a certificate which in itself would be a fraud, as many of those that have been sent up, as for instance from Florida by electors who have no existence, to figure by the side of the true return, because that shadow of a shade is not present, therefore they will have or take no jurisdiction of this matter!

I object to this bill, because while the House of Representatives, I might say the democratic party in order to be more distinctly under-stood, and perhaps to speak more within parliamentary bounds, yields but one point in this controversy, the republican party is required to yield two as the very necessary result of passing this bill. The House of Representatives takes the ground, which in my judgment is not tenable, that unless the House consents to the counting of a vote, it cannot be counted, and the desire of the Senate that it shall be counted does not avail, provided that its will is that it shall not be counted. The Senate, or members of the Senate, or the republican party, have held, I hold, that the power resides in the President can party, have held, I hold, that the power resides in the President of the Senate. That must be yielded up. Furthermore, it is held by the republican party, that if that is not true, then it requires the concurrent action of the two Houses in order to reject a vote; and that must be given up. In other words, we yield two points of the game; while our adversaries yield but one, and that the least tenable of all. Therefore that is not a compromise, and the Senator from Vermont was correct in saying it was not a compromise; it is a surrender.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask whether the bill which was passed on his vote ten months ago did not provide in the case of double returns vote ten months ago did not provide in the case of double returns that they should not be counted unless both Houses concurred in receiving them?

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator has asked that question of several Senators. I admit that I did vote for the Morton bill. The Senator can make the most of it. It is not an answer to any argument I have advanced to-day, and I would like to remark in that very connection that if he will turn to the debates, which I have not time to refer to, he will find a brief argument of mine made at that time and in his presence, because he asked me some questions in the course of that argument, in which I contended that the power under the Constitution resided in the President of the Senate and that that was the place where it could most safely be lodged.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope that my honorable friend did not suppose I was endeavoring to involve him in an inconsistency; but when he says that the committee have surrendered the republican party in providing that the House of Representatives shall not have the power that the Senator and his republican associates ten months ago said they should have, I do not consider it a republican surrender but a republican victory, if you talk about parties.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator has, of course, a right to his opinion.

I respect his opinion, and I respect his ability; but when the Senator indulges in the hope that I will not think he intended to involve me in an inconsistency, I must tell him his hope is fallacious. I think that was the intention; and whatever he gains by it he is welcome to. I have only to say in reference to that former measure, that it was not clearly brought under the microscope of observation by myself and many other Senators, I think, on this floor. I have examined the matter with greater care since an exigency has arisen in this country. Whether my conclusions now are sound or otherwise, they must rest upon their own merit, and not depend upon any vote that I may have given months ago. But whether I did or did not vote for that bill, I certainly did not then or at any other time assent to the proposition that it was proper to drag the members of the Supreme Court down from their high eminence, to select them not with regard to the hypocritical pretense of locality but for their politics, in order that they might politically decide or stand politically opposed to each other, and therefore so far as they were concerned prevent a decision and throwing the power into the hands of some unnamed man. I have never assented to any bill that contained the monstrosities that this bill contains, and I have given the reasons why I think the bill itself ought not to receive the assent of the Senate.

I say this bill is not a compromise, in my judgment, for the reasons I have given. The Senator from Vermont is entitled to his opinion, and undoubtedly is sincere in it. I am not speaking of motives, but results. I consider this bill not a compromise, and not a victory, but a surrender. But if it is a compromise, I object to it. We ought not to ask anything but what is right, and I am not disposed to compromise away what I think is right. It is more than a question of expediency, it is a question of constitutionality. If we are wrong, let us yield at once. Compromises are always deleterious; they have been so in the history of the world; they have been lamentably so in the history of our own country. The compromises of the Constitution effected a union perhaps some few years sooner than would otherwise have been effected; but the result was that they planted in the Constitution and planted in the body-politic the seeds of a disease that broke out with terrible malignity within this generation. Heroic treatment at that time might have kept the Confederacy somewhat longer in existence and delayed the union of the States; results. I consider this bill not a compromise, and not a victory somewhat longer in existence and delayed the union of the States; but the result would have come, as there was a natural gravitation together of the parts in this country that had fought together for independence, and we should have had a Union without those elements of disease and disorder. So it was with the Missouri compromise. It gave license and strength to slavery; and the compromise of 1850 made every man of the North an auxiliary of the bloodhound. I do not believe in such compromises, compromising away right, especially compromising away constitutional duty.

I object further because we are acting under duress, under menace.

Threats of civil war are held out if Tilden is not counted in, by some process, to the Presidency. The Senator from Vermont himself told us what the sad result of our delay would be and wanted to insist that we should sit and vote on this bill almost without discussion at inconvenient hours of the night, when we were wearied out with listening to the arguments of those who were in its favor, because there was some impending disaster. Why, whose mind is so disturbed by these impending disasters that he cannot have the clearness of his ordinary functions? Who is pushed from his stool? Are threats like these worthy to be made or considered in the Senate of the United States? If they are, should they influence us? Had we not better sit like the Roman senate on the occasion of a noted invasion of their what they thought right? We are told that civil war impends upon us. We have drank deeply of that bitter cup. I hope that all such prophecies have no foundation, will never be realized. I certainly for one would do anything that I constitutionally could to avoid a result like that, and it is much to be deprecated for the sake of our liberties, for the sake of our homes. But war is not the greatest calamity that can befall a people. It is preferable to dishonor, to cowardice, to the loss of liberty. The liberties of this people are gone when violence or threats of violence can constrain the Senate to temporary and inconsiderate expedients by which the will of the people for the succession, lawfully ascertained, can be defeated and the can-didate of a party which has dealt in force and fraud to carry an elecdidate of a party which has dealt in force and fraud to carry an election, and nearly succeeded, can be foisted into the Presidency. From that result, and from all processes leading to it, I wash my hands. Let those who will take the responsibility do so. "I'll none of it."

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I present a petition largely and strongly signed by citizens of New York, merchants of various kinds, praying the speedy passage of the bill which depends in the Senate. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to. Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I should present, but that it is addressed to the committee and therefore is not technically a petition, a memorial which comes by telegraph from the State of Indian, signed by thirty-seven republicans and by three democrats, expressing the gratitude of the signers to the committee for the intelligent and patriotic labor which has resulted in the report of a bill for the settlement of disputed questions touching the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and expressing the most earnest desire that Congress will promptly adopt the measure reported.

arnest desire that Congress will promptly adopt the measure reported. I repeat this telegram is signed by thirty-seven republicans and three democrats. Among the signatures appended to it are names not unknown here. I observe the name of Conrad Baker, who once was governor of that great State. I observe the name of Leonidas Sexton, who was lieutenant-governor of that State, both of them republicans, and the latter a Representative-elect. I observe the name of Mr. Gordon, the republican candidate for attorney-general in the last canvass, and I observe another, the name of Ben Harrison, who as the candidate for governor carried the flag and callantly led the canvass. candidate for governor carried the flag and gallantly led the canvass, candidate for governor carried the flag and gallantly led the canvass, disastrous but dashing, which Indiana saw in October last.

Mr. President, I tried yesterday to answer in part the chief objection to the pending bill. That objection had then received little attention in the Senate. The honorable Senator from California has this morning given it the weight of his authority. Senators have asked why I devoted so much pains yesterday to disproving the authority of the President of the Senate, saying that nobody in the Senate contends for such a power, or believes it to exist. The Senator from California is I believe its only known advocate in the Senate; but nevertheless the chief objection to the pending bill prevailing in the press and in the country at large, is the idea that the Constitution clothes the President of the Senate with power to do whatever can be done in deciding on and making effectual electoral votes, and in judging conflicting certificates. If this objection be well founded, the bill has no footing. I dwelt yesterday on the text of the Constitution to show, first, that it does authorize the President of the Senate to receive, keep, and produce and open all the certificates; and that the Constitution and produce and open all the certificates; and that the Constitution does not empower him after they are opened to pass on the votes they may contain: second, that implication works power to do only those things incident and essential to an expressly authorized act, and that when the expressly authorized act is done and ended, implication

From this I had argued that as the opening of sealed certificates must take place before the votes they contained can be examined or touched, and of course before counting can begin, the power to open beforehand, cannot imply the power to do a separate, a different, a

I referred to the fact that every count from the beginning has been conducted and controlled by the two Houses, that from first to last tellers appointed by the Houses have enumerated, and that the President of the Senate has never even enumerated the votes; that the certificate reciting the count has been framed and ordered by the two Houses and signed by the President of the Senate as their organ expected and controlled to significant the formal forms. pressly authorized and commanded to sign it; that the form of the certificate remained identical from the beginning, and was used and signed on occasions when we know that the Houses entertained objections to votes, and when the record shows conclusively that the certificate did not and could not imply any power assumed by the President of the Senate of himself to determine anything touching the electoral votes

Allusion should have been made to the further fact that in no instance has the President of the Senate assumed to judge or to decide anything, or to do anything beyond opening the packets, except by the command of the two Houses. Georgia's vote in 1800 having been brought into the Senate this morning as it has been sometimes brought in before, I turn aside to remark that if the name of Jefferson is liable to injury now because of a suspicion that taking up a paper void of form and void of substance as a constitutional certificate, he silently in his seat induced the tellers, notwithstanding its latent and its patent vice, to count it for him; if, I say, the memory of Jefferson be exposed to such aspersion, it is exposed to serious aspersion indeed.—He was acting as the organ and agent of the two Houses, in their presence, authorized by their acquiescence, and the intimation is that he proceeded to do clandestinely something not revealed to them, and something by the clear mandate of the resolutions under which the Houses were proceeding, not within his province, and something the success of which depended on secrecy and concealment from the Houses.

If such a thing were supposable in the case of Jefferson, what a light it casts on the danger of trusting one man in such a matter, and what a satire it is on the notion that the Houses can be effectual without the supposable in the state of the succession of nesses knowing and verifying the truth, and yet leaving the whole matter in the keeping of the presiding officer.

I alluded yesterday to the fact that always till 1869, committees have been appointed to pre-arrange the process of verifying and as-certaining the result of presidential elections. This practice never ceased till the twenty-second joint standing rule was made in 1865. That rule has gone. The custom of raising committees to ascertain and report the mode of determining the result, has revived. Committees have been appointed, the report of the committees is the mittees have been appointed, the report of the committees is the pending bill which awaits the action of the Senate, and the question is whether we are to have that method, or no method, or some other method not suggested and which no time remains to devise.

I now beg the attention of the Senate to a chapter of history. It begins in 1800. The Constitution was then ten years old. The men who devised it were still in the vigor of life, and the nation confided in them, and leaned on them. Many of them sat in Congress, for years. Among these men was James Madison. He has been called the father of the Constitution; a few years later he became President of the United States. The Constitution on its face had specified five instances in which votes could not make a man President of the United States. Five disabilities were imposed upon the presidential office. One disability was imposed on the office of presidential elector. All this was true when the Constitution was launched in 1789. It has been said in this debate that the ken of man, the forecast of sages, did not in the beginning discern the possibility that serious problems might require solution in the count and ascertainment of electoral votes. I ventured yesterday to deny the assertion. I repeat the denial now. In 1796 a presidential election had been held; electors had been appointed by the States, Vermont among them. Madison and Jefferson, separated by distance, were in correspondence, and Madison wrote to Jefferson that the election was still in doubt—this was weeks after the electors had been appointed,—because of the allegation that there was "vice," (I use his word) in the vote of Vermont. He wrote that if her electoral votes turned out to be valid, the election would be one way, otherwise it might be the other way. What was the vice, or alleged vice, in the vote of Vermont? The State of Vermont was then living under a constitution wanting in provision for the choice of electors, no statute had been passed directing the mode been said in this debate that the ken of man, the forecast of sages, did mont was then living under a constitution wanting in provision for the choice of electors, no statute had been passed directing the mode in which electors should be appointed, and the Constitution of the United States ordained that they should be appointed by the States in the mode directed by their Legislatures. The Legislature of Vermont, in the absence of a statute, proceeded itself to appoint electors. That was the customary mode observed then in other States, except in those in which the governor alone appointed. Argument arose. On the one side it was said "the Legislature of Vermont has not directed the mode in which presidential electors shall be appointed; there is no statute; and the Legislature can speak only by statute." On the other hand it was said "when the Legislature proceeds itself to choose electors, does it not direct the process? Does it not say, by action speaking louder than words, how the electors shall be chosen." And it was of that doubt, and of the "vice" it suggested, that James Madison, on the 25th of December 1796 wrote to Thomas Jefferson these words: these words:

I cannot entirely remove the uncertainty in which my last left the election. Unless the Vermont election, of which little has of late been said, should contain some fatal vice in it, Mr. Adams may be considered as the President-elect.

Two weeks afterward, on the 8th of January, 1797, he wrote:

If the Vermont votes be valid, as is now generally supposed, Mr. Adams will have 71 and you 68, Pinckney being in the rear of both.

And you 68, Pinckney being in the rear of both.

Mr. President, these letters were written very soon after the Constitution first spoke; they are not the letters of one who was startled and amazed that such a question should arise, and who knew of no way in which it could be solved—the whole manner indicates quite the opposite. Other facts might be cited—the receipt in Congress of petitions from New England charging wrong in the appointment of electors, and not alone such petitions, to show that, immediately after the adoption of the Constitution, and, as I insist by reason of what appears even on its face, before its adoption, its authors foresaw that questions might arise requiring the power of deciding and judging the result of presidential elections.

Coming to the year 1800, I hold up the plain evidence that of both Houses of Congress, and the leaders of thought in the country, had their attention sharply fixed on the necessity of providing for the adjudication of some at least of the very questions involved in the count of votes which now awaits us.

On the 23d of January, 1800, Mr. Ross in the Senate moved a committee to "inquire whether any and what provision should be made touching disputed elections"—I quote the language—"disputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States." It was the 14th of February before report was made. It was the 28th of March before the bill reported was finally acted upon; and the interval is dotted on the skeleton record which has come down to us with the days and occasions on which the Senate, and afterward the House, bestowed upon it most carriest consideration. In the House the bill bestowed upon it most earnest consideration. In the House the bill was managed and the debate was led by John Marshall, who had already given evidence of those remarkable and rugged powers, and of that thorough knowledge of the elements of the Constitution, which were so soon to select him as the head of the new nation's which were so soon to select him as the head of the new nation's highest court. A year later he became Chief-Justice, and at once he began to fill all lands with his renown as a jurist and a statesman. It is said that at the age of twenty-seven Edward Coke was the greatest common lawyer in the world. As truly has it been said that John Marshall was as great a master of our Constitution as ever lived. I have words of his to read to the Senate. The bill, which I will presently refer to more at large, had passed the Senate; it was pending in the House in Committee of the Whole. Its title was "A bill presenting the mode of deciding disputed elections for President and prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections for President and Vice-President." Here is the record:

The bill having been read, and the first section being under consideration, Mr. Marshall, after speaking of the importance of the subject before the com-

The Committee of the Whole Houseand the necessity-

I beg Senators to observe this-and the necessity of some salutary mode being adopted for this object-

That is to settle disputed elections of President and Vice-Presidentexpressed his doubts of the propriety of two points in this first section of the bill, to-wit: first, that the Senate were to name the chairman of the grand commit-tee, and secondly that the opinion of this grand committee was to be final. He therefore moved to strike out of the section so much as related to those principles, and read what he wished to introduce for a substitute.

Here is an explicit statement both of the power of Congress to legislate, and of the "necessity" of adopting a "salutary mode" of conducting the count, and deciding disputes. I will presently show what Marshall deemed a "salutary mode." Before doing so however, I wish to advert to a statement made yesterday by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman.] He said Mr. Pinckney, Charles Pinckney, then a Senator, answered the arguments made in favor of the now pending bill. Did the Senator mean to lead the Senate to believe that Charles Pinck-ney or any other man who took part in the debate of 1800, intimated that an ounce of power, a feather's weight of authority, a particle of prerogative resided with the President of the Senate to judge an electoral vote or to determine the result of a presidential election?

Here is the argument of Charles Pinckney. I infer that, after the manner of later times, it was a verbally-prepared argument; it would so seem, because in this book and its fellow-volumes, "the Annals of Congress," it appears as one of the rare instances in which, in extenso, any man is reported, and short-hand writers did not exist then. I think I have a right to suppose that Mr. Pinckney was reported by himself. I will read a few of his words; the honorable Senator from California also made allusion to Mr. Pinckney.

It is made their duty-

That is the duty of the two Houses-

It is made their duty to count over the votes in a convention of both Houses, and for the President of the Senate to declare who has the majority of the votes of electors transmitted.

From this part of the Constitution it is evident that no power or authority is given to Congress, even when both Houses are assembled in convention, further than to open and to count the votes, and declare who are President and Vice-President, if an election has been made; but if no election has been made, &o.

I do not read these passages as contributions to the argument that more or less power resides in the two Houses. I read it merely to show how far it was from the purpose of Mr. Pinckney to assert any prerogative for the President of the Senate. His argument was quite different. The argument was that the electors were to be appointed by the States, that this was the function and attribute of the States, and that nothing was to be done by the two Houses, or by anybody, except to ascertain what the States had done. And I beg just here, to and that nothing was to be done by the two Houses, or by anybody, except to ascertain what the States had done. And I beg just here, to say that I do not believe any Senator who concurred in reporting the bill now before the Senate holds any other doctrine.

To ascertain the act of the States, is the whole object of the bill. The sole inquiries authorized by the bill are, did the State appoint electors, who are they, how did they vote. These inquiries answered, the proceeding is ended, whether the State be New York or Louisiana. There is the mete and bound which no power can lawfully overpass. Whoever treads beyond, will trample on the Constitution, and attempt to establish brute force or partisan fraud on the ruins of law. Charles Pinckney said it was for the States to appoint electors; the electors were to speak, and then, with a confidence which a longer life would have shaken, he added, Who can suppose that any State will ever attempt to make an office-holder an elector, or will ever do any other thing which the Constitution forbids? If I were to say that he argued that the whole subject must be left literally to the States, I should overstate him. His argument was that it had better be so left, that it was not worth while to be pragmatic, nor to anticipate difficulties or problems, but rather to trust to the placid promise of a hopeful by and by; better to trust that all the States, observing the Constitution, would speak and act according to it. He said that no irregularity had then occurred, and that he believed no dispute about the election would ever come to vex the ear of Congress, or of the nation.

Ha said also that Congress had nothing to do with electing a Presination.

He said also that Congress had nothing to do with electing a President in the first instance, but he did not say that Congress had nothing to do with finding out who the people in the States had elected, No, sir, he said nothing of the sort, nor did he intimate that whatever was to be done in ascertaining the result of presidential elections, should or could be done by the President of the Senate, or by anybody except Congress.

At the end of the argument of Mr. Pinckney the Senate passed the bill. Here it is. As reported by the committee in the Senate it provided that of the committee, the "grand committee," as it was called, to be created, the Chief-Justice should be chairman. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] was right yesterday in saying that the Chief-Justice was stricken out. I ask the attention of the Senator from California [Mr. Sargent] to the amendment by which the Chief-Justice was dispensed with. In lieu of the provision that the Chief-Justice should be chairman of the grand countities, was in-Chief-Justice should be chairman of the grand committee, was inserted this provision:

It shall be the duty of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States to draw by lot in each House six members thereof.

I can state more briefly than I can read the residue of the amendment. By lot six members were to be drawn. Three were to be selected from the six, and of these three a chairman of the committee was to be found. There are several other provisions to which I ask attention. The title of the bill I have already indicated. Section I ask the Secretary to read it.

first provided for the constitution of a committee to be knewn as a grand committee, and I ask Senators to observe the power given to it:

And shall have power to examine and finally to decide all disputes relative to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States: Provided always, That no person shall be deemed capable of serving on this committee, who is one of the five highest candidates, or of kin to any of the five highest candidates.

Section 3:

Each House shall then proceed to choose, by ballot, two members thereof as tellers, whose duty it shall be to receive the certificates of the electors from the President of the Senate, after they shall have been opened and read.

Each member of the committee was to take and subscribe an oath, and to that oath I also call attention. The oath was

I will impartially examine the votes given by the electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, together with all the exceptions and petitions against them, and a true judgment give thereon according to the evidence.

Section 4 provides:

The President of the Senate shall then deliver to the chairman of the grand committee all the certificates of the electors, and all the certificates or other documents transmitted by them, or by the executive authority of any State, and all the petitions, exceptions, and memorials against the votes of the electors, or the persons for whom they have voted, together with the testimony accompanying the same.

The Senator from Ohio observed, erroneously, yesterday, that the pending bill provides for a secret session of the commission. Not so. This bill of 1800 made that provision. I will read it:

They shall sit with closed doors, and a majority of the members may proceed to act, rovided the number from each House is equal.

But for an unwillingness to consume the time of the Senate I would stop to remind the Senator from California how our fathers thought that impartiality might be gained by counterpoising against each other opposing predilections. One House at that time was largely federal; the other was largely republican; divided somewhat as the Houses are divided now, and this scheme provided that the committee to be composed of both Houses should act only when each House was represented with exact equality. Section 6 provided:

That the grand committee shall have power to send for persons, papers and records, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to administer oaths to all persons examined before them, and to punish contempts of witnesses refusing to answer.

Section 8:

That the grand committee shall have power to inquire, examine, decide and report, upon the constitutional qualifications of the persons voted for as President and Vice-President of the United States; upon the constitutional qualifications of the electors appointed by the different States, and whether their appointment was authorized by the State Legislature or not; upon all petitions and exceptions against corrupt, illegal conduct of the electors, or force, menaces or improper means used to influence their votes; or against the truth of their returns, or the time, place or manner of giving their votes.

Section 10: the report of a majority of the said committee shall be a final and conclusive determination of the admissibility, or inadmissibility of the votes given by the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States: and where votes are rejected by the grand committee, their reasons shall be stated in writing for such exclusion.

This bill being amended in several particulars, but in no particular changing the provisions which I have recited, save only to exchange the Chief-Justice as chairman for a chairman to be obtained by lot, passed the Senate by a decided majority.

Mr. SARGENT. By a majority of 4.

Mr. CONKLING. Sixteen to twelve. Sixteen to twelve was a decided majority in a body so small. It passed the Senate after a vigorous and pertinacious opposition never for one moment grounded upon the idea, never in any instance suggesting the idea, that the power whatever it might be, to ascertain presidential elections, did not reside in the two Houses, or that any power touching the subject did reside in the President of the Senate, beyond opening the certificates.

It is to be observed that receiving, keeping and opening such documents, is not a duty of that paltry or menial nature described by the Senator from California when he spoke of "a common carrier of papers." It is a duty of honor and solemnity. It is to receive in trust, and in high trust, the secret certificates of what has been done by bodies of men in great matters, and to preserve them inviolate until in the presence of the representatives of States and the representatives of the people, and invested with more than the interest heirs feel when, in homely phrase, a will is opened, for the first time the whole nation and the world may know what has been consummated by the average and aggregated judgment of all the States. This is no undignified affair—it is not beneath a sovereign. Be this function great or petty, never was it hinted in the debate of 1800 that any power inhered in the presiding officer to judge of anything.

Now I call attention to an amendment offered in the Senate by Mr. Nicholas. If distinguished for no other reason, this amendment will be heard with respect because it commanded not only the preference but the approbation of Thomas Jefferson. Those who have read his letters written at the time will remember that he says, everything offered by a republican is voted down by the customary majorthing offered by a republican is voted down by the customary majority of two to one; but he says in a few days an amendment will be offered which will express the republican view. Here is that amendment. I am not going to read the whole of it. Its chief feature, and that which commanded the approval of Mr. Jefferson, was that when objection was made to a vote, that objection was to be passed upon by the two Houses sitting in joint meeting and voting en masse and per capita, Senator by Senator and Member by Member. That was the The Secretary read as follows:

Amendments to the bill prescribing the mode of deciding diputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States.

President and Vice-President of the United States.

Strike out the ten first sections, and insert:
Whereas, in an election of President and Vice-President of the United States, questions may arise, whether an elector has been appointed in a mode authorized by the Legislature of his State or not? Whether the time at which he was closen, and the day on which he gave his vote were those determined by Congress? Whether he were not at the time, a Senator or Representative of the United States, or held an office of trust or profit under the United States? Whether one at least, of the persons he has voted for, is an inhabitant of a State other than his own? Whether the electors voted by ballot, and have signed, certified and transmitted to the President of the Senate, a list of all the persons voted for; and the number of votes for each? Whether the persons voted for are natural-born citizens, or were citizens of the United States, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, were thirty-five years old, and had been fourteen years resident within the United States? And the Constitution of United States having directed that the President of the Senate shall—

Mr. CONKLING. Now I heer the Senate to listen to the words

Mr. CONKLING. Now I beg the Senate to listen to the words about to be read.

The Secretary continued to read, as follows:

Having directed that the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and that the votes shall then be counted, from which the reasonable inference and practice has been, that they are to be counted by the members composing the said Houses and brought there for that office, no other being assigned them; and inferred the more reasonably as thereby the constitutional weight of each State in the election of those high officers, is exactly preserved in the tribunal which is to judge of its validity, the number of Senators and Representatives from each State, composing the said tribunal, being exactly that of the electors of the same State.

Same State.

Section 1. Be it enacted, &c., That whensoever the members of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be assembled for the purpose of having the certificates of the electors of the several States opened and counted, the names of the several States shall be written on different and similar tickets of paper, and put into a ballot-box out of which one shall be drawn one at a time—

Mr. CONKLING. That is enough. I do not wish to shock the ten-Mr. CONKLING. That is enough. I do not wish to shock the tender sensibilities of the Senate by making them hear that their fathers proposed to toss a penny or draw anything out of a ballot-box. They did, however, provide that the President of the Senate should not even determine for himself the order in which he would pick up and break the seals of these packets. They provided that putting in a box a paper each containing the name of a State, a member of one House should shake the box and a member of the other House should draw out a paper; and then the President of the Senate should open the certificate indicated by the lot, and no other, and that until every certificate indicated by the lot, and no other, and that until every exception taken to the votes of that State was adjudged and acted upon, no other certificate should be opened. But all this involved the doctrine of chance, and in the gladsome light of these better days who would be a dark idolater of chance. O no: not we: not we, who are endowed with scruples and virtues which our fathers never knew.

This amendment offered in the Senate failed. It failed not because of its preamble but because of the latter part of its substance, which

I will read:

The packet containing the certificates of that State, shall be opened by the President of the Senate, and shall then be read, and then shall he read also the petitions, depositions and other papers and documents concerning the same, and if no exception is taken thereto, the votes contained in such certificate shall be counted, but if the votes or any of them shall be objected to,—

Now comes the not acceptable provision-the members present shall, on the question propounded by the President of the Senate, decide, without debate, by yea or may, whether such votes or vote are constitutional or not, and the votes of one State being thus counted, another ticket shall be drawn from the ballot-box.

It will be perceived these latter words required a call of the roll in the joint meeting in which every Senator as a unit, and every member as a unit, should respond yea or nay. Naturally enough the States would not surrender their preponderance of power in the Senate, and would not consent to having Senators merged with the more numerous House of Representatives; and therefore the Senate rejected this amendment; I repeat, the blunt recital in the preamble, that the power was with the Houses and none of it with the presiding officer, received no criticism in either House.

In the House the bill was reported with amendments not one of In the House the bill was reported with amendments not one or which bears upon the topic we are now considering. The two Houses differed, and the bill was rent on a rock. One House was republican in its majority, and the other was federal. It was said in one House that if either House decided against the count of an electoral vote it should be cast out; in the other House it was insisted that no vote should be cast out unless both Houses so said; and accordingly on the word "admit" or the word "reject" the Houses differed. They on the word "admit" or the word "reject" the Houses differed. They first insisted; they then adhered, in parliamentary parlance; and the bill fell, because a political party in the Senate would not yield into the hands of a political party in the House, the jus disponendi of an electoral vote; but all men, and both parties, and both Houses, concurred in affirming by words and by votes that it was for the two Houses of Congress as such, or for the law-making power to conduct, and conclude the exerct in words.

jection had been made to the count of her vote. In 1824 in the Senate jection had been made to the count of her vote. In 1824 in the Senate came forward Martin Van Buren, the organ of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate. He came forward in response to a resolution passed on the 16th of December, 1823, a resolution which summoned that committee to ascertain and report what, in regard to the count of electoral votes, the public interest and the public safety required. On the 4th of March he reported the bill which I hold in my hand. Not until the 19th of April and after much debate and consideration did it pass the Senate. It went to the House and was referred to the Judiciary Committee on the 21st of April, 1824. It was reported back in the House from the Judiciary Committee, unanimously as far as the record shows. Who reported it? Who was the organ of the Law Committee in the House when this bill was reported? Daviel Webster, of Massachusetts. He reported it without changing organ of the Law Committee in the House when this bill was reported? Daviel Webster, of Massachusetts. He reported it without changing the dot of an i or the cross of a t. No amendment or cavil was suggested. It had passed this body. It had been managed here by Mr. Van Buren who soon afterward led his party in the national canvass, and stood the acknowledged and visible head of the democratic church; and Mr. Van Buren was a lawyer of no mean attainments. It church; and Mr. Van Buren was a lawyer of no mean attainments. It was reported in the House with approval by Mr. Webster, who was known as the great expounder of the Constitution, but it was not reported until the 10th of May, 1824. It was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, and when the 10th of May has arrived in this latitude, the House of Representatives and the Senate have approached the term of the session. The Houses adjourned, and thus the bill was lost. I turn to two of its provisions. It provides, curiously enough, that on the first occasion when the votes were to be counted the joint meeting should be held in the Hall of the House counted the joint meeting should be held in the Hall of the House, and on after occasions the two Houses should assemble in the Rotunda.

The Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the next occasion, and on all future occasions in the center room of the Capitol.

That I take it be the Rotunda. They were to meet under the Dome of the Capitol on neutral ground between the two Halls.

The bill provides that at twelve o'clock of the day appointed for the counting of the votes, the two Houses shall meet as I have described.

The packet containing the certificates from the electors of each State shall then be opened by the President of the Senate, beginning with the State of New Hamp-

And going through the States geographically-and if no exceptions are taken thereto, all the votes contained in such certificates shall be counted; but, if any exception be taken, the person taking the same shall state it in writing, directly, and not argumentatively, and sign his name thereto; and if the exception be seconded, &c.

I pass over that:

And then each House shall immediatly retire, without question or debate, to its own department, and shall take the question on the exception, without debate, by ayes and noes. So soon as the question shall be taken in either House, a message shall be sent to the other informing them—informing them of the decision of the question and that the House sending the message is prepared to resume the count.

Not to resume witnessing a count to be conducted by somebody else, but to resume the count, and when such message shall have been received by both Houses, they shall again meet in the same room as before, and the count shall be resumed. And if the two Houses have concurred in rejecting the vote or votes objected to, such vote or votes shall not be counted; but unless both Houses concur, such vote or votes shall be counted.

That, Mr. President, was the bill of 1824. Be it wise or unwise, it asserts again by a unity of voices with no recorded doubt, that the paramount law had reposed in the two Houses the duty, and commanded them to see to it, that constitutionally, lawfully, and truly, the result of presidential elections should be ascertained.

I have said that in 1817 the vote of Indiana was challenged. Her Senators sat in the Senate Chamber. In the House also she was rep-resented. The question was shall this vote be counted? The Houses separated, entertained the objection, and deliberated.

In 1821 Missouri had come in. Before the day to count arrived on a motion made in either House a committee was appointed to consider and forecast the disposition to be made of an anticipated objection.

Just here it may be well to notice a suggestion we have sometimes heard. It is said that it is impracticable for the two Houses to attempt to decide objections to votes when the count takes place; because if they have the legal power they have not the time to make the inquiry. Why is there not time? Why, because the second Wednesday in February is the day for the count to begin, and the interval before the 4th of March is too brief to permit inquiry. The first answer to this suggestion is that the day is fixed only by statute, and can be changed to a day early enough to leave ample time. The pending bill deep change the day so as to avoid insufficiency of concernments. bill does change the day, so as to avoid insufficiency of opportunity. red in affirming by words and by votes that it was for the two Houses of Congress as such, or for the law-making power to conduct, and conclude the ascertainment of electoral votes.

No one disputed this position.

Mr. President, begging pardon for occupying so much time upon the bill of 1800 which contained nearly every essential element, certainly every one to which most serious objection is made, to be found in the bill before us, I beg to ask attention to the legislation of 1824.

Objection had been made to the count of the vote of Indiana in 1817. Missouri had put into her constitution, touching free men of color, provisions obnoxious to a large portion of the nation, and ob-was that the vote should be reported thus: if the votes be counted, the count will stand so and so, if not counted, so and so, but in either case James Morroe has received a majority of all the electors appointed, and is therefore President of the United States.

In effect the votes were rejected.

No suggestion was made that the presiding officer had any power over the question. I measure my expression in saying no power, because he was Vice-President, and not even a member of this body, and had not even a vote, except in the case of a tie. If he had been as you are, Mr. President, a member of the Senate, he would have had a vote. You have a vote not qua your Presidency of the Senate, but qua your Senatorship. It is because you hold the credentials of the great State senatorship. It is because you hold the credentials of the great State of Michigan as a Senator, and not because I had the pleasure of voting for you along with a majority of Senators to preside over us, that you have a vote and thereby one-seventy-fifth of the power of the Senate.

In 1837 the vote of Michigan was dealt with by the Houses, as Mis-

In 1837 the vote of Michigan was dealt with by the Houses, as Missouri had been thirteen years before.

In 1857 the certificate of Wisconsin was opened. A snow-storm had raged in Wisconsin. The electors were impeded in reaching Madison, the capital of that State. They arrived at Madison a day too late. The law said they must vote the day before. The question was, is the law in this respect mandatory or is it merely directory? James M. Mason of Virginia sat in your chair. The Houses met, to count the vote. Wisconsin's certificate was reached. Objection was made. The presiding officer said "this is not the time." The tellers wrote upon their table. The objection was insisted on. Mr. Mason said—I state it briefly, not wishing to dwell upon in, but I mean to state it accurately, and I invite review and correction if I am wrong—the President of the Senate said, "no proceeding is in order here, the two Houses sitting together, which requires debate or a vote here. That, I President of the Senate said, "no proceeding is in order here, the two Houses sitting together, which requires debate or a vote here. That, I rule as the presiding officer of these two bodies," as he was by the by, not because he was President of the Senate. No, Sir John Randolph early raised his voice against that idea; but because of the comity and agreement of the two Houses he was selected for that occasion to and agreement of the two Houses he was selected for that occasion to act as the moderator or presiding officer of the joint meeting. Mr. Mason ruled that nothing was in order there which involved debate or a vote in the two Houses sitting together. One of the tellers, Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, rose, as the record will show, and said I take it the true mode is for the Houses to separate and determine separately whether this vote shall be counted or not. Mr. Mason rose, I use his words now, and said, "the Chairso considers." During the proceeding, in every form of convenient words, he disclaimed all power. He said in substance I have no power to count this vote or to refuse to count it. I have no power to say it is a good vote or a bad vote. My business is to open the certificates. I do it. The two Houses must decide whether the vote is constitutional and can be counted or not. Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois then a Senator, broke into a somewhat lent, I prefer to say impassioned exclamation, and yet scarcely more impassioned than that in which John J. Crittenden expressed himself, and it may be said of him that the snows of seventy winters on his head never quenched the fires of patriotism that glowed beneath. He and Douglas and others rose and said, "I protest; I record my pro-test against the idea that the presiding officer has anything to do, even by ruling a question of order, with putting a curb or bit upon pro-ceedings here." The President of the Senate again disclaimed all inceedings here." tention to influence the proceedings. On the motion of a Senator the Houses separated. The Senate came here and debate took place, and again the presiding officer washed his hands and purged himself of what he said would have been an attempt at usurpation, saying that what he said would have been an attempt at usurpation, saying that he had nothing to do with the matter except to open the certificates, and then as authorized by the two Houses to act as the presiding officer of the joint meeting; but the Houses, and they alone, must determine whether a vote was good, or whether it was bad, or he might have added whether it was indifferent; an inquiry which would have been quite immaterial if the law had been, as announced here the other day, that no matter whether good, bad, or indifferent, in either alternative equally, votes are to be counted.

I come now to a resolution adopted by the two Houses in 1865, after much debate in the Senate. Rebellion stood with gory and uplifted hand. I will admit for the sake of the argument, or rather I shall not read the resolution to dispute, that acts might be proper in the presence of such events, which in their absence would have been with-presence of such events, which in their absence would have been without justification, possibly without extenuation.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator admits it?

Mr. CONKLING. I admit it for the sake of the argument. I affirm nothing in regard to it. I never believed the Constitution was violated by asserting that the Government had the right to be. I never believed it was violated because it was asserted that the nation had authority by the beak and claw to put down rebellion. Here is the resolution:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the States mentioned in the preamble to this joint resolution are not entitled to representation in the electoral college for the choice of President and Vice-President of the United States for the term of office commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865—and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from said States concerning the choice of President and Vice-President for said term of office.

Approved February 8, 1865.

That resolution went to Mr. Lincoln, the President of the United States. Hear what Mr. Lincoln said:

The joint resolution entitled, &c., has been signed by the Executive-

I am reading the language of Abraham Lincoln-has been signed by the Executive, in deference to the view of Congress implied in its passage and presentation to him. In his own view, however, the two Houses of Congress convened under the twelfth article of the Constitution—

Not the twenty-second joint rule,-that rule did not then exist-Not the twenty-second joint rule,—that rule the first energy have complete power to exclude from counting all electoral votes deemed by them to be illegal; and it is not competent for the Executive to defeat or obstruct that power by a veto, as would be the case if his action were at all essential in the matter. He disclaims all right of the Executive to interfere in any way in the matter of canvassing or counting the electoral votes, and he also disclaims that by signing said resolution he has expressed any opinion on the recitals of the preamble, or any judgment of his own upon the subject of the resolution.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 8, 1865.

I think it safe to stand with Abraham Lincoln in the view he stated. This brings me to the twenty-second joint rule. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] said yesterday it was adopted on the report of the Judiciary Committee. No, sir. In 1865 the House and the Sen-ate passed, as the Senate and the House have passed this year, reso lutions raising committees to ascertain and report, in the immemorial language, the mode in which the electoral votes shall be examined, and the result ascertained. Who, Mr. President, was of that committee in the House? The Senator from Ohio will remember them well when they are named. The chairman of the committee was Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania. Next on the committee was Mr. E. B. Washburne, of Illinois. Next to him was Mr. Mallory, of Kentucky. Then came Davis,—Henry Winter Davis, of Maryland; and last upon the committee was Mr. Cox. Three of these gentlemen were very pronounced republicans. In the Senate, the committee was specified in the senate of the s cial also, consisting of Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, Mr. Conness, of California, and Mr. Wright, of Indiana. These two committees reported, and reported unanimously, the twenty-second joint rule. Mr. Stevens reported it in the House, and demanded the previous question upon to which nobody objected; I state this to show that no debate took place, and according to my recollection, no republican, not one, re-corded himself against it. I believe no republican Senator voted against it. In the Senate the whole subject had just been elaborately against it. In the Senate the whole subject had just been elaborately debated for days on another resolution, and was well understood. Do not suppose, Mr. President, that I allude to the twenty-second joint rule to approve it. The rule is gone, and this is well; but the argument remains. The argument, like Banquo's ghost, will not down. If, by the Constitution, this province resides with the President of the Senate, the twenty-second joint rule, or any rule of the sort, and every proceeding of the Houses by which they judged of votes, has been a usurpation from the beginning as bald and wrong as manthorized interference could be.

Under the twenty-second joint rule Senators around me heard the certificate of Arkansas read. Objection was made. Why? Because the seal impressed upon it was the governor's seal as contradistinguished from the great seal of the State; and the two Houses separated and in solemn action each House cast out the vote of Arkansas altogether, because of a supposed mistake in the seal.

Four votes from Georgia were cast out by one House alone. Why? Because, though regular in all respects, no flaw appearing on the face of the certificate, they were given for Horace Greeley, and Mr. Greeley was dead according to report.

Yes, Mr. President, these votes and others, were cast out when the result did not depend on them we are told. But is this a migratory power? Does it live in the two Houses of Congress when nothing depends upon a vote; and when everything depends upon a vote, does the power to judge that vote migrate and pass out of the two Houses and pass into the presiding officer?

I come now to another resolution. The Senator from Ohio [Mr.

SHERMAN] may remember it—a resolution offered by him in Janu-nary, 1873. War had ceased. The clash of arms could no longer be heard. The Supreme Court had decided that eight years before the resolution was offered, in every intent of law and fact, the war was over. Peace stood in the land; peace stood adjudged on the record. A presidential election had occurred, and on the 7th of January afterward the Senator from Ohio proposed to the Senate this resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections is directed to inquire and report to the Senate whether the recent election of electors for President and Vice-President has been conducted, in the States of Louisiana and Arkansas, in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and the laws of said States, and what contests, if any, have arisen as to who were elected as electors in either of said States, and what measures are necessary to provide for the determination of such contests, and to guard against and determine like contests in the future election of electors for President and Vice-President.

The resolution further provided in order that the answer to it may be speedy, that is to say that the information sought may be received in time to act on it in counting the electoral votes, that the commit-tee may employ persons to take depositions, in addition to taking depositions itself. It fell to me to assign some reasons for this resolution. I wish to read briefly from what I then said as it appears in the official record. I take leave to do so, lest it may be suspected that the views I maintain are of recent growth. Here are my words

What does it propose? To inquire whether in certain States the Constitution has, in this respect, been executed, and whether it has been executed according to its own requirements and the requirements of the laws of the United States; that is all. Keeping before us for the moment the express delegations of authority to Congress, may we not inquire whether the electors appointed are persons holding offices of trust or profit under the United States! May we not inquire whether they were elected on the day specified! May we not inquire whether they are chosen at the place required! Undoubtedly we may.

Again:

One Senator says we have a right to inquire whether the claimants are the electors appointed by Louisiana. Take it so; how are we going to find out? Suppose it turns out that there has been no election at all; suppose the whole election went down, trodden out under the hoof of brute violence; suppose military power or a mob rode over the election, and there were no ballots or ballot-boxes at all, and certificates come here, may we not inquire whether those certified were in truth appointed by Louisiana?

And again:

But I go further than to maintain the naked power of Congress to inquire. I insist that we can utilize the result of the inquiry, and employ the facts in our action upon counting or refusing to count electoral votes for President and Vice-President. I see no reason to doubt that any State having provided a popular election as the mode of appointing electors, and it being alleged that no such election has been held, or that the election was a mere mockery or mob, violative not only of the laws of Louisiana, but in violation of the supreme law of the United States, we are within the scope of our power in sending a committee to find whether the allegation be fiction or fact.

Once more:

To ascertain and make record of the facts, I will vote for the resolution. This alone will be wholesome; and I will vote for it also for the use we may make of the facts in counting electoral votes, and determining any other proceeding which may come within our province.

The resolution passed, I believe without a dissenting voice. No dissent is recorded. In reply to it came a report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. To one or two passages from that report I ask attention. It was submitted by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morron.] He says:

Indiana [Mr. MORTON.] He says:

The third section of the act of Congress of 1792 declares what shall be the official ovidence of the election of electors, and provides that "the executive authority of each State shall cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, to be delivered to the electors on or before the first Wednesday in December, and the said electors shall annex one of the said lists to each of the lists of their votes." The certificate of the secretary of state is not required, and the certificate of the governor, as provided for in this section, seems to be the only evidence contemplated by the law of the election of electors and their right to cast the electoral vote of the State. If Congress chooses to go behind the governor's certificate, and inquire who had been chosen as electors, it is not violating any principle of the right of the States to prescribe what shall be the evidence of the election of electors, but it is simply going behind the evidence as prescribed by an act of Congress; and, thus going behind the certificate of the governor, we find that the official returns of the election of electors, from the various parishes of Louisiana, had never been counted by anybody having authority to count them.

That, it will be observed, Mr. President, was to show that those votes could not properly be counted because the returns behind them had not been counted and certified by anybody authorized. Let me turn over and read what was said of the votes cast for the opposing electors:

The election of the Grant electors is certified by the Lynch returning board, but that board did not have the official returns before them, and their election is not certified by the governor of the State as required by the act of Congress.

Under that resolution, passed without dissent, answered by the committee, the two Houses when the day arrived proceeded to dispose of the electoral certificate of Louisiana.

Coming to a more recent period we had reported from the Commit-tee on Privileges and Elections a bill to which reference has several times been made. I refer to it in part to call attention to the fact that only three republican members of this body voted against it, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] the Senator from Wisconsin whosits before me [Mr. Howe] and myself. What was it? A bill which would have deposited with the House of Representatives absolutely the decision of the late election, a bill which passed this body twice, which at the end of the last session was arrested only by a motion to reconsider made by a democratic Senator, but for which motion it reconsider made by a democratic Senator, but for which motion it would be necessary now only for the House to take up the bill and under the previous question pass it—the call of the yeas and nays requires forty minutes. Like Shakespeare's fairy, the House could "put a girdle round about the earth in forty minutes." Unless the President of the United States could find in the Constitution some reason for a veto, the die of this presidential election would be cast in an hour—it would have been cast e'er now.

Under the bill, the express consent of both Houses was given in advance that one House alone, without examiuncer the one House alone, without cause assigned, without examination, without anything but its ipse dixit, might say the vote of a State should not be counted, provided only there were conflicting certificates. There are now conflicting certificates from four States, and on these States the result depends. It has been said that this last year's bill was more guarded than the bill on our table touching the recognition it gave to conflicting certificates, or papers purporting to be certificates. I read the second section:

be certificates. I read the second section:

That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return from such State and that only shall be counted which the two Houses acting separately shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Whoever will go to the Secretary's table will find the words "and that only" introduced with the pen after the types had done their work, so as to clinch beyond peradventure the certainty that when from any State certificates, returns, or papers purporting to be certificates, conflict, no certificate shall be counted unless both Houses concur affirmatively in asserting that one certificate shall be received, and then that, and that only, shall be counted. The Senator from Indiana observed the other day that there was nothing in the bill now referred to authe other day that there was nothing in the one hold we reterred to authorizing anybody to go behind the electoral certificates, and that it was therefore safer than the bill before us. Mr. President, there can be but one true electoral certificate from a State unless they are duplicates. There can be but one; there cannot be two. One is genuine and one is counterfeit.

I read again from last year's bill:

And that return from such State and that only shall be counted which the two ouses acting separately shall decide to be—

The true and valid return.

It is said that when Adam and Eve came from Paradise, the world was before them, and where to choose. They can have been no freer than each House would have been under that bill: unbridled, unrestricted jurisdiction is there: no metes or bounds: each House may go at large into the illimitable domain of discretion, caprice, or power. If a majority, a bare majority, of one in either House said no, that was to be the end of all consideration or controversy in respect of the vote of a State. The bill gave to one House that power which the pending bill gives to no House, that power which the committee assert for both Houses, to be exercised only when a provisional examination made by both through its trusted members, and made also by five members of the judiciary, has been fully made, and the reasons and facts given, and then retaining to the last in the two Houses the and facts given, and then retaining to the last in the two Houses the power to say whether that finding and report shall be effectual or not. We have been told this morning that the measure before the Senate is a surrender of the rights of the republican party. I should abhor it if it were a surrender of the rights of anybody, and especially of that great party which in war and in peace has for sixteen years conducted with marvelous success the affairs of the nation. Why is it a surrender and a surrender renugnant to those who only girlt months. surrender, and a surrender repugnant to those who only eight months ago were bent upon a measure which now would leave us without the ghost of a hope that the election may be declared in our favor? Why, it is a surrender because it guards the vote of every State against rejection, until both Houses, by a common tribunal, the fairest, the most learned, the most fit, the most impartial that ingenuity can invent, have investigated and found the law and the facts, and, in the light of day, with a full statement of the reasons to be spread before the world, have come to a deliberate judgment that the Constitution forbids the vote to be received. This is branded as a surrender by those who lately insisted that one House alone, in unbridled caprice, and with no statement of reasons required, might exclude a State by merely saying the vote shall not be counted. I am willing to let these two surrenders stand side by side, while the nation compares them with each other.

But, Mr. President, more recently than 1873 we have illustrations of the judgment of the two Houses of Congress touching the residence and possession of the power to ascertain and inquire into electoral votes. We have had committees sitting for weeks in the delta of the Father of Waters, and on the Atlantic coast, and a committee sitting here playing like a swivel-gun in all directions and at longer range. All this has happened during the present session. Let me read to the Senate what the Senate said in sending forth these investigating committees:

That the said committee be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the eligibility to office under the Constitution of the United States of any persons alleged to have been ineligible on the 7th day of November last, or to be ineligible as electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, to whom certificates of election have been or shall be issued by the executive authority of any State as such electors; and whether the appointment of electors or those claiming to be such in any of the States—

has been made-

The appointment of electors has been made-declared or returned, either by force, fraud, or other means, otherwise than in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and the laws of the respective States; and whether any such appointment or action of any such elector has been in any wise unconstitutionally or unlawfully interfered with.

This language authorizes a search of the polls in voting-precincts. No inquiry can go further, and in fact the committees have been holding inquest on the registration and casting of votes, and the appliances employed to carry the elections, in several States.

For what is such inquiry? If the two Houses have nothing to do with the result, or with ascertaining whether electors were appointed, if there is nothing to be done in regard to the authenticity of the electoral carriforate if all votes the

if there is nothing to be done in regard to the authenticity of the electoral certificates, if all votes the presiding officer has received, good, bad and indifferent, irrespective of quality, are to be counted, as you would count the chairs in this Chamber, why is all this?

I come now to speak of some and only of some of those who have expressed opinions on this subject, and who have expressed opinions not only authorizing the enactment of a law, but opinions irreconcilably repugnant to the idea that the presiding officer of the Senate in any contingency can lawfully exert the power in question. James Madison, Thomas Jefferson, Samuel Dexter of Massachusetts, Samuel Livermore, of New Hampshire,—he was President of the Senate; he was the colleague of John Langdon, the first President of the Senate, John

Marshall, and I may add the whole Congress of 1800, Martin Van Buren, Daniel Webster, Thomas H. Benton, Stephen A. Douglas, Jacob M. Howard, Jacob Collamer, Abraham Lincoln, John J. Crittenden, Lewis Cass, Humphrey Marshall, Thaddeus Stevens, Henry Winter Davis, John Bell, and many others whose names I will not read. I will rather read the words of one whose name I did not read, but whose name, whether it be the Mill-boy of the Slashes or Harry of the West, will long kindle enthusiasm wherever in our land it is heard. seen in newspapers that Mr. Clay concurred in the power of the President of the Senate to determine the count of electoral votes. In 1821 Mr. Clay, as chairman of a committee, having reported a resolution which would have been absurd upon such a supposition, a resolution which stood in sharp clear denial of the power of the presiding officer,

The Constitution required of the two Houses to assemble and perform the highest duty that could devolve on a public body—to ascertain who had been elected by the people to administer their national concerns. In a case of votes coming forward which could not be counted, the Constitution was silent; but, fortunately, the end in that case carried with it the means. The two Houses were called on to enumerate the votes for President and Vice-President; of course they were called on to decide what are votes.

Of course says Mr. Clay, the two Houses are called upon to decide what are the votes.

It being obvious that a difficulty would arise in the joint meeting concerning the votes of Missouri, some gentlemen thinking they ought to be counted and others dissenting from that opinion, the committee thought it best to prevent all difficulty by waiving the question in the manner proposed, knowing that it could not affect the result of the election.

Again:

Mr. Clay would merely observe that the difficulty is before us; that we must decide it when the Houses meet, or avoid it by some previous arrangement. The committee being morally certain that the question would arise on the votes in joint meeting, thought it best to give it the go-by in this way.

Now observe Mr. President here is the passage that has been quoted as meaning something else.

Suppose this resolution not adopted, the President of the Senate will proceed to open and count the votes; and would the House allow that officer, simply and alone, thus virtually to decide the question of the legality of the votes? If not, how then were they to proceed? Was it to be settled by the decision of the two Houses conjointly or of the Houses separately? One House would say the votes ought to be counted, the other that they ought not; and then the votes would be lost altogether.

This is strange language for a master of statement, if he meant that the power to decide upon the validity of votes lay with the presiding

Not meaning to refer by name to living men, I may schedule among the authorities all those who voted for the twenty-second joint rule in either House, all who acted under it; especially all who voted for the bill reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections which passed this body a few months ago, and also those who voted for the resolution under which committees are now proceeding to inquire. Did any Senator of republican faith vote against that resolution?

Mr. President, what is the answer to this broad, deep, irresistible stream of historic precept and example? It was given by the honorable Senator from Indiana. He said: if nothing is done, a condition of affairs will exist in which the President of the Senate, to revent a dead-lock, must act from necessity.

The honorable Senator from Indiana has broached that doctrine before. Here it is in a report made by him on the 1st of June, 1874, a report which I infer in an unusual sense was the expression of his individual views. I observe in it these words:

So powerful have been these obligations that  ${\bf I}$  believe scarce an instance is known where electors have violated these pledges.

The use of the personal pronoun there, seems to make this a personal and individual declaration, as well as a grave report from a committee. I read from it this paragraph. It cannot have been a loose opinion; chairmen of committees in the Senate do not, in writing, report loose opinions.

Clearly-

Says the author of this report-

Clearly the framers of the Constitution did not contemplate that the President of the Senate, in opening and counting the vote for President and Vice-President, should exercise any discretionary or judicial power in determining between the votes of two sets of electors, or upon the sufficiency or validity of the record of the votes of the electors in any State; but that he should perform a merely ministerial act, of which the two Houses were to be witnesses and to make record. But the exercise of these high powers may devolve upon him ex necessitate res.

Supplemented by the intimation made by the Senator during this Supplemented by the initiation made by the Senator during this debate, we may all see what this means.

We, by refusing to make provision, are to create a necessity, and that necessity is to create a power and create a man to wield it.

The honorable Senator stigmatized the bill now before the Senate as "a contrivance." He might well have applied such a term to his own scheme of necessity. If ever there was a contrivance, if ever there was a political Hell Gate paved and honeycombed with dynamite there it is

Is a necessity, purposely created, to beget a power which "clearly the framers of the Constitution did not contemplate?" Is a contrived state of affairs to enthrone in this land a governing instrumentality which the Constitution does not sanction?

Is the pending bill to be defeated in order to bring on this neces-

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator finish the reading of the sentence? He left off reading one of my sentences.

Mr. CONKLING. I shall read the whole paragraph. The Scripture says "a contented mind is great riches," and although I know how hard it is for the Senator from Indiana to listen to a dull speech, if he will possess his soul in patience he will hear read the whole paragraph. Let me first be sure to make plain so much as I have read. The argument, but little concealed the other day, was that the pending bill should be defeated, and this would bring on a necessity, which necessity would open the way to an exercise of power, in the language of the author of this report, clearly not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. Mr. President "necessity knows no law." Who is to decide whether he is called and chosen by necessity to be the master of an opportunity?

Necessity: that arch fiend and foe of government, that prolific mother, and apology of anarchy, revolution, despotism, and fraud, ever since human government began. The pretensions of necessity have age after age affrighted humanity, trampled on right, gendered wars, and swept realms and rulers

Through caverns measureless to man, Down to a sunless sea.

Let not the representatives of American States, in this century year, connive at bringing about a necessity, they know not what, fraught with consequences they cannot order or foresee. Suppose the Speaker of the House says he is the man of destiny, that necessity has created him to untie this tangled problem. Suppose the House says it from necessity is to be the Deus ex machina, borrowing a phrase from the Senator from California; suppose any man or any power chooses to deem himself or itself invoked by necessity, where are the limits of such a theory? Let me read from this same report a view of some of the consequences of this so-called necessity.

There is imminent danger of revolution to the nation whenever the result of a presidential election is to be determined by the vote of a State in which the choice of electors has been irregular or is alleged to have been carried by fraud or violence, and where there is no method of having these questions examined and settled in advance—where the choice of President depends upon the election in a State which has been publicly characterized by fraud or violence, and in which one party is alleged to have triumphed and secured the certificates of election by chicanery or the fraudulent interposition of courts. Such a President would in advance be shorn of his moral power and authority in his office, would be looked upon as a usurper, and the consequences that would result from such a state of things no man can predict.

Mr. President visits a because I weeks at varyer gaves which he law

Mr. President, it is because I mean, at every stage which the law and the facts shall justify, to maintain that the republican nominee has been chosen Chief Magistrate of the nation; it is because I believe him to be a patriot and incapable of wishing injury or disparagement to his country, that I would have his title so clear that it can never be challenged with a pretext for believing that he, and they who supported him, meant to clutch usurped power, or dared not submit to a fair and constitutional examination the truth of the elec-

Now I will read the climax of the paragraph of the report, which the Senator from Indiana wishes the Senate to hear:

But the exercise of these high power

The power to judge and decide between conflicting certificates, and to determine the result-

But the exercise of these high powers may devolve upon him ex necessitate rei, and whatever decision he may make between the two sets of electors or upon the sufficiency and validity of the record of the votes—whether on the evidence of the right of the electors to cast votes, or whether they have been cast in the manner prescribed by the Constitution—his decision is final.

And all this ex necessitate rei, although the framers of the Constitution meant, and meant "clearly," that he should never exert any such functions at all. This bastard child of destiny, born in the throes of an exigency specially arranged by the refusal of Congress to legislate, rising above the Constitution is to decide, and when he has decided, from the rising of the sun even to the going down of the same, there shall not be one man who does not bow mutely and reverently to his decision.

Again I say it is not for representatives of a patriotic party of law and order, in the presence of the events before which we stand, to refuse by law to constitute a peaceful, certain impartial mode under the Constitution, and above it, of ascertaining the true result of the

How shall this be done? Senators say that to ascertain the result of the election, is the attribute and duty of the two Houses. If that be the law, this bill does not overpass the law.

The pending measure has been called a compromise. If it be a compromise, a compromise of truth, of law, of right, I am against it. My life has taught me not to contrive compromises but to settle issues. Every compromise of principle, is a make-shift and a snare. It never stood; it never deserved to stand. It is the coward's expedient never stood; it never deserved to stand. It is the coward's expedient to adjourn to another day, a controversy easy to govern in the fountain, but hard to struggle against in the stream. If this bill be such a compromise, I am against it. But I deny that it is a compromise, I deny that it compromises anything; and, above all, that it compromises right, principle, or the Constitution. To contest a claim, is not to compromise it. To insist upon the right, and submit it to an honest, fair scrutiny and determination, is not to compromise it. A presidential election has occurred. Unless there is a tic or a failure, somebody has been chosen. To ascertain and establish the fact, is not a compromise. To reveal and establish the truth of a thing already past and fixed, is as far from a compromise as the east is from the west.

Above all, Mr. President, this is not a compromise of the position of those who hold that the two Houses as such, are bound to count the votes; and there I address a Senator who differs from me in political belief, and who opposes this bill, as do others of his faith, because he holds that the Constitution commands the two Houses to count the votes. I say the bill is no compromise by those who entertain this view. The two Houses consist of four hundred members. Four hundred men cannot each handle and scrutinize, and examine and tabulate, all the contents, true and false, of these electoral certificates. They might act by tellers. What are tellers? The eyes, the ears, the hands, the faculties of the two Houses: that is all—the proxies of the two Houses, as one may be the proxy of stockholders in a corporation. Four hundred men cannot do the mechanical or actual office of counting. They may depute two men from each House to do it; they may appoint a committee to do it. That is what our fathers proposed; they called it a grand committee. There is no harm in my saying that in committee wished this tribunal to be called a committee: but names alter nothing. It is a committee in legal force and effect. It represents the two Houses, as tellers would represent them—no less a committee because five members of the highest judicial tribunal are part of it. Is the silver commission, at the head of which stands my distinguished friend from Nevada [Mr. JONES] less a commission of the two Houses because experts, three in number, not members of either House, belong to it? Suppose the Constitution made it the duty of Congress to observe the position of Jupiter, and a committee was appointed, of which the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] ought to be one. Suppose on that committee was placed Professor Henry, to guard the Senator from Connecticut against observing Venus in place of Jupiter, [laughter,] would the committee or its character be destroyed by the presence of Professor Henry, not a member of either House? Recently a commission of the two Houses has been constituted in the commission of the second of the commission are distinguished. tuted to re-organize the Army, and on that commission are distinguished men not members of either House. Is it a void commission for that reason? If the General of the Army is on this Army commission, would any man like to go into history with it known of him that he supposed that in fact or in law the commission was impaired, or that it was not strengthened and dignified, by putting upon it the most instructed men, although they were not members of either

The honorable Senator from Ohio says the bill creates offices, and that the judges of the Supreme Court ought to be confirmed by the Senate. If their functions were such as he ascribed to them, I think they should at least be confirmed. He says they are "to make a President." Inasmuch as the Constitution has provided that the States and people are to do that, and has refused to allow either House to do and people are to do that, and has reduced to anow either House to do it in the first instance, I quite concur with the Senator that they who are to make a President, ought at least to be confirmed.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I do not interrupt my friend—
Mr. CONKLING. Not at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will mention to him the difference between what is called the silver commission and the Army commission and this commission to make a President. When the silver commission report, commission to make a President. When the silver commission report, their action is of no validity and either House may disregard it, and so with the report of the Army commission; but when this commission to make a President reports, it requires the affirmative action of both Houses consenting thereto to undo their work.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it often happens that when one is attempting a speech, particularly a poor speech, some Senator who interrupts him anticipates something important to another branch of the argument. When the Legislature of New York repealed the rule in Shelley's case, somebody asked Chancellor Kent why he did not strike out the chapter in his Commentaries relating to that subject? The Chancellor replied "Why, that is one of the most admired parts of the work; how could I strike it out?" And here comes the Senator from Ohio now, and is about to spoil one of the best of my points not yet reached. [Mr. Sherman rose.] I hope he will not do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will withdraw my interruption, then

Mr. SHERMAN. I will withdraw my interruption, then.
Mr. CONKLING. That is right. I hope my honorable friend will forbear, because I have a definite theory on his point. I will not take my seat without disputing his suggestion, and trying to confute a theory, fallacious it seems to me, and put forth now for the third

The honorable Senator from Ohio thought that these judges of the Supreme Court should be confirmed by the Senate in order to act on this commission. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CRAGIN] behind me, ejaculates from his seat that "they have been once," and the remark seems to me seasonable and pertinent. They have once, on the nomination of the President and by the action of the Senate been certified; or as Mr. Benton would have said "certificated" as men selected from the whole nation for their fitness to weigh evidence, and to examine and ascertain questions of law. anointed with the public confidence. But the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio is that this bill establishes offices. I say that it merely appoints a commission. From time immemorial in England, from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, parliamentary committees and commissions have been established composed not only of members but of present the contrary. not only of members, but of persons not members of either They are not officers in the sense intended by the Senator. Again, was it ever heard that Congress cannot impose upon national officers additional duties? Is there any officer in the Government on whom Congress may not impose additional duties? I know the Supreme Court said, in the case of Prigg vs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, that justices of the peace, being State officers, were not bound under the fugitive-slave act of 1793 to act as commissioners, but, said the court, if they choose to act it is entirely competent; not being national officers, however, Congress cannot compel them to act.

But what said the first pension law ever passed? It undertook to make the judges of the Federal courts commissioners. By a somewhat bungling phrase it spoke of "the court" and not the judges, and men queried whether under that language, denoting the court, there might not be doubt. But did anybody ever deny that Congress had power to make the judges of the Federal courts commissioners of pensions † I think it never was denied. Does the honorable Senator from Ohio doubt that Congress has power to employ a judge, whether of the court of Alabama claims, or Supreme Court, or any other court, to settle a doubtful boundary, or to exert any other faculty essential

I submit to the honorable Senator from Ohio in answer to his last objection, that the two Houses, from beginning to end, make this examination. They agree beforehand to make it in a particular way, to make it by a committee. That committee incarnates the two Houses; it is in law the two Houses. By action beforehand, both Houses agree not to be finally bound by what the commission shall do; but agree not to be finally bound by what the commission shall do; but they agree to the mode in which the examination shall be made. What is the mode? That the commission shall decide only provis-ionally; only conditionally. The two Houses retain the whole thing to the end absolutely in their own hands. A Senator said yesterday, and it has been repeated to-day, that if the two Houses were both required to approve by affirmative votes what the commission does, it would then be not a delegation of power—a devolution of the power of the Houses, but a retention and exercise of power by the Houses themselves.

Mr. President I deny this distinction. The power is neither more or less retained in the hands of the Houses, whether they approve the finding of the commission affirmatively, or by refusing to negative the finding. The bill provides that the examination being made by the finding. The bill provides that the examination being made by the Representatives of the two Houses, by those who constitute the eyes and ears and hands and faculties of the two Houses, and that action reported provisionally, it shall be deemed the action of the two Houses unless they disapprove it. The Supreme Court of the United States, when eight judges sit, and a decree or judgment comes up from a court below, by a foreordained rule provide that if four judges are for the decree and four against it, the decree is affirmed; it becomes the judgment of the court, nay, it virtually becomes in that case the unanimous judgment of the court. Why? Because the court, unanimously in advance has ordered and agreed that such a division of mously in advance, has ordered and agreed that such a division oc-curring, the judgment reviewed shall be affirmed. This is the rule of courts in general. A decision or finding coming before a court for reversal or affirmance, is affirmed unless a majority agree to reverse it. The honorable Senator from Indiana moves away. [Mr. Conk-LING while speaking had advanced toward Mr. Morton's desk, just mr. MORTON.

I retreated as far as I could. [Moves away.] Mr. MORTON. I retreated as far as I could. [Moves away.]
Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the honorable Senator observes that he has retreated as far as he could. That is the command laid on him by the common law. He is bound to retreat to the wall, before turning and rending an adversary; and as he has retreated as far as he could, I will repay his coyness with a reminiscence. A few months ago it was proposed in the Senate to import the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court into the proceeding of counting electoral votes and Supreme Court into the proceeding of counting electoral votes, and of him, and the presiding officers of the two bodies, to constitute a triumvirate which should be the umpire to cast the die between the two Houses when they differed about the count. The honorable Senator from Indiana voted on call of the yeas and nays for that proposition, no constitutional doubt restraining him. Does he shake his head?

Mr. MORTON. I will satisfy you on that point.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator promises to satisfy me. He seemed to shake his head. I was about to hold up the record, to hold the mirror up to nature, and satisfy him that the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections did sanction with his great weight to the content of the conte and authority the right of the law-making power to snatch the Chief-Justice from his judgment-seat and bring him here, and make him one of a trinity which should arbitrate between the two Houses and conclude both by the vote he should give.

conclude both by the vote he should give.

Returning now to the point, I repeat, Mr. President, that when a court of first instance is constituted to inquire, to hear, and report to the two Houses, and it is left with the Houses to reverse or to refuse to reverse the finding, the tribunal is provisional, and the ultimate adjudication is reserved in the two Houses; and I submit to the Senator from Ohio that, speaking in the spirit of law, it makes not the slightest difference whether the provision is that the approval of the acts of the commission shall be by affirmative action, or by withholding affirmative action. I speak in the presence of trained lawyers, and yet I speak in the presence of no lawyer who on reflection will challenge the position.

Mr. President, had I discussed, as I have not done, clearly and fully, my views in regard to this subject, I should feel better authorized to my views in regard to this subject, I should feel better authorized to inquire how shall the two Houses exercise the power and the duty

resting on them? We cannot summon the stars; we cannot command gods or angels. We must have recourse to men. We have provided that each House shall select its most trusted members. We have provided that added to these, shall be five judges of the highest court, five "sacred judges" the Senator from Ohio called them. Why "sacred?" Because they administer justice. What is the ancient and modern symbol of institue? A stary figure with blinded ever "sacred?" Because they administer justice. What is the ancient and modern symbol of justice? A stony figure with blinded eyes, with an arm unmoved by a throb of feeling, holding unshaken the even scales. Because these judges are so typified, the Senator from Ohio says they are "sacred judges." Then they can be trusted. Is the proposed duty beneath them? They never sat in a greater or a graver cause. John Jay, when Chief-Justice, crossed the sea to negotiate a treaty, not so great by far as that covenant of law and peace and right which these judges are to establish. Judge Nelson sat in a commission whose duty and privilege it was to hold up before the world the attainments of America in dignity and reason, by showing that the nation was strong enough and proud enough to withdraw from the forum of brute force and passion a great question, and submit it to legally constituted authority. One of the grandest empemit it to legally constituted authority. One of the grandest empemit it to legally constituted authority. One of the grandest emperors on earth acted as umpire in the same proceeding, and the fifteen millions obtained by the decision, was valueless compared with the tranquillity and composure of our land for a single day—paltry indeed, by the side of the inestimable advantage of proving by actual experiment that no emergency is so great that forty-five million freemen cannot meet it calmly and safely under the free institutions they cherish. If "he who ruleth his own spirit be greater than he who taketh a city," what shall be said of the grandeur of millions who by an act as quiet as the wave of a wand can calm the commotions of a an act as quiet as the wave of a wand can calm the commotions of a Continent in an hour?

No jot or tittle of authority not reposed by the Constitution in the two Houses of Congress, acting separately or together, is broached in prescribing the jurisdiction of this commission. Familiarly in ancient and in recent times, deputing one to do an act for another, the customary phrase is "with like force and effect as if I myself did it." That in substance is the behest of this bill, with like force and effect by you who represent the two Houses for these purposes, as if the two Houses and every member were present, as the two houses of Parliament were in law present always when a full and free con-ference was held. The bill utters the voice of the Houses thus: To you the chosen deputies of the two Houses who on honor and on oath represent them in this investigation, we say that you are authorized to do exactly that which the two Houses, acting separately or together, themselves might do. Take the Constitution for your chart and guide. Whateveritand the now existing law commands, that do: thus guide. Whatever it and the now existing law commands, that do: thus far and no farther. You stand in lawyer's phrase in statu quo. Abstain from everything from which those who constituted you ought to abstain, do nothing except to deal with that which lies within the domain of constitutional duty, and report to us who repose special trust and confidence in you, all the reasons that move you, all the onclusions to which you come.

I have heard it suggested that something in this bill implies, that going behind the faculties of the States, going behind the lawful exercise of that power which the Constitution reposes in the States, and wherewith the Constitution crowns them, this commission may inquire wherewith the Constitution crowns them, this commission may inquire at large, by canvassing the votes cast in parishes or even precincts, by going into the question whether those who voted were all that should have voted, whether they voted as they wished to vote—in short that the commission may become a national "returning board." The law has this ancient maxim—"that is certain which can be rendered certain." We say in this bill, "take the Constitution as it stands; that is your guide; there you will find the boundaries of your power; you shall not overpass them; execute the Constitution, and stop."

But says one Senator why does not the bill specify all the things these men are to do. To ask the question is to suggest unnumbered answers. Answers spring up as the army of Roderick Dhu sprang from the heather, when a whistle garrisoned a glen. In the first place, there is an irreconcilable difference of opinion as to the nature and extent of the power of the two Houses, or either, to pry into or penetrate the act of the States. In the next place, were all agreed, it would be impossible in a bill to embody a treatise or commentary which should provide for every contingency or possibility. It was Dean Swift who made a written schedule for his attendant of all the things he was to do; each and several his duties were set down; but on a Sunday Dean Swift fell into a ditch and called for assistance, but the would approve in advance, although a possibility in theory, would

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] in a tone which few beyond me hear, inquires whether I mean that they have no limit in this bill. Mr. President I had supposed that the Constitution had raised not only a hedge and fence, but a wall of limit to the powers it confers. I supposed that when five of the most largely instructed and trusted members of the Senate, and five of the most largely instructed and trusted members of the House, were authorized to meet five judges of the highest and most largely instructed judicial tribulal of the land, we might trust to them to settle what a court of over and of the land, we might trust to them to settle what a court of over and terminer settles whenever it is called upon to determine whether it has jurisdiction to try an indictment for homicide or not. I supposed that giving it the instrument by which its jurisdiction is to be measured, we could trust this provisional tribunal of selected men to run the boundary and fix the line marking their jurisdiction, and to blaze the trees. I hear a voice ask "Where they please?" This cannot have been the voice of the Senator from Massachusetts. That Senator is a lawyer, and he knows that judges cannot lawfully do anything bea lawyer, and he knows that judges cannot lawfully do anything because they please. They must stop where the law stops.

I have repeatedly insisted that the Constitution and the existing law, is the boundary; and I believe the act of 1792 is the only statute applicable. No I am wrong, the act of 1845, touching the choice of presidential electors, may also have a bearing. Inasmuch as the Constitution, the law, and the acts of Congress of which I think there are but two, prescribe the power, inasmuch as we make the existing law the guide-board, inasmuch as we command and conjure the commission to according to the Constitution and to keep within its limits. sion to go according to the Constitution and to keep within its limits, I supposed it could not be a roving commission to traverse at large the realms of fact, superstition, and fiction.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, will it interrupt the Senator if I say word?

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all.

Mr. DAWES. I hear the Senator state distinctly that this commission is to be bound by the Constitution; but I hear him state just as distinctly that in his opinion this commission, being bound by the Constitution, could not invade what I deem to be the prerogatives of the States to settle the title of their own electors. If I could hear him and all of the members of that committee make the same clear and unequivocal assertion I should be greatly comforted. My discontent apprehension arise from the fact that while I hear him make this and apprehension arise from the fact that while I hear him make this equally unequivocal expression of his own opinion of what the boundary is I hear others with equal distinctness and clearness and positiveness say that though they also believe this commission to be bound by the Constitution they believe the Constitution authorizes them to go into and settle questions which in my mind belong exclusively to the States to settle. That is what troubles me, and the Senator will pardon me for interrupting him in the way I have in order to get as distinctly as I could from the members of this committee, not only what I knew before every one of them would say, that the commission I knew before every one of them would say, that the commission would have to limit the exercise of their power by the Constitution, but, inasmuch as one member of this committee believes the Constitution will stop them at one point and another member of the committee believes it will not, I suggest to the Senator would it not be safer for us by a statute to limit them? Then we shall know where the boundary is.
Mr. CONKLING.

The boundary of this power is not only one of the bones of contention, but the very marrow of it. If there were no doubt in that regard, we should need no bill. If the two Houses, and the members of the two Houses, were clear and concurrent in their views, we should need no commission. It is because of an irreconcilviews, we should need no commission. It is because of an irreconcilable conflict of opinion that we propose to execute the Constitution in this way; and if I have not so said before, I want now to say that in my opinion it is not only a competent execution of the Constitution, but one substantial, effectual, and compliant with its spirit strictly. But the Senator from Massachusetts says he has heard the Senator from New York say something and the Senator from somewhere else say something; may I remind my honorable friend that what I may say in this regard, or even what he may say, is only a puff of air. The commission is to say on the oaths of its members and subject to our review what by the Constitution is committed to it. If the Senator review what by the Constitution is committed to it. If the Senator from Massachusetts shall be of this commission, what he might think, or if I were to be of it what I might think would then be of great moment. I submit to him it is anise and cumin, and not of the weightier matters of the law, to consider what may be thought by this Senator or that Senator of the range and province within which this commission may move. They must ascertain for themselves. If the question in the State of New York is whether the court of oyer and Sunday Dean Swift fell into a ditch and called for assistance, but the attendant produced his schedule and said he found nothing there which required him to help anybody out of a ditch on Sunday. It was supposed by the committee, as the sense of its members was only finite, and very finite, that when they called, in addition to five picked men of each House, five experts in the law, men who had been selected from the great body of the nation for their training and adaptation to exploring legal distinctions and ascertaining legal truth, it was hardly worth while to attempt to accompany this trust of provisional authority with a minute bill of particulars of all the things which might have been possible, by restraint and exclusion, to put feters on these fifteen members. Every Senator who hears me knows that any attempt to run the exact boundaries of the power to admit evidence, any attempt by the concurrent action of the two Houses to agree upon a universal solvent, to come to that exact unit of accuracy in defining jurisdiction and pertinence of evidence which all decision. On the contrary suppose they say "we will go behind the certificate, we will go behind the certificate in Louisiana, not to inquire about the weight of evidence, not to find out whether the returning board found rightly or wrongly, not even to inquire whether they found honestly or corruptly, but we will go behind the certificates merely to inquire as a jurisdictional question whether the returning board of Louisiana had before it, and was authorized to act upon, the evidence of the popular will." They so report, and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, having one vote, and a potent voice, will pass upon the report. On the contrary suppose they say they have a right to go a little further than that, and to ascertain whether the returning board of Louisiana or the governor of Oregon was moved by corrupt motive. Suppose they hold that they may search even so far, and condemn what has been done in Oregon because greed or corruption moved the hand that held the pen when the certificate was written. Upon such a ruling, the Senator from Masscause greed or corruption moved the hand that held the pen when the certificate was written. Upon such a ruling, the Senator from Massachusetts sitting as a member of the court of review, is to pass, on his oath and on his responsibility as a representative of a State.

Mr. DAWES. I am sincerely anxious to understand the whole scope of this bill, and if I understand the Senator aright now he states that there was in this committee an irreconcilable difference as to how

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator must pardon me there. I did not so state. I spoke of nothing in the committee: I spoke at large, saying that there is an irreconcilable difference of opinion. I avoided saying anything about the committee.

Mr. DAWES. I think the Senator is right. The Senator has corrected me properly. The Senator says the committee recognized an irreconcilable difference upon how far the Constitution will permit this commission to go into an investigation of matters that belong to the States. To meet that irreconcilable difference, as I understand him to say, they propose in the bill to take the construction of the Constitution from this commission.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is too astute not to know, too alert to forget, that he who in advance can exactly fix and measure the limits and application of constitutional authority, holds in his hands the horoscope in which may be read with some distinctness the final issue of the whole matter. It was the purpose and the laborious effort of the committee, to establish provisional tribunal from which should some with impact of the committee. a provisional tribunal, from which should come, with impartiality as great as could be obtained by the instrumentalities of humanity, a result conforming to law and to the facts, a result resting neither on the wishes of the Senator from Massachusetts nor on the wishes of the most pronounced opposing partisan, but resting on the Constitution and the law as they were on that day in December—I believe it was the 6th,—when the electors in all the States cast their votes.

The sole object was to devise an instrumentality to reveal and establish, historically and constitutionally, the truth and fact of a past transaction. For us to undertake in advance to say definitely and in detail, what this commission should decide, was to abandon the attempt to present a measure which would command the approval of the fourteen members of the two select committees, and afterward of the Senate and the House with their four hundred members, and at last of that great constituency which stands behind us all. We held that a tribunal fit to be intrusted even provisionally with passing upon any part of this controversy, was fit to be intrusted with judging of their own powers after we had delivered into their hands, as their chart and compass, the Constitution and law of the United States, and told them to stand to and abide by that in every contingency.

If the honorable Senator from Massachusetts proposes to launch on the heady currents of debate in these Houses, the question what at every step would be correct in the proceedings of the commission, I say to him he proposes to set sail on a soundless and shoreless sea; the 4th of March, 1877, the 4th of March, 1878, would not see the end of a debate attempting to predict the solution of inquiries so intricate, varied, and entangled. We left the commission, as the law of Massachusetts leaves to the lowest court which in the first instance tries a man on a charge involving his life or his liberty, to determine whether it has power to entertain indictments for offenses such as that. We left it as the law leaves the most menial civil tribunal to determine whether, and how far it has power to entertain a controversy, the most insignificant, arising between one man and another, whether one owes the other money or not. The Senator in a subdued voice now suggests the other money or not. The Senator in a subdued voice now suggests the accuracy with which the jurisdiction of courts is asserted in the State of Massachusetts and he bids me make this as accurate as things are made in the State of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the sentiment of despair is the only sentiment produced by such an appeal. The idea of the representatives of all the States making anything as exact as things are made in the State of Massachusetts! [Langhter.] The Senator says that I stated we have done as is done in Massachusetts. I did not mean that. It was the Queen of Sheba who said that she never realized the glory of Solemon until she entered the inner tem-I did not mean that. It was the Queen of Sheba who said that she never realized the glory of Solomon until she entered the inner temple. The idea that the representatives of other States could breathe the upper air, or tread the milky-way, never entered into the wildest and most presumptuous flight of imagination. O no, Mr. President. Whenever the thirty-seven other States attain to the stature of the grand old Commonwealth, the time will come when no problem remains to be solved, and when even contested presidential votes will count themselves. [Laughter.] Then in every sphere and orbit everything will move harmoniously, by undeviating and automatic process.

Mr. President, I owe an apology to the Senate, and I make it feelingly, for the time occupied in this discussion.

I signed this report. I will vote for the pending bill; vote for it, denying that it is a compromise, believing that it is no compromise, believing that it surrenders the rights of none, and maintains the rights of all. It seems to me fair and just. Adopted, it composes the country in an hour. The mists which have gathered in our land will be quickly dispelled; business will no longer falter before uncertainty or apprehension. If thoughts of anarchy or disorder, or a disputed chief magistracy, have taken root, the passage of the bill will eradicate them at once. The measure will be a herald of order and calmness, from sea to sea: it will once again proclaim to the world that America is great enough, and wise enough, to do all things decently and in order. It may be denounced by partisans on the one side and on the other; it may be derided by the adventurous and the thoughtless; it may be treated with courageous gaiety, as it has been by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania; it may not be presently approved by all the thoughtful and the patriotic. Still I will vote for it, because I believe it executes the Constitution, and because I believe it for the lasting advantage of all the people and of all the believe it for the lasting advantage of all the people and of all the States, including that great State whose interests and whose honor are so dear to me. It may be condemned now, but time at whose great altar all passion, and error, and prejudice at last must bow, will test it, and I believe will vindicate it. Those who vote for it can wait.

Yes, they can wait. Senators: in a matter of duty so exalted, we may "place our bark on the highest promontory of the beach, and wait for the rising of the tide to make it float."

Mr. MORTON. I do not rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of making a speech. I hope, before this debate closes, to have an opportunity of answering some things that have been said, to show that much that has been said is without foundation in logic, is without foundation in fact. But my purpose in asking the floor is to notice a dispatch which the Senator from New York thought proper to read a dispatch handed to him by the Senator from Vermont from the —a dispatch, handed to him by the Senator from Vermont, from the city of Indianapolis, signed by some thirty-seven or thirty-eight persons, all of whom, it was said, were republicans but three, this dissons, all of whom, it was said, were republicans but three, this dispatch indorsing this bill. I could see no reason for the introduction of the dispatch, except to show that I was not correctly representing the sentiments of the people of Indiana, and especially of the republican party of Indiana; for the Senator was careful to say that all the persons signing the dispatch were republicans but three. I immediately telegraphed to a gentleman in Indianapolis who was in a position to know something about this matter, and a few minutes ago I received a dispatch, which I will read:

That paper was carried about the streets here all day yesterday and many leading republicans refused to sign it. Sexton was in the Union League last night and voted for a resolution condemning the compromise. Gresham got it up. A resolution was passed by board of trade in favor of compromise; vote, It to 13—aparty

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator does not read the signature to that dispatch.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; but I can read the signature if it is re-

Mr. MONTON. No, sir, but I can read the signature.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. MORTON. I have other dispatches here. Here is a dispatch giving the proceedings of a republican caucus of the members of the Legislature of Indiana the other night:

The caucus of republican members of the Legislature last night declared Hayes and Wheeler legally elected, and that it is the duty of the President of the Senate to declare the result; that the justices of the Supreme Court should not be vested with political power; and that we therefore indorse the action of our Senator, O. P. MORTON, in withholding his consent to the measure proposed by the joint committee of Congress.

Another dispatch signed by three very respectable gentlemen: The prevailing sentiment among our leading men is, "Hold the fort!"

Mr. CONKLING. What fort does that refer to? [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. It is the fort of the Constitution.
Mr. CONKLING. That is what we are trying to do.
Mr. MORTON. The fort the gentleman does not occupy. [Laugh-

That the compromise plan is a grave mistake, unfair to Hayes and favorable to Tilden. Your position is generally indorsed by our best republicans.

Another dispatch just received from the city of La Fayette within an hour is:

The republicans of Tippecanoe almost without exception sustain you in your position against compromise plan.

Mr. CONKLING. Are these all anonymous?

Mr. MORTON. The gentleman has had his eight-hour speech.

He might allow me to proceed a few moments without interruption. My friend is under the impression that he has a right to occupy all Here is a dispatch from a leading banker in the city of Indianapolis:

I have with all care tried to get expression of solid republicans on the plan for counting vote. It is universally condemned as conceding all constitutional and time-honored provisions. Not afraid of result, but of the precedent established. Your position approved; will stand by you.

I have here from my State, which have been received within three or four days since this bill was published and has been under discussion, a large number of letters. I have altogether here some two hundred or more letters received from Indiana, Ohio, and other States. I have from my own State some fifty, and from different parts of it, giving the sentiment and sustaining my course, letters from leading republicans and from at least three very prominent and influential democrats; and while the Senator from New York was looking after the sentiment of Indiana and intimating that I did not represent it, it might have been well for him to turn his attention to the State of York. I have here some thirty letters from the State of New York, some received to-day, many yesterday, from the city of New York, from Buffalo, and from other towns in the State, indorsing the course I have taken and saying that I represent the sentiment of the republican party. I have as many letters, I think, as he has signatures to that dispatch, and I have quite a number of dispatches that tures to that dispatch, and I have quite a number of dispatches that I have not here, that are at my room at the hotel. I have almost as many dispatches as I have letters indorsing my course.

So far as I am acquainted the republican press of New York as a general thing denounce this compromise. The New York Times, the leading republican paper of that State, has taken strong ground against it. The New York Tribune, the independent paper of that great city, has taken strong ground against it; and from my observation since this matter was first broached within the last few days, when the character of this measure was made known and the public first came to understand it there has been a very strong expression against it throughout the United States by the republican press. I do not say it is unanimous, but I believe it is more nearly unanimous than the republican press has been upon any question for the mous than the republican press has been upon any question for the last ten years. Some approve it or will sustain it now that it has been proposed who are apprehensive of trouble, who believe that we may have violence or a breach of the peace; but very few commend it from their own judgment. It is regarded as a contrivance; it is regarded as a compromise except by those who regard it as something regarded as a compromise except by those who regard it as something worse, and that is a surrender.

This, Mr. President, is all I intended to say at this time.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, as my colleague has referred to the state of opinion in the State of Indiana, I may say to the Senate that I was at Indianapolis on Monday and passed the day there. I saw quite a number of our leading citizens of both political parties. I heard but one opinion expressed in reference to the propriety of passing this bill, and that was in favor of it. I was at the Federal court-room for a short time and conversed quite freely with the attorneys there, and without regard to party the opinions expressed by them were all on one side. I was a short time in our State senate. My conversations there were principally with my political friends. There were but one or two republicans present at any of the conversations. Reference was made to a caucus that had been held a short time before that, and one of the republican senators engaged in the conversation referred to it and said that they had passed resolutions conversation referred to it and said that they had passed resolutions of that kind, but by no means by a unanimous vote.

Among those whom I saw and talked with while I was there was the late Governor Baker of our State; John D. Holland, clerk of our court; Albert G. Porter, one of the leading lawyers of the State, a republican, my own partner, who was a candidate on the electoral ticket for Hayes and Wheeler, and other leading men of the republican party. Of course I do not know except as they expressed themselves to me, but I know of no measure which has come before our people on which they have seemed to be so thoroughly united as providing for a peaceful solution of the difficulties surrounding the presidential count.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to say that nothing was further from my intention than to attempt to show that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] did or did not represent his constituents. I supposed when these gentlemen, prominent as they are in their standing before when these gentlemen, prominent as they are in their standing before the whole nation, had sent a dispatch to a committee of whom I was one that I might without impropriety read that dispatch, although the State from which it came was represented by the honorable Senator from Indiana. I will not go with him into a consideration of the question how the sentiment stands in other States. I merely read question how the sentiment stands in other States. I merely read this dispatch to show the opinion of those who had chosen to take the trouble and incur the inconvenience of transmitting it by the wires to a committee of whom I happened to be a member. If the Senator from Indiana supposes that it was my purpose or my wish to represent him as coming short in expressing the views of his constituents, I can only say, in the language of one of the great masters that—

Trifles, light as air, Are to the jealous confirmations strong As proof of holy writ.

I never thought of anything of the sort.

I never thought of anything of the sort.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator says that his purpose was not to show that I misrepresented the sentiment of Indiana, but it was a dispatch received by his committee. If that is the only dispatch the committee have had approving their course, I can readily excuse their desire to get it before the public; but if it was not the only dispatch, then the production of it at this time did cause me to think that the purpose was to show that I was not correctly representing the State of Indiana.

Mr. CONKLING. It was the only one at that moment.

Mr. MORTON. One word in reply to my colleague. I have great faith in my colleague, but I want no issue with him, for I have never regarded him, I must say in all frankness, as a correct exponent of the republican sentiment of Indiana.

Mr. McDONALD. I never assumed that.

Mr. MORTON. My friend returning from New Orleans, where he was engaged in the investigation for the purpose of enabling his party to go behind the decision of the State authorities of Louisiana, would naturally fall into the hands of his friends in Indiana, who would inquire what progress he had made, and his impressions would most likely be drawn from them. If he expresses here the sentiment of the democratic party in Indiana in favor of this compromise, or surrender, or whatever you call it, I am not at all surprised, and I am not at liberty to impeach the correctness of his representations. If he means to say that Governor Hendricks has expressed his approbation of this remedy, I shall not be prepared to dispute it. The fact is, I have every reason to believe that he is in favor of it.

Mr. McDONALD. I wish to ask my colleague what standing Governor Baker holds in the republican party in our State; what standing Albert G. Porter holds in the party; what standing General Ben Harrison holds in the party; what standing Jonathan W. Gordon holds in the party; what standing Mr. Fishback holds in the party; what standing such men as my neighbor Sharpe, Mr. Hoyt, and other business men in our city, that I might name, hold in his own party. Mr. MORTON. The standing of those gentlemen whom my colleague has named is excellent. The most of them are my warm and earnest friends. I have nothing whatever to say against any man that my colleague has named; but I repeat here again, Mr. President, that, so far as I know, I am representing the general republican would inquire what progress he had made, and his impressions would that my colleague has named; but I repeat here again, Mr. President, that, so far as I know, I am representing the general republican sentiment of my State. I am glad of it; but I want to say at the same time that I am not taking this course because I believe I do in that particular represent the republican sentiment of my State. I am doing what I do because I think it is right, I think it is due to the country, I think it is due to principles of justice, due to the law, and due to the republican party.

I shall have occasion hereafter to comment upon the extraordinary attempt that has been made to destroy the destripe upon which President.

attempt that has been made to destroy the doctrine upon which Presidents have been counted in for seventy-five years, to prove that it was all illegal and wrong, and this too at the very time when there is a case before us when, by the destruction of that position, we shall a case before us when, by the destruction of that position, we shall be driven to take another. If this fight had been made a year ago, or two years ago, or five years ago, under other circumstances, it would be less strange; but it comes at that precise time when it is to the interest of the man who I believe has been elected, when it is to the interest of the republican party, to the interest of truth, and the best interest of this nation that this vote shall be counted as it was for interest of this nation that this vote shall be counted as it was for the first three-quarters of a century, and when this is not the time to make up a new plan. If we went along so well for so long, we can afford to go on a little longer just now; and now, when it is to our interest and I believe to the interest of the country that things shall stand as they are, we are to have a new plan forced upon us.

For years I have been laboring to bring this matter before the public. I received but little countenance; very little interest was taken in it; but now, when we have got to that point and under those peculiar circumstances when we can afford to let things go on as they have gone so long, it is insisted that we shall have a plan, a contrivance, and it is a contrivance which as I learn from my colleague does meet at least the approbation of the democracy of Indiana.

Mr. McDONALD. It does.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I will detain the Senate but a mo-

Mr. McDONALD. It does.
Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I will detain the Senate but a moment. I do not desire to debate the merits of this measure. The committee have had my support from the outset. Their report, in the main, has the support of the State of Massachusetts. The people whom my colleague and myself represent are, with considerable and I do not know but with great unanimity, expecting us to give our vote for this bill. But, sir, they will be pained to see in the debate of to-day that the commission which is to be created by the bill has no other limit to its jurisdiction than what its members themselves shall other limit to its jurisdiction than what its members themselves shall put upon their own court. The State of Massachusetts has supposed that this commission, like her own courts, would be governed in its jurisdiction by a well defined and marked law.

When I pressed the Senator from New York to tell me what he understood to be its limit, how far this court could go in its jurisdiction, I drew out from him the confession that this bill has been so framed that the commission will have no other limit than what its discretion shall put upon this court. At first the Senator from New York told me that they had defined this court as every court in the State of Massachusetts was defined in the limitation of its jurisdiction; but when I called his attention to the fact that the first great prominent feature of a court in Massachusetts was a limit by law to prominent feature of a court in Massachusetts was a limit by law to prominent feature of a court in Massachusetts was a limit by law to its jurisdiction, the Senator felt it necessary then to treat the State of Massachusetts as out of the pale of any sort of construction which it was proper or good or wise to put upon the jurisdiction of this court. I say to him that in the object and purpose of this commission the people of the State of Massachusetts are in sympathy with the committee, and are ready to support it; but they are not ready to create a court that shall go into Massachusetts and take up the work, which they by law have confided to their governor and council, to count and determine the vote by which Massachusetts has appointed her electors. pointed her electors.

The Senator says that if everybody were as perfect as Massachusetts, the electoral vote would count itself. I only wish to say that, after the debate of to-day, I believe that Massachusetts would hold me responsible if I did not make some effort to define by law the jurisdiction of this court, so that it might not take jurisdiction of that which belongs to the State of Massachusetts, to the State of New York, and to all the States. However much I might have hesitated before this debate commenced to undertake to offer any amendment to the work of the committee, so anxious was I to see the bill become a law, yet after the debate of to-day has put upon the record that the phraseology of this bill has been so framed as to put no limit whatever upon the jurisdiction of this court except that which the court itself shall set to its jurisdiction, I beg to offer an amendment to the bill. Therefore, at the end of the eighty-sixth line, on the sixth page, I move to insert the following, and I will only say that it is the lan-guage taken from the bill of 1800 as it was reported to the Senate:

Provided. That no petitions, exceptions, or other paper shall be considered by said commission which has for its object to dispute or draw into question the number of votes given for an elector in any of the States, or the fact whether any elector was chosen by a majority of the votes of said State.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed

Mr. ALLISON and others. Say half past seven.

Mr. STEVENSON. It is a quarter to six now.
Mr. EDMUNDS. I will say half past seven.
Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I should like the Senate to go into executive session for a few minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry to disoblige the Senator from Pennsylvania

Mr. PADDOCK. If in order, I move that the Senate now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DORSEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I wish we could go into executive session for a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska that the Senate do now adjourn, on which the yeas and nays are ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

YEAS—Messrs. Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dorsey, Paddock, Patterson, and Spencer—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Barnum, Bayard, Blaine, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chaffee, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilin, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florica, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell. Morrill, Price, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, Stevenson, Teller, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—54.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Logan, McCreery, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Randolph, Robertson, and West—12.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the question is put I merely wish to say that I shall hope and beg the Senate to dispose of this bill to-night;

that is all. Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order. For what purpose does the Senator rise?

Mr. BAYARD. I rise to take the floor. I desire to take the floor at the commencement of the debate after the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Delaware. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until half past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate re-assembled at half past seven o'clock p. m. MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. George M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had appointed Mr. Milton J. Durham of Kentucky, Mr. Samuel N. Bell of New Hampshire, and Mr. Dudley C. Denison of Vermont, conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3156) to perfect the revision of the statutes of the United States.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 3575) granting a pension to Eliza A. Blaze, widow of Abner T. Blaze, late a private in Company C, Thirteenth Indiana Cavalry Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 3511) granting increased pension to Thomas G.

A bill (H. R. No. 3038) granting a pension to Almon F. Mills, late private Company K, Twenty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers;
A bill (S. No. 155) to amend sections 533, 556, 571, and 572 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to courts in Arkansas

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 4) authorizing Captain Temple and Lieutenant-Commander Whiting, of the Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

COUNTING OF THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I might have been content as a friend of this measure to allow it to go before the Senate and the country unaccompanied by any remarks of mine had it not been the pleasure of the Senate to assign me as one of the minority in this Chamber to a place upon the select committee appointed for the purpose of reporting a bill intended to meet the exigencies of the hour in relation to the electoral votes. There is for every man in a matter of such gravity his own measure of responsibility, and that measure I desire to assume. Nothing less important than the decision, into whose hands the entire executive power of this Government shall be vested in the next four years is embraced in the provisions of this bill. The election for President and Vice-President has been held, but as to the results of that election the two great political parties of the country stand opposed in serious controversy. Each party claims success for its candidate and insists that he and he alone shall be declared by the two Houses of Congress entitled to exercise the executive power of this Government for the next four years. The canvass was prolonged and unprecedented in its excitement and even bitterness. The period of advocacy of either candidate has passed and the time for judgment has almost come. How shall we who propose to make laws for others do better than to exhibit our own reverence for law and set the example here of subordination to the spirit of law?

It cannot be disguised that an issue has been sought, if not actually raised, in this country between a settlement of this great question by sheer force and arbitrary exercise of power or by the peaceful, orderly, permanent methods of law and reason. Ours is, as we are wont to boast, a Government of laws, and not of will; and we must not permit it to pass away from us by changing its nature.

O, yet a nobler task awaits thy hand, For what can war but endless war still breed?

By this measure now before the Senate it is proposed to have a peaceful conquest over partisan animosity and lawless action, to procure a settlement grounded on reason and justice, and not upon force. Therefore it is meant to lift this great question of determining who has been lawfully elected President and Vice-President of these United States out of the possibility of popular broils and tumult and elevate it with all dignity to the higher atmosphere of legal and judicial decision. In such a spirit I desire to approach the consideration of the subject and shall seek to deal with it at least worthily, with a sense of public duty unobscured I trust by prejudice or party animosity. The truth of Lord Bacon's aphorism that "great empire and little minds go ill together" should warn us now against the obtrusion of narrow or technical views in adjusting such a question and at such a time in our country's history.

Mr. Persident from the very compensement of the attempt to form

Mr. President, from the very commencement of the attempt to form the Government under which we live the apportionment of power in the executive branch and the means of choosing the Chief Magistrate have been the subject of the greatest difficulty. Those who founded this Government and preceded us in its control had felt the hand of this Government and preceded us in its control had felt the hand of kingly power, and it was from the abuse of executive power that they dreaded the worst results. Therefore it was that when the Constitution came to be framed that was the point upon which they met and upon which they parted, less able to agree than upon almost all others combined. A glance at the history of the convention that met at Philadelphia on the 14th of May, 1787, but did not organize until the 25th day of the same month, will show that three days after the convention assembled two plans of a constitution were presented respectively by Mr. Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, and Mr. Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina. The first proposed the election of the Executive by the Legislature, as the two Houses were then termed, for a term of seven years, with ineligibility for re-election. The other proterm of seven years, with ineligibility for re-election. The other proposed an election, but left the power to elect or the term of office in blank. Both of these features in the schemes proposed came early up for consideration, and, as I have said before, as the grave and able minds of that day approached this subject they were unable to agree, and accordingly, from time to time, the question was postponed and no advance whatever made in the settlement of the question. Indeed so vital and wide was the difference that each attempt made during the course of the five months in which that convention was assembled only seemed to result in renewed failure. So it stood until the 4th day of September had arrived. The labors of the convention by that time had resulted in the framing of a Constitution wise and good and time had resulted in the framing of a Constitution, wise and good and fairly balanced, calculated to preserve power sufficient in the Government, and yet leaving that individual freedom and liberty essential for the protection of the States and their citizens. Then it was that this question, so long postponed, came up for consideration and had to be decided. As it was decided then, it appears in the Constitution as subjunted to the States in 1727, but an appealment of the constitution as submitted to the States in 1787; but an amendment of the second article was proposed in 1804, which, meeting the approval of the States,

I must be pardoned if I repeat something of what has preceded in this debate, by way of citation from the Constitution of the United States, in order that we may find there our warrant for the present measure. There were difficulties of which these fathers of our Government were thoroughly conscious. The very difficulties that surround the question to-day are suggested in the debates of 1800. in which the history of double returns is forefold by Mr. Pinckney in his which the history of double returns is foretold by Mr. Pinckney in his objections to the measure then before the Senate. The very title of that act, "A bill prescribing a mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States," will show the difficulties which they then perceived and of which they felt the future was to be so full. They made the attempt in 1800 to meet those difficulties. They did not succeed. Again and again the question came before them. In 1824 a second attempt was made at legislation. It met the approval of the Senate. It seemed to meet the approval of the Committee on the Indicator of the House, by whom it was reof the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, by whom it was re-ported without amendment, but never was acted upon in that body, and failed to become a law. This all shows to us that there has been and failed to become a law. This all shows to us that there has been a postponement from generation to generation of a subject of great difficulty that we of to-day are called upon to meet under circumstances of peculiar and additional disadvantage; for while in the convention of 1787 there was a difference arising from interest, from all the infinite variances of prejudice and opinion upon subjects of local, geographical, and pecuniary interests, and making mutual concessions and patriotic considerations necessary at all times, yet they were spared the most dangerous of all feelings under which our country has suffered of late; for amid all the perturbing causes to intertry has suffered of late; for, amid all the perturbing causes to inter-fere with and distract their counsels, paraisan animosity was at least unknown. There the United States: There was in that day no such thing as political party in

Then none were for a party, But all were for the state.

Political parties were formed afterward and have grown in strength since, and to-day the troubles that afflict our country chiefly may be to arise from the dangerous excess of party feeling in our conneils.

But I propose to refer to the condition of the law and the Constitution as we now find it. The second article of the first section of the Constitution provides for the vesting of the executive power in the President and also for the election of a Vice-President. First it provides that "each State" shall, through its Legislature, appoint the number of electors to which it is entitled, which shall be the number of electors to which it is entitled. ber of its Representatives in Congress and its Senators combined. The power there is to the State to appoint. The grant is as complete and perfect that the State shall have that power as is another clause of the Constitution giving to "each State" the power to be represented by the Senators in this branch of Congress. There is given to the electors prescribed duties, which I will read:

The electors prescribed duties, which I will read:

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves: they shall not me in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

Then follows the data was a present of the presence of the senate and the votes shall then be counted.

Then follows the duty and power of Congress in connection with Then follows the duty and power of Congress in connection with this subject to determine the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they shall give their votes, which day shall be the same throughout the United States. The next clause provides for the qualifications of the candidates for Presidency and Vice-Presidency. The next clause gives power to the Congress of the United States to provide for filling the office of President and Vice-President in the event of the death resignation or inshill to of the incumbers to yest the of the death, resignation, or inability of the incumbents, to vest the powers and duties of the said office. The other clause empowers Congress thus to designate a temporary President. The other clauses simply relate to the compensation of the President and the oath he shall take to perform the duties of the office. Connected with that delega-tion of power is to be considered the eighth section of the first article which gives to the Congress of the United States power "to make all which gives to the Congress of the United States power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

It will be observed, so far, that the Constitution has provided the power but has not provided the regulations for carrying that power into effect. The Supreme Court of the United States sixty-odd years ago defines so well the character of that power and the method of its use that I will quote it from the first volume of Wheaton's Reports, page 326:

Leaving it to the Legislature from time to time to adopt its own means to effectuate, legitimate, and mold and model the exercise of its powers as its own wisdom and public interest should require.

In less than four years, in March, 1792, after the first Congress had assembled there was legislation upon this subject, carrying into execution the power vested by this second article of the Constitution in a manner which will leave no doubt of what the men of that day believed was competent and proper. Here let me advert to that authority which must ever attach to the contemporaneous exposition of historical events. The men who sat in the Congress of 1792 had many of them been members of the convention that framed the Federal Constitution. All were its contemporaries and closely were they considering with master minds the consequences of that work. Not only may we gather from the manner in which they treated this subject when they legislated upon it in 1792 what were their views of the powers of Congress on the subject of where the power was lodged and what was the proper measure of its exercise, but we can gather equally well from the inchoate and imperfect legislation of 1800 what those men also thought of their power over this subject, because, although differing as to details, there were certain conceded facts as to jurisdiction quite as emphatically expressed as if their propositions had been enacted into law. Likewise in 1824 the same instruction is afforded. If we find law. Likewise in 1824 the same instruction is afforded. If we find the Senate of the United States without division pass bills which although not passed by the co-ordinate branch of Congress are received by them and reported back from the proper committees after exam-ination and without amendment to the Committee of the Whole House, we may learn with equal authority what was conceded by those Houses as to the question of power over the subject. In a compilation made at the present session by order of the House committee, co-ordinate with the Senate committee, will be found at page 129 a debate containing expressions by the leading men of both parties in 1857 of the leaving service of the levil o 1857 of the lawfulness of the exercise of the legislative power of Congress over this subject. I venture to read here from the remarks of Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, one of the most respected and conservative minds of his day in the Congress of the United State minds of his day in the Congress of the United States.

The Constitution evidently contemplated a provision to be made by law to regulate the details and the mode of counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." By whom, and how to be counted, the Constitution does not say. But Congress has power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." Congress, therefore, has the power to regulate by law the details of the mode in which the votes are to be counted. As yet, no such law has been found necessary. The cases, happily, have been rare in which difficulties have occurred in the count of the electoral votes. All difficulties of this sort have been managed heretofore by the consent of the two Houses — a consent either implied at the time or declared by joint resolutions adopted by the Houses on the recommendation of the joint committee which is usually raised to prescribe the mode in which the view of the mode in which the President of the Senate and the tellers have acted. It was by this authority, as I understand it, that the President of the Senate acted yesterday. The joint resolution of the two Houses prescribed the mode in which the tellers were to make the count, and also required him to declare the result, which he did. It was under the authority, therefore, and by the direction of the two Houses that he acted. The resolutions by which the authority was given were according to unbroken usage and established precedent.

Mr. President, the debate from which I have read took place in

Mr. President, the debate from which I have read took place in 1857 and was long and able, the question there arising upon the pro-posed rejection of the vote of the State of Wisconsin, because of the delay of a single day in the meeting of the electors. A violent snow-storm having prevented the election on the 3d of December, it was held on the 4th, which was clearly in violation of the law of Con-gress passed in pursuance of the Constitution requiring that the votes for the electors should be cast on the same day throughout the Union. That debate will disclose the fact that the danger then became more and more realized of leaving this question unsettled as to who should determine whether the electoral votes of a State should be received or rejected when the two Houses of Congress should differ upon that subject. There was no arbiter between them. This new-fangled idea of the present hour, that the presiding officer of the Senate should decide that question between the two disagreeing Houses, had not yet been discovered in the fertility of political invention, or born perhaps of party necessity. The question has challenged all along through our country's history the ablest minds of the country; but at last we have reached a point when under increased difficul-ties we are bound to settle it. It arose in 1817 in the case of the State of Indiana, the question being whether Indiana was a State in the Union at the time of the casting of her vote. The two Houses disagreed upon that subject; but by a joint resolution, which clearly assumed the power of controlling the subject, as the vote of Indiana did not if cast either way control the election, the difficulty was tided over by an arrangement for that time and that occasion only. In 1820 the case of the State of Missouri arose and contained the In 1820 the case of the State of Missouri arose and contained the same question. There again came the difficulty when the genius and patriotism of Henry Clay were brought into requisition and a joint resolution introduced by him and adopted by both Houses was productive of a satisfactory solution for the time being. The remedy was merely palliative and the permanent character of the difficulty was confessed and the fact that it was only a postponement to men of a future generation of a question still unsettled.

It is not necessary, and would be fatiguing to the Senate and to myself, to give anything like a sketch of the debate which followed, of the able and eminent men on both sides who considered the question, arriving however at one admitted conclusion, that the remedy was needed and that it did lie in the law-making power of the Government to furnish it.

Thus, Mr. President, the unbroken line of precedent, the history of the usage of this Government from 1789 at the first election of Pres ident and Vice-President until 1873, when the last count of electoral votes was made for the same offices, exhibits this fact, that the control of the count of the electoral votes, the ascertainment and declation of the persons who were elected President and Vice-President, has been under the co-ordinate power of the two Houses of Congress, and under no other power at any time or in any instance. The claim is now gravely made for the first time, in 1877, that in the event of disagreement of the two Houses the power to count the electoral votes and decide upon their validity under the Constitution and law is vested in a single individual, an appointee of one of the Houses of Congress, the presiding officer of the Senate. In the event of a disagreement between the two Houses, we are now told, he is to asthe power, in his sole discretion, to count the vote, to ascertain and declare what persons have been elected; and this, too, in the face of an act of Congress, passed in 1792, unrepealed, always recognized, followed in every election from the time it was passed until the present day. Section 5 of the act of 1792 declares:

That Congress shall be in session on the second Wednesday in February, 1793, and on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors; and the said certificates, or so many of them as shall have been received shall then be opened, the votes counted, and the persons who shall fill the offices of President and Vice-President ascertained and declared agreeably to the Constitution.

Let it be noted that the words "President of the Senate" nowhere occurs in the section.

But we are now told that though "Congress shall be in session," that though these two great bodies duly organized, each with its presiding officer, accompanied by all its other officers, shall meet to perform the duty of ascertaining and declaring the true result of the action of the electoral colleges and what persons are entitled to these high execu-tive offices, in case they shall not agree in their decisions there shall be interposed the power of the presiding officer of one of the Houses to control the judgment of either and become the arbiter between them. Why, Mr. President, how such a claim can be supposed to rest upon authority is more than I can imagine. It is against all history. It is against the meaning of laws. It is not consistent with the language of the Constitution. It is in the clearest violation of the whole scheme of this popular government of ours, that one man should asscheme of this popular government of ours, that one man should assume a power in regard to which the convention hung for months undecided, and carefully and grudgingly bestowing that power even when they finally disposed of it. Why, sir, a short review of history will clearly show how it was that the presiding officer of the Senate became even the custodian of the certificates of the electors.

On the 4th September, 1787, when approaching the close of their labors, the convention discovered that they must remove this obstacle, and they must come to an agreement in regard to the deposit of this grave power. When they were scrupulously considering that no undue grant of power should be made to either branch of Congress, and when no one dreamed of putting it in the power of a single hand, the proposition was made by Hon. Mr. Brearly, from a committee of eleven, of alterations in the former schemes of the convention, which embraced this subject. It provided:

embraced this subject. It provided:

5. Each State shall appoint, in such manner as its Legislature may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Legislature.

6 The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for two persons, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; and they shall sign and certify, and transmit scaled to the seat of the General Government, directed to the President of the Senate.

7. The President of the Senate shall, in that House, open all the certificates; and the votes shall be then and there counted. The person having the greats number of votes shall be the President, if such number shall be a majority of the whole number of the electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such majority and have an equal number of votes, then the Senate shall choose by ballot one of them for President; but if no person have a majority then, from the five highest on the list the Senate shall choose by ballot the President. And in every case after the choice of the President the person having the greatest number of votes shall be Vice-President. But if there should remain two or more who shall equal votes, the Senate shall choose from them the Vice-President. (See Madison Papers—page 506, &c.)

Here we discover the reason why the President of the Senate was made the custodian of these certificates. It was because in that plan of the Constitution the Senate was to count the votes alone; the House was not to be present; and in case there was a tie or failure to find a majority the Senate was to elect the President and Vice-President. The presiding officer of the body that was to count the votes alone, of the body that alone was to elect the President in default of a of the body that alone was to clear the transfer of the body was naturally the proper person to hold the certificates until the Senate should do its duty. It might as well be said that because certificates and papers of various kinds are directed to the President of this Senate to be laid before the Senate that he should have the control to enact those propositions into law, as to say that because the certificates of these votes were handed to him he should have the right to count them and ascertain and declare what persons had been chosen President and Vice-President of the United States.

But the scheme reported by Mr. Brearly met with no favor. In the first place, it was moved and seconded to insert the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" after the word "counted." That was passed in the affirmative. Next it was moved to strike out the words "the Senate shall immediately choose by ballot" and insert the words "and House of Representatives shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for President, and the members of each State shall have one vote," and this was adopted by ten States in the affirmative to one State in the negative,

Then came another motion to agree to the following paragraph, giving to the Senate the right to choose the Vice-President in case of the failure to find a majority, which was agreed to by the convention; so that the amendment as agreed to read as follows:

The President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, shall open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for President, the representation from each Scate having one vote; but if no person have a majority, then from the five highest on the list the House of Representatives shall in like manner choose by ballot the President.

And then follows that if there should remain two candidates voted for as Vice-President having an equal vote the Senate shall choose from them the Vice-President. Mr. President, is it not clear that the Constitution directed that the certificates should be deposited with the presiding officer of that body which was alone to count the votes and elect both the President and Vice-President in case there was a failure to find a majority of the whole number of electors appointed? There is a maxim of the law, that where the reason ceases the law itself ceases. It is not only a maxim of common law, but equally of common sense. The history of the manner in which and the reason for which the certificates were forwarded to the President of the Senfor which the certificates were forwarded to the President of the Senate completely explains why he was chosen as the depositary and just what connection he had with and power over those certificates. After the power had been vested in the House of Representatives to ballot for the President, voting by States, after the presence of the House of Representatives was made equally necessary before the count could begin or proceed at all, the President of the Senate was still left as the officer designated to receive the votes. Why? Because the Senate is a continuing body because the Senate always has a group of the senate in the senate in the senate in the senate is a continuing body because the Senate always has a group of the senate in the senate in the senate in the senate is a continuing body because the Senate always has a group of the senate in the senate is a continuing body, because the Senate always has a quorum. Divided into three classes, there never is a day or a time when a quorum of the Senate of the United States is not elected and cannot be summoned to perform its functions under the Constitution. Therefore you had the officer of a continuing body, and as the body over which he presided and by whom he is chosen was one of the two co-ordinate bodies to perform the great function of counting the votes and of ascertaining and declaring the result of the electoral vote, he was left in charge of the certificates.

You also find in the sixth section of the act of 1792 that Congress exercised its regulating power and declared "that in case there shall be no President of the Senate at the seat of Government on the arrival of the persons intrusted with the lists of votes of the electors, then such persons shall deliver the lists of votes in their custody into the office of the Secretary of State to be safely kept and delivered over as soon as may be to the President of the Senate."

What does this signify? That it was a simple question of custody, of safe and convenient custody, and there is just as much reason to say that the Secretary of State being the recipient of those votes had a right to count them as to say that the other officer designated as the recipient of the votes, the President of the Senate, had a right to count them.

Now here is another fact a denial of which cannot be safely chal lenged. Take the history of these debates upon the formation or the Federal Constitution from beginning to end, search them, and no line Take the history of these debates upon the formation of the or word can be discovered that even suggests any power whatever in any one man over the subject, much less in the President of the Sen-ate, in the control of the election of the President or the Vice-Presi-Why, sir, there is the invariable rule of construction in regard to which there can be no dispute, that the express grant of one thing excludes any other. Here you have the direction to the President of the Senate that he shall receive these certificates, or if absent that another custodian shall receive them, hold them during his absence, and pass them over to him as soon as may be, and that then he shall in the presence of the two Houses of Congress "open all the certificates." There is his full measure of duty; it is clearly expressed; and then after that follows the totally distinct duty, not confided to him, that "the votes shall then be counted."

I doubt very much whether any instrument not written by an inspired hand was more clear, terse, frugal of all words except those necessary to express its precise meaning, than the Constitution of the United States. It would require the greatest ingenuity to discover where fewer words could be used to accomplish a plain end. How shall it be that in this closely considered charter, where every word every punctuation was carefully weighed and canvassed, they should employ seven words out of place when two words in place would have fulfilled their end f If it had been intended to give this officer the power to count, how easy to read, "The President shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open and count the votes." Why resort to this other, strained, awkward, ungrammatical, unreasonable transposition of additional words to grant one power distinctly and leave the other to be grafted upon it by an unjust implication? No, Mr. President, if it were a deed of bargain and sale, or any question of private grant, if it did not touch the rights of a great people, there would be but one construction given to this language, that the expression of one grant excluded the other. It was a single command to the President of the Senate that, as the custodian, he should honestly open those certificates and lay them before the two Houses of Congress who were to act, and then his duty was done, and that was the belief of the men who sat in that convention, many of whom joined in framing the law of 1792 which directed Congress to be in session on a certain day and that the votes should be counted and the persons who should fill the office of President and Vice-President ascertained and declared agreeably to the Constitution.

The certificates are to be opened by their custodian, the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives. Let it be noted this is not in the presence of the Senators and Representatives, but it is in the presence of two organized bodies who cannot be present except as a Senate and as a House of Representatives, each with its own organization, its own presiding officer all adjuncts, each organized for the performance of a great duty.

When the first draughts of the Constitution were made, instead of saying "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives," they called it "the Legislature." What is a Legislature? A law-making body organized, not a mob, but an organized body to make laws; and so the law-making power of this Union, consisting of these two Houses, is brought together. But it seems to me a most unreasonable proposition to withhold from the law-making power of this Government the authority to regulate this subject and yet be willing to intrust it to a single hand. There is not a theory of this Government that will support such a construction. It is contrary to the whole genius of the Government; it is contrary to everything in the history of the formation of the Government; it is contrary to the usage of the Government since its foundation.

The President of the Senate is commanded by the Constitution to open the votes in the presence of the two Houses. He does not summon them to witness his act, but they summon him by appointing a day and hour when he is to produce and open in their presence all the certificates he may have received, and only then and in their presence can he undertake to open them at all. If he was merely to summon them as witnesses of his act it would have been so stated. But when did the President of the Senate ever undertake to call the two Houses together to witness the opening and counting of the votes? No, sir; he is called at their will and pleasure to bring with him the certificates which he has received, and open them before them and under their inspection, and not his own. When the certificates have been opened, when the votes have been counted, can the President of the Senate declare the result? No, sir, he has never declared a result except as the mouth-piece and the organ of the two Houses authorizing and directing him what to declare, and what he did declare was what they had ascertained and in which ascertainment he had never interfered by word or act.

Suppose there shall be an interruption in the count, as has occurred in our history, can the President of the Senate do it? Did he ever do it? Is such an instance to be found? Every interruption in the count comes from some member of the House or of the Senate, and upon that the pleasure of the two Houses is considered, the question to them to withdraw if they desire, and the count is arrested until they shall order it to recommence. The proceeding in the count, the commencement of the count is not in any degree under his control. It is and ever was in the two Houses, and in them alone. They are not powerless spectators; they do not sit "state statues only," but they are met as a Legi-lature in organized bodies to insure a correct result of popular election, to see to it that "the votes shall then be counted" agreeably to the Constitution.

In 1792 when some of the men who sat in the convention that framed the Constitution enacted into law the powers given in relation to the count of the electoral votes, they said, as I have read, that the certificates then received shall be opened and the votes counted, "and the persons to fill the offices of President and Vice-President ascertained agreeably to the Constitution," and that direction is contained in the same section of the law that commands Congress to be in session on that day. It is the law-making power of the nation, the Legislature, that is to perform this solemn and important duty, and not a single person who is selected by one branch of Congress and who

a single person who is selected by one branch of Congress and who is removable at their will, according to a late decision of the Senate.

Yes, Mr. President, the power contended for by some Senators, that the President of the Senate can, in the contingency of a disagreement between the two Houses, from the necessity of the case, open and count the vote, leads to this: that upon every disputed vote and upon every decision a new President of the Senate could be elected; that one man could be selected in the present case to count the vote of Florida; another, of South Carolina; another, of Oregon; another, of Louisiana; and the Senate could fill those four offices with four different men, each chosen for that purpose, and when that purpose was over to be displaced by the same breath that set them up for the time being.

Now, sir, if, as has been claimed, the power of counting the votes is deposited equally in both Houses, does not this admission exclude the idea of any power to count the votes being deposited in the presiding officer of one of those Houses, who is, as I say, eligible and removable by a bare majority of the Senate and at will? If the presiding officer of the Senate can thus count the vote the Senate can control him. Then the Senate can control the count and the Senate appointing their President become the sole controllers of the vote in case of disagreement. What then becomes of the equal measure of power in the two Houses over this subject? If the power may be said to exist only in case of disagreement, and then ex necessitate rei, all that remains for the Senate is to disagree, and they themselves have created the very contingency that gives them the power, through their President, to have the vote counted or not counted, as they may desire. Why, sir, such a statement destroys all idea of equality of power

between the two Houses in regard to this subject.

When the President of the Senate has opened the certificates and handed them over to the tellers of the two Houses in the presence of the subject of the subj the two Houses, his functions and powers have ended. He cannot repossess himself of those certificates or papers. He can no longer control their custody. They are then and thereafter in the possession and under the control of the two Houses, who shall alone dispose of them.

Why, sir, what a spectacle would it be, some ambitious and un-scrupulous man the presiding officer of the Senate, as was once Aaron Burr, assuming the power to order the tellers to count the vote of this State and reject the vote of that, and so, boldly and shamelessly reverse the action of the people expressed at the polls, and step into the Presidency by force of his own decision. Sir, this is a reduction of the thing to an absurdity never dreamed of until now, and impossible while this shall remain a free Government of law.

Now, Mr. President, as to the measure before us a few words. It will be observed that this bill is enacted for the present year, and no longer.

This is no answer to an alleged want of constitutional power to pass it, but it is an enswer in great degree where the mere policy and temporary convenience of the act are to be considered.

In the first place the bill gives to each House of Congress equal power over the question of counting, at every stage.

It preserves intact the prerogatives, under the Constitution, of each House.

It excludes any possibility of judicial determination by the presiding officer of the Senate upon the reception and exclusion of a vote.

The certificates of the electoral colleges will be placed in the possession and subject to the disposition of both Houses of Congress in joint session.

The two Houses are co-ordinate and separate and distinct. Neither can dominate the other. They are to ascertain whether the electors have been validly apppointed and whether they have validly performed their duties as electors. The two Houses must under the act of 1792 "ascertair and declare" whether there has been a valid election, according to the Constitution and laws of the United States. The votes of the electors and the declaration of the result by the two Houses give a valid title, and nothing else can, unless no majority has been disclosed by the count; in which case the duty of the House is to be performed by electing a President and of the Senate of electing a Vice-President. If it be the duty of the two Houses "to ascertain" whether the action of the electors has been in accordance with the Constitution they must inquire. They exercise supervisory power over every branch of public administration and over the electors. The methods they choose to employ in coming to a decision are such as the two Houses, acting separately or together, may lawfully employ. Sir, the grant of power to the commission is in just that measure, no more and no less The decision they render can be overruled by the concurrent votes of the two Houses. Is it not competent for the two Houses of Congress to agree that a concurrent majority of the two Houses is necessary to reject the electoral vote of a State! If so, may they not adopt means which they believe will tend to produce a concurrence? Finally, sir, this bill secures the great object for which the two Houses were brought together: the counting of the votes of the electoral college; not to elect a President by the two Houses, but to determine who has been elected agreeably to the Constitution and the laws. It provides against the failure to count the electoral vote of a State in event of disagreement between the two Houses in case of single returns, and, in cases of contest and double returns, furnishes a tribunal whose composition secures a decision of the question in disagreement and whose perfect justice and impartiality cannot be gainsaid or doubted.

The tribunal is carved out of the body of the Senate and out of the body of the House by their vote viva roce. No man can sit upon it from either branch without the choice openly made by a majority of the body of which he is a member that he shall go there. judges who are chosen are from the court of last resort in this country, men eminent for learning, selected for their places because of the virtues and the capacities that fit them for this high station. I was pained to hear the Senator from Ohio who spoke yesterday [Mr. Sherman] referring to the language of the bill naming the circuits geographically arranged from which the four judges should be chosen, leaving to them by a majority to select their own means of choosing the fifth of their number. I was pained, I say, to hear him in his desire to defeat this measure suggest that these four upright and dignified jurists should find a fifth man by playing a game of cards or casting dice for his appointment. Sir, the inference was most unjust. It was not creditable to the Senator who made it. It is scarcely worth while to say how unjust it is to the tribunal upon whom it reflected.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, as my friend makes rather a criticism on me, I ask him to read the language of the bill to the Senate, to see whether I did not draw a fair, legal, and just inference from that lauguage in saying that these supreme judges may if they choose draw cards, throw dice, or do anything else to determine the chance in exact harmony with the language of the bill? Will the Senator

Mr. BAYARD. The language of the bill is:

On the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, A. D. 1877, or as soon thereafter as may be, the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States now assigned to the first, third, eighth, and ninth circuits shall select, in such manner as a majority of them shall deem fit, another of the associate justices of said court, which five persons shall be members of said commission; and the person longest in commission of said five justices shall be the president of said commission. The members of said commission shall respectively take and subscribe the following oath. scribe the following oath.

Here we find five judges of our highest court, four selected by the bill, those four, in such manner as a majority of them shall deem fit, to select one of their brethren from the bench to make the fifth in this tribunal, and yet the honorable Senator—

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend allow me to ask him one question and I will not interrupt him further, and I do not know that he ought to answer it. I will ask him whether the committee did not propose and contemplate a proposition to make this draw by chance propose and contemplate a proposition to make this draw by chance in the body of the commission; that is, the members of the two Houses. I ask because it was so published in the newspapers all over the country. I do not know that my friend ought to answer; perhaps I ought not to put the question; but it has been stated that the element of chance was to decide this fifth judge, and that was the impression that I had. It is the impression that other Senators here have; and if that was not contemplated by the committee the Senator can readily relieve us all and relieve the committee from that imputation because if he tells me that they did not contemplate that imputation, because if he tells me that they did not contemplate that this fifth judge was to be selected by chance, I would regard it at once as the absolute truth and would withdraw any supposition

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I was discussing the bill before the Senate. I read the language of this bill. If the Senator thinks that the inference that he drew from this language which he read, which he has heard read just now, warrants him in stating that it is probable that this fifth judge is to be chosen by a gambling operation by the other four, I shall be surprised to hear him re-affirm it. It was in his exceeding anxiety to oppose the bill and throw discredit upon it that he did, whether inadvertently or not, or from what motive I do not speak, and he certainly did for the purpose of imputing to this bill an intent which I say is perfectly foreign to everything we can imagine in regard to the action of such officers and men as are now under discussion. That induced me to comment upon it. I am aware the honorable Senator has very little to say against the bill and therefore he is glad to create, if he may, interpretations unjust and unfavorable upon it, to asperse-for such it is-the character of these distinguished men in advance of their action. Sir, I apprehend that when these four distinguished jurists come to execute this, which will be as high a duty as they ever did or can perform, as any public men in any land can perform, they will approach it in a spirit worthy of the functions which they are to perform, and that nothing friv-olous, much less disreputable, will mark their course in carrying out olous, much less disreputable, whi man their duties under this section.

Mr. President, objection has been made to the employment of the commission at all, to the creation of this committee of five Senators, five Representatives, and five judges of the Supreme Court, and the contract the objection have not been distinctly stated. The reasons for the appointment I will dwell upon briefly.

Sir, how has the count of the vote of every President and Vice-President from the time of George Washington and John Adams in 1789 to the present day been made? Always and without exception by tellers appointed by the two Houses. This is without exception. Even in the much-commented case of Mr. John Langdon, who, before the Government was in operation, upon the recommendation of the constitutional convention, was appointed by the Senate its President for the sole purpose of opening and counting these votes. He did it, as did every successor to him, under the motion and authority of the two Houses of Congress, who appointed their own agents, called tellers, to conduct the count, and whose count being reported to him was by him declared.

From 1793 to 1865 the count of votes was conducted under concurrent resolutions of the two Houses, appointing their respective committees to join "in ascertaining and reporting a mode of examining the rotes for President and Vice-President."

The respective committees reported resolutions fixing the time and place for the assembling of the two Houses, and appointing tellers to conduct the examination on the part of each House respectively.

Mr. President, the office of teller or the word "teller" is unknown to the Constitution, and yet each House has appointed tellers and has acted upon their report, as I have said, from the very foundation of the Government. The present commission is more elaborate, but its objects and its purposes are the same, the information and instruction of the two Houses who have a precisely equal share in its creation and organization; they are the instrumentalities of the two Houses for performing the high constitutional duty of ascertaining whom the electors in the several States have duly chosen President and Vice-President of the United States. Whatever is the jurisdiction and power of the two Houses of Congress over the votes and the judgment of either reception or rejection, is by this law wholly conferred upon this commission of fifteen. The bill presented does not define what that jurisdiction and power is, but it leaves it all as it is, adding nothing, subtracting nothing. Just what power the Senate by itself or the House by itself, or the Senate and the House acting together, have over the subject of counting, admitting, or rejecting an electoral vote in case of double returns from the same State, that power is by this act, no more and no less, vested in the commission of iffteen men; reserving, however, to the two Houses the power of over-ruling the decision of the commission by their concurrent action.

The delegation to masters in chancery of the consideration and adjustments of questions of mingled law and fact is a matter of familiar and daily occurrence in the courts of the States and of the United

The circuit court of the United States is composed of the district judge and circuit judge, and the report to them of a master is affirmed unless both judges concur in overruling it.

Under the present bill the decision of the commission will stand unless overruled by the concurrent votes of the two Houses

I do not propose to follow the example which has been set here in the Senate by some of the advocates as well as the opponents of this measure, and discuss what construction is to be given and what defi-nition may be applied or ought to be applied in the exercise of this power by the commission under this law. Let me read the bill:

All the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of each State shall be opened, in the alphabetical order of the States, as provided in section 1 of this act, and when there shall be more than one such certificate or paper, as the certificates and papers from such State shall so be opened, (excepting duplicates of the same return,) they shall be read by the tellers, and therupon the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such States are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration; which decision shall be made in writing.

It will be observed that all the questions to be decided by this com-

It will be observed that all the questions to be decided by this commission are to be contained in the written objections. objections are read and filed, their contents must be unknown, and the issues raised by them undescribed. But whatever they are, they are submitted to the decision of the commission. The duty of interpreting this law and of giving a construction to the Constitution and existing laws is vested in the commission; and I hold that we have no right or power to control in advance, by our construction, their sworn judgment as to the matters which they are to decide. We would defeat the very object of the bill should we invade the essential power of judgment of this commission and establish a construction in advance and bind them to it. It would, in effect, be giving to them a mere mock power to decide by leaving them nothing to

I heard the question asked of the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] by his colleague [Mr. Thurman] the other day, why it was that he should have been condemned a year or so ago for not giving a construction to a certain act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments." Why, sir, that act was, in all giving a construction to a certain act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments." Why, sir, that act was, in all its terms, mandatory. It commanded the Secretary of the Treasury to do a certain act. Now, what we meant him to do was what we should have expressed; and when an order was given by Congress, it was but reasonable to ask, "What construction do you put upon your own order?" And it was such a question the honorable Senator [Mr. Sherman] declined to answer, or to say what he meant in his orders to the Secretary of the Treasury. But in the present case we submit the decision as to the matters in question their over index their over index. bunal, and we command them to do nothing but exercise their own judgment. What that judgment will be we cannot foretell and we have no right to ask. It is their judgment we seek. What does this commission decide? It is to pass upon cases of double returns. As to single returns there is no submission to it. What does it decide? That a certain one of two returns is the true return from a State. This decision being made, the returns are reduced in number to a single recision being made, the returns are reduced in number to a single return. The case assumes the condition contemplated by section 1 of the bill, relating to votes from any State from which but one return has been received, and which can be rejected only by the affirmative vote of the two Houses, the power of the two Houses is precisely the same in either case, and under both sections of the bill; nothing more of their power is relinquished in one case than in the

Mr. President, there are certainly very good reasons why the concurrent action of both Houses should be necessary to reject a vote. It is that feature of this bill which has my heartiest concurrence; for I will frankly say that the difficulties which have oppressed me most in considering this question a year or more ago, before any method had been devised, arose from my apprehensions of the continued absorption of undue power over the affairs of the States; and I here declare that the power and the sole power of appointing the electors is in the State, and nowhere else. The power of ascertaining whether the State has executed that power justly and according to the Constitution and laws is the duty which is cast upon the two Houses of Congress. Now, if, under the guise or pretext of judging of the reg-ularity of the action of a State or its electors, the Congress or either House may interpose the will of its members in opposition to the will of the State, the act will be one of usurpation and wrong, although I do not see where is the tribunal to arrest and punish it except the great tribunal of an honest public opinion. But, sir, that tribunal, though great, though in the end certain, is yet ofttimes slow to be awakened to action; and therefore I rejoice when the two Houses agree that neither of them shall be able to reject the vote of a State which is without contest arising within that State itself, but that the action of both shall be necessary to concur in the rejection.

If either House may reject, or by dissenting cause a rejection, then it is in the power of either House to overthrow the electoral colleges or the popular rote, and throw the election upon the House of Representatives. This, it is clear to me, cannot be lawfully done unless no candidate has received a majority of the votes of all of the electors appointed. The sworn duty is to ascertain what persons have been chosen by the electors, and not to elect by Congress.

It may be said that the Senate would not be apt to throw the election into the House. Not so, Mr. President; look at the relative majorities of the two Houses of Congress as they will be after the 4th of March next. It is true there will be a numerical majority of the members of the democratic party in the House of Representatives; but the States represented will have a majority as States of the republican party. If the choice were to be made after March 4, then a republican Senate, by rejecting or refusing to count votes, could of its own motion throw the election into the House; which, voting by States, would be in political accord with the Senate. The House of Representatives, like the present House in its political complexion, composed of a numerical majority and having also a majority of the States of the same party, would have the power then to draw the election into its own hands. Mr. President, either of these powers would be utterly dangerous and in defeat of the object and intent of would be utterly dangerous and in detent of the constitutional provisions on this subject.

Sir, this was my chief objection to the twenty-second joint rule.

Under that rule either House of Congress, without debate, without law, without reason, without justice, could, by the sheer exercise of its will or its caprice, disfranchise any State in the electoral college.

Under that rule we lived and held three presidential elections.

In January, 1873, under a resolution introduced by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] and adopted by the Senate, the Committee on Privileges and Elections, presided over by the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] proceeded to investigate the elections held in the States of Louisiana and Arkansas, and inquired whether these elections had been held in accordance with the Constiwhether these elections had been held in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of said States, and sent for persons and papers and made thorough investigation, which resulted in excluding the electoral votes of Louisiana from the count. (See Report No. 417, third session Forty-second Congress.)

The popular vote was then cast, and it was cast at the mercy of a majority in either branch of Congress, who claimed the right to annul it by casting out States until they should throw the election into a resulting these of Popular States until they should throw the election into a republican House of Representatives. I saw that dangerous power then, and, because I saw it then, am I so blind, am I so without principle in my action, that I should ask for myself a dangerous power that I refused to those who differ with me in opinion? God forbid.

This concurrence of the two Houses to reject the electoral votes of a State was the great feature that John Marshall sought for in 1800. The Senate then proposed that either House should have power to reject a vote. The House of Representatives, under the lead of John Marshall, declared that they should concur to reject the vote, and upon that difference of opinion the measure fell and was never revived. In 1824 the bill prepared by Mr. Van Buren contained the same whole-some principle and provided that the two Houses must concur in the rejection of a vote. Mr. Van Buren reported this bill in 1824. It was amended and passed, and, as far as I can find from the record, without a division of the Senate. It was referred in the House of Representatives to the Committee on the Judiciary and it was reported back sentatives to the Committee on the Judiciary and it was reported back by Mr. Daniel Webster, without amendment, to the Committee of the Whole House, showing their approval of the bill; and that principle is thoroughly incorporated in the present measure and gives to me one of the strong reasons for my approval.

Mr. President, this bill is not the product of any one man's mind, but it is the result of careful study and frequent amendment. Mutual concessions, modifications of individual preferences, were constantly and necessarily made in the course of framing such a measure as it now stands. My individual opinions might lead me to object to the employment of the judicial branch at all, of ingrafting even to any extent political power upon the judicial branch or its members, or confide to them any question even quasi-political in its character. or confide to them any question even quasi-political in its character. To this I have expressed and still have disinclination, but my sense of the general value of this measure and the necessity for the adoption of a plan outweighed my disposition to insist upon my own preferences as to this feature. At first I was disposed to question the constitutional power to call in the five justices of the Supreme Court, but the duty of ascertaining what are the votes, the true votes, under the Constitution, having been imposed upon the commission, the methods were necessarily discretionary with the two Houses. Any and every aid that intelligence and skill combined can furnish may why, sir, the members of the Supreme Court have in the history of this country been employed in public service entirely distinct from judicial function. Here lately the treaty of Washington was negotiated by a member of the Supreme Court of the United States; the venerable and learned Mr. Justice Nelson, of New York, was nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate as one of the joint high commission. Chief-Justice Jay was sent in 1794, while he was Chief-Justice of the United States, as minister plenipotentiary to England and negotiated a treaty of permanent value and importance to both countries. He was holding court in the city of Philadelphia at the time that he was nominated and confirmed, as is found by reference to his biography, and-

Without vacating his seat upon the bench he went to England, negotiated the treaty which has since borne his name, and returned to this country in the spring of the following year.

His successor was Chief-Justice Rutledge, and the next to him was Chief-Justice Oliver Ellsworth. He, while holding the high place of Chief-Justice, was nominated and confirmed as minister plenipoten-By a law of Congress the Chief-Justice of the United States is ex officio the president of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. MORTON. I would inquire of the Senator whether that was an office to which Chief Justice Ellsworth was appointed and confirmed according to the Constitution? Chief-Justice Ellsworth went as minister to Spain; was that an office to which he was appointed and confirmed?

Mr. BAYARD. I do not consider the action of these justices upon the present commission as independent offices. I think it is nothing in the world but the employment of an officer in a manner useful to the country and not forbidden by the Constitution or by the policy of our law. That is all. I confine myself to the statement of their employment in the present case, and I mention the fact of their employment in these other conspicuous instances for the purpose of showing that it is proper, safe, discreet, and constitutional not to impose this duty upon them, but to create the duty and allow them to assume it; and I take it for granted in this case that we are dealing with men who being called upon to render service so high and important to their country that it is impossible with a knowledge of their character to suppose they would for a moment decline to per-

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator, if it does not interrupt him, whether he regards the five judges acting on this commission as acting in their character as judges of the Supreme Court, if that is their official character, and that this bill simply enlarges their jurisdiction in that respect?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly not, Mr. President. They are not acting as judges of the Supreme Court, and their powers and their jurisdiction as judges of the Supreme Court are not in any degree involved; they are simply performing functions under the Government not inconare simply performing functions under the Government not inconsistent, by the Constitution, or the law, or the policy of the law, with the stations which they now hold. So I hold that the employment of one or more of the Supreme Court indges in the matter under discussion was appropriate legislation. We have early and high authority in the majorities in both House and Senate in the bill of 1800, in both of which Houses a bill was passed creating a commission similar to that proposed by this bill and calling in the Chief-Justice of the United States as the chairman of the grand committee, as they called it then a commission as we term it now.

As has been said before, many of the Senators and members of the Congress of 1800 had taken part in the convention that framed the Constitution and all were its contemporaries, and one of the chief act-Constitution and all were its contemporaries, and one of the contemporaries in the proceedings on the part of the House of Representatives was John Marshall, of Virginia, who one year afterward became the Chief-Justice of the United States, whose judicial interpretations have since that time clad the skeleton of the Constitution with muscles of robust power. Is it not safe to abide by such examples? And I could name many more, and some to whom my respect is due for other and

In the debate of 1817, in the case of the disputed vote of Iudiana; In the debate of 1817, in the case of the disputed vote of Indiana; in 1820, in the case of Missouri; and again in 1857, in the case of Wisconsin, I find an array of constitutional lawyers who took part in those debates, among them the most distinguished members of both political parties, concurring in the opinion that by appropriate legislation all causes of dispute on this all-important matter of counting the electoral vote could be and ought to be adjusted satisfactorily. Why, sir, even the dictum of Chancellor Kent, that has been read here with so much apparent confidence by the honorable Senator from Indiana, is itself expressed to be his opinion of the law "in the abnce of legislation on the subject.

Mr. President, there were other objections to this bill; one by the honorable Senator from Indiana. He denounced it as "a compromise. I have gone over its features and I have failed to discover, nor has the fact yet been stated in my hearing, wherein anything is compromised. What power of the Senate is relinquished? What power of the House is relinquished? What power that both should possess is withheld? is relinquished? What power that both should possess is withheld? I do not know where the compromise can be, what principle is surrendered. This bill intends to compromise nothing in the way of principle, to compromise no right, but to provide an honest adjudica-tion for the rights of all. Where is it unjust? Whose rights are endangered by it? Who can foretell the judgment of this commission upon any question of law or fact? Sir, there is no compromise in any sense of the word, but there is a blending of feeling, a blending of opinions in favor of right and justice.

But, sir, if it were a compromise, what is there in compromise that is discreditable either to men or to nations? This very charter of government under which we live was created in a spirit of compromise and mutual concession. Without that spirit it never would have been made, and without a continuance of that spirit it will not be prolonged. Sir, when the committee on style and revision of the Federal convention of 1787 had prepared a digest of their plan, they reported a letter to accompany the plan to Congress, from which I take these words as being most applicable to the bill under consideration:

And thus the Constitution which we now present is the result of a spirit of autity and of that mutual deference and concession which the peculiarity of our political situation rendered indispensable.

The language of that letter may well be applied to the present measure; and had the words been recalled to my memory before the report was framed I cannot doubt that they would have been adopted as part of it to be sent here to the Senate as descriptive of the spirit and of the object with which the committee had acted.

But, sir, the honorable Senator also stated, as a matter deterring us from our proper action on this bill, that the shadow of intimidation had entered the Halls of Congress and that members of this commit-tee had joined in this report and presented this bill under actual fear of personal violence. Such a statement seems to me almost incredible. I may not read other men's hearts and know what they have felt, nor can I measure the apprehension of personal danger felt by the honorable Senator. It seems to me incredible. Fear, if I had it, has been the fear of doing wrong in this great juncture of public af-fairs, not the fear of the consequences of doing right. Had there been this intimidation teufold repeated to which the Senator has alluded, and of which I have no knowledge, I should have scorned myself had I hesitated one moment in my onward march of duty on this subject.

what are they to a man who, in the face of events such as now confront us, is doing that which his conscience dictates to him to do? It front us, is doing that which his conscience dictates to him to do? It has been more than one hundred years since a great judgment was delivered in Westminster Hall in England by one of the great judges of our English-speaking people. Lord Mansfield, when delivering judgment in the case of the King against John Wilkes, was assailed by threats of popular violence of every description, and he has placed upon record how such threats should be met by any public man who sees before him the clear star of duty and trims his bark only that he may follow it through darkness and through light. I will ask my friend from Missouri if he will do me the favor to read the extract to which I have alluded.

But here, let me pause.

It is fit to take some notice of the various terrors hung out; the numerous crowds which have attended and now attend in and about the hall, out of all reach of hearing what passes in court, and the tunults which, in other places, have shame-fully insulted all order and government. Audacious addresses in print dictate to us from those they call the people, the judgment to be given now and afterward upon the conviction. Reasons of policy are urged from danger to the kingdom by commotion and general confusion.

Give me leave to take the opportunity of this great and respectable audience to let the whole world know all such attempts are vain.

I pass over many anonymous letters I have received. Those in print are public; and some of them have been brought judicially before the court. Whoever the writers are, they take the wrong way. I will do my duty, unawed. What am I to fear? That merdax infama irom the press, which daily coils false facts and false motives? The lies of calumny carry no terror to me. I trust that my temper of mind, and the color and conduct of my life, have given me a suit of armor against these arrows. If, during this king's reign, I have ever supported his government, and assisted his measures, I have done it without any other reward than the consciousness of doing what I thought right. If I have ever opposed, I have done it upon the points themselves, without mixing in party or faction, and without any collateral views. I hough tright. If I have ever opposed, I have done it upon the points themselves, without mixing in party or faction, and without any collateral views. I hough tright. If I have ever opposed, I have done it upon the points themselves, without mixing in party or faction, and without any collateral views. I hough tright in the popularity; but it is that popularity which soone or later, never fails to do justice to the pursuit of noble ends by noble means. I will not do that which my conscience tells me is wrong upon this o

The threats go further than abuse: personal violence is denounced. I do not believe it; it is not the genius of the worst men of this country in the worst of times. But I have set my mind at rest. The last end that can happen to any man never comes too soon, if he falls in support of the law and liberty of his country, (for liberty is synonymous to law and government) Such a shock, too, might be productive of public good; it might awake the better part of the kingdom out of that lethargy which seems to have benumbed them; and bring the mad part back to their senses, as men intoxicated are sometimes stunned into sobriety.—Burrows's Reports No. 4, pages 2561, 2562, 2563.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, in the course of my duty here as a representative of the rights of others, as a chosen and sworn public servant, I feel that I have no right to give my individual wishes, prejudices, interests, undue influence over my public action. To do so would be to commit a breach of trust in the powers confided to me. It is true I was chosen a Senator by a majority only, but not for a majority only. I was chosen by a party, but not for a party. I represent all the good people of the State which has sent me here. In my sent all the good people of the State which has sent me here. In my office as a Senator I recognize no claim upon my action in the name and for the sake of party. The oath I have taken is to support the Constitution of my country's Government, not the fiat of any political organization even could its will be ascertained. In sessions preceding the present I have adverted to the difficulty attending the settlement of this great question, and have urgently besought action in advance at a time when the measure adopted could not serve to predicate its results to other the measure adopted could not serve to predicate its results to other them. advance at a time when the measure adopted could not serve to predicate its results to either party. My failure then gave me great uneasiness, and filled me with anxiety; and yet I can now comprehend the wisdom concealed in my disappointment, for in the very emergency of this hour, in the shadow of the danger that has drawn so nigh to us, has been begotten in the hearts of American Senators and Representatives and the American people a spirit worthy of the occasion—born to meet these difficulties, to cope with them, and, God willing, to con-

Animated by this spirit the partisan is enlarged into the patriot. Before it the lines of party sink into hazy obscurity; and the horizon which bounds our view reaches on every side to the uttermost verge of the great Republic. It is a spirit that exalts humanity, and important that the little is the same of the party side of the party size of the same of the great Republic. It is a spirit that exalts humanity, and imbued with it the souls of men soar into the pure air of unsellish devotion to the public welfare. It lighted with a smile the cheek of Curtius as he rode into the gulf; it guided the hand of Aristides as he sadly wrote upon the shell the sentence of his own banishment; it dwelt in the frozen earth-works of Valley Forge; and from time to time it has been an inmate of these halls of legislation. I believe it is hear taken and that the great halls of legislation. is here to-day, and that the present measure was born under its influence

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I shall not detain the Senate long with what I have to say upon this bill.

Many times heretofore in the history of our country have presidential elections occurred, after earnest and heated canvasses between two or more great political parties; contests in which not only all partisan passions and prejudices but all the honest patriotic impulses of our people have been aroused to nearly if not quite the same extreme pitch of intensity as in the election of last November; but in all of them the result, so far at least as depended upon the votes of the people, was so decisive or well known and understood, and the fact so clearly ascertained that one of the candidates had been beaten and the other elected, or that no one had the majority of the votes and the election must go to the House where the result must be clearly ascertained in accordance with the plain provisions of the Constitution, that no great strain upon the foundation principles of our institutions was felt, and little apprehension of actual disruption of the Government or of civil commotion or internecine war to arise from any contest growing out of the ascertainment of the result.

All the American people ever demanded in this respect was the fair, legal, and therefore satisfactory determination of the result in the mode established by the Constitution and the laws; and this having been always until the present year thus easily ascertained, that party or those parties, those portions of our citizens who saw their wishes defeated, like true patriots and true American citizens, submitted, as I believe, as I trust I may say I know they always will, to the will of the majority ascertained in the plain, constitutional, and legal way, knowing that in four short years they would have the opportunity for renewing the contest and again appealing to the people for the triumph of their principles; and that without such loyal submission the maintenance of popular government would be impossible. But now at length, in the last year of the first century of our independent national existence, has for the first time occurred a presidential election at the close of as earnest and heated a contest between the two great political parties as ever occurred in our hisbetween the two great political parties as ever occurred in our history, in which every partisan passion and prejudice as well as every sentiment of patriotism has been aroused to the utmost; and though the smoke of the battle rapidly cleared away, and the result was seen in all but two or three States, it was at once seen to be so close as to depend upon these two or three States over which the dense clouds still rested, shrouding in painful uncertainty the question of victory or defeat as the final result of the great conflict. Over two of them at least those clouds instead of clearing away only became more dense and impenetrable day after day, flashing forth only the forked tongues of rumors and contradictory reports and double returns: tengues of rumors and contradictory reports and double returns; charges on one side of fraud, of violence, and intimidation exercised against large masses of voters, of repeating and stuffing of ballot-boxes; and upon the other of falsifying returns, of frauds by canvassers and election boards, with just enough of plausibility and of evidence in reference to each to confirm in the minds of the masses of each party the conviction that it had fairly carried the election in of each party the conviction that it had fairly carried the election in those States; every day rendering each more confident of the result in its own favor, and that any contrary result would be the triumph of falsehood, violence, frand, or trickery. This conviction was growing stronger in the minds of the masses of each party day by day. It was, and is, beyond question in the minds of the masses of each party throughout the whole country an honest and intense conviction; and just because of, and just in proportion to, the honesty and intensity of the country in the winds of the masses of each party throughout the whole country an honest and intense conviction; sity of this conviction in the minds of the respective parties-one of whom must be wrong, if not to some extent both-that those conflicting conclusions and convictions became dangerous and portentficting conclusions and convictions became dangerous and portent-ous of evil. For while all would readily yield to what they are sat-isfied is a fair mode of decision, and cheerfully abide the result though against their most ardent wishes, patriotism, intelligent patriotism itself, may often and properly doubt whether a quiet yield-ing to fraud or violence may not tend to encourage the like wrongs in future, and thus to increase and perpetuate them, and whether, therefore, it is not better upon the whole, to meet it with resistance in limine, even at the risk of civil discord and actual war, than to encourage and promote the wrong by tame submission. At all events, an honest and firm conviction in the minds of half the people in a popular government like ours, that their wishes have been crushed or violence and that their opponents have obtained possession of the Government by such means would in itself be a serious calamity to the country by weakening their confidence in and attachment to the government thus in their opinion wrongfully placed in power over them.

Such being the opposite but honest convictions of our people of the opposing parties, I have regretted and deplored the excesses of par-tianship on both sides, which have driven many doubtless honest men, with a zeal as I am compelled to think beyond their knowledge and with a zeal as I am compelled to think beyond their knowledge and appreciation of the temper and disposition of our people, to advocate very questionable measures or modes of deciding the result of the election—some merely technical, others merely bold and reckless, as if the Presidency could be boldly and defiantly seized by trick, by fraud, or by threats of force on either side, which if it could succeed would put an end to all hopes of safe and orderly republican or popular government in this country if not in the rest of the world.

All such schemes contemplate a decision by a single party to the contest, and all therefore threaten, if not the present peace of the country, at least the permanency of republican government; and as such they have created serious apprehensions in the public mind of great and impending dangers. Capitalists dare not invest; business men dare not incur the ordinary risks; laboring men are thrown out of employment, and a feeling of uncertainty and alarm has seized upon a large portion of our people. The whole country is looking with anxiety and keen solicitude to the wisdom and patriotism of Congress anxiety and keen solicitude to the wisdom and patriotism of Congress to devise some fair and satisfactory method of settling the disputed result of the presidential election. And I confess I have not myself been without serious apprehensions lest the madness of party spirit should prevent the adoption of any plan for settling this momentous question which should be entirely fair to both parties and therefore likely to be cordially acquiesced in by all. And whatever attributes of personal courage or recklessness I might possess—and I certainly did not fear any immediate collision—I felt that I had no right to try rash experiments, or by any inconsiderate action of my own to put at hazard the interests and the welfare of so many millions of people. ple.

In any of the ancient republics, in any other republic of modern times, in any popular government among any people not by long habit accustomed to reverence and ready submission to law, and fully appreciating the necessity of such submission to the orderly administration of government, such a crisis would have led to total disruption of the Government and ended in anarchy or the rule of the

But, while I have had my apprehensions, I have at the same time felt a strong confidence in the good sense and patriotism of the American people, and that the able men of both parties in this and the other House would be able to devise some plan of deciding the controversy House would be able to devise some plan of deciding the controversy which would make the result satisfactory to the great masses of our population and strengthen their confidence in the Government. Though not presenthere when the committees of the two Houses were appointed, I had high hopes, from the character and ability of the men composing the committees, that some substantially fair plan would be the result. But I hardly dared to hope for the adoption of any plan so absolutely and equally fair to both parties, and so likely to produce entire satisfaction and the willing obedience of all to the final result, whatever that may be as the plan which the committees have been whatever that may be, as the plan which the committees have been able to present. I hail it as the bright bow of promise in our troubled political sky, all the more welcome and cheering as the harbinger of peace and fraternal feeling that it comes before the tempest and deluge of excitement, of partisan animosity and public discontent, which would have been sure to agitate and imbitter the minds of one-half of our population had the decision either way been made through any of the one-sided and unfair methods previously proposed by either

I congratulate the committee that in the midst of so much partisan excitement they have been able to agree upon such a plan with so near an approach to unanimity. And I congratulate the American people who will see, and rejoice to see in this result, what the exascerbations of partisan zeal had lately made them doubt, that some at least of our leading political men—I hope the mass of them—though earnest and zealous partisans, are yet true-hearted American citizens; that they can be patriots and statesmen as well as partisans; that they are partisans because they are patriots—zealous for the success of their respective parties, as a means to a noble end, because they consider their own peculiar policy best for the common good and the national welfare.

Mr. President, I do not propose to go into the argument at length upon the constitutionality of the proposed measure. This duty has been so ably and so thoroughly performed and the constitutionality of the bill so clearly demonstrated by the Senators from Vermont and the bill so clearly demonstrated by the Senators from Vermont and New York and the other members of the committee specially charged with the duty of considering the question, that it would be useless and unprofitable for me to go over the same ground. I could only follow them with very unequal steps, and I will not make the vain attempt to gild refined gold or paint the lily, yet there are two or three objections which have been raised to the constitutional validity of this measure to which I will barely allude.

The provisions of the bill in reference to cases where there is but one return from a State are so obviously fair, and so entirely in accordance with my own views as expressed here at the last session, that no further comment is necessary by me.

The subsequent provisions of the bill in reference to cases where there is more than one return from the same State are intended not simply to determine how or by whom the votes are to be counted, in the mere arithmetical sense, about which there never was and never will be any difficulty, but to provide a method of deciding which or whether either is the true and valid return and what "rotes," if any, are to "be counted." This is, in its nature, more a judicial than a legislative or political question. It is a mixed question of law and fact, growing out of transactions which have already occurred.

I have not been able to discover any objection to this portion of the bill on constitutional grounds.

the bill on constitutional grounds.

The Senator from Indiana, a few days since, argued the question, judging from the precedents which he cited in proof of his propositions, as if the question were one merely of "counting" the votes in the arithmetical sense; whereas the real question involved and argued by the other members of the committee was, the proper mode of ascertaining what were the "votes" which should be counted.

And though it should be admitted that the precedents have, as as-And though it should be admitted that the precedents have, as asserted by the Senator from Indiana, been wholly uniform from the foundation of the Government that the President of the Senate counted and certified that he had counted the votes, (which I think is not true since the election of 1824 or 1828.) still all this has no bearing upon the real question here involved. There is not a single precedent, from the first institution of the Government to the present day, showing that the President of the Senate ever decided, or assumed to decide, between two conflicting returns from the same State. And when the Senator speaks of the uniform course since the organtraction of the Government for the President of the Senate to "count the votes," which is true, if at all, only in the arithmetical sense, he does not touch nor even approach the real question involved, and which is, in the first instance, to be decided by the commission created by the bill.

Mr. President, I had not intended to have said anything further upon any point of objection made to this bill until this afternoon. As to the objection that the members of this commission will be officers of the United States and are therefore required by the Constitution to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, it is, in my view, sufficient to say that this bill only devolves upon persons already properly in office certain new powers in the nature of public trusts, and does not create any new officers. The Constitution itself makes the distinction between an office and a public trust. Article 6, last clause, makes the distinction between an office and a public trust.

And in reply to the objection that this bill is an attempt to delegate to a distinct body powers vested by the Constitution in Congress, I will only say that it does not attempt to transfer to this commission the power of final decision of the question of election, nor to divest itself of that power or to relieve itself from its exercise when the final and decisive action is required. But the commission is made ancillary or auxiliary to Congress for the purpose of ascertaining facts and considering the legal questions involved upon principles analogous to those which apply to a committee or a referee, and providing that their determination shall stand as the decision unless overruled by the two Houses. The whole judicial power by the constitutions of the several States is vested in certain courts. But will it be questhe several States is vested in certain courts. But will it be questioned that such courts may be authorized to appoint referees in a court of law or a master in chancery, whose report shall be confirmed and judgment or a decree entered upon it unless overruled by the court? And would it make any difference when the judges of the court happened to be equally divided and the report could not be overruled? I am inclined to think such a law would be valid unless there were some other or peculiar provision of the Constitution that should forbid it. should forbid it.

I now call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] for a moment to what I have to say in reply to the objection which he has made to the bill. My friend the Senator from Massachusetts objects to this bill because he says it allows this commission to determine for itself the extent of its jurisdiction. And in illustrating what he seems to think the absurdity of the bill in this respect, he says that in Massachusetts, when they establish a court, the law creating it always defines its jurisdiction, instead of leaving the court to determine it. And so, and for this reason he insists that this bill ought to declare whether this commission shall have the right to go into or consider evidence behind the returns. Now, with all deference to my friend, I must say that but for this suggestion it never would have occurred to me that this was a question of jurisdiction. I should certainly have said, and am compelled to say now, that to me it seems to be only a question of the admissibility of evidence unme it seems to be only a question of the admissibility of evidence unler existing laws; nothing more, nothing less. And taking his own illustration, I will ask my friend if there is anything in the constitution or any practice of legislation in his State which requires that whenever a court is established the act creating the court must declare the particular kinds of evidence upon which alone it could proceed. I do not by this mean that this commission created by this bill is a court; but so far as it is analogous to a court it seems to me his illustration is an unfortunate one for his argument.

I will say further, that the words in this bill which allow the commission to go behind the returns if competent so to do under existing laws neither add anything to nor take anything from the powers they would have under existing laws, if these words were left out. The other language of the bill submitting to them the law and the facts for consideration, would give them the right to go behind the returns.

for consideration, would give them the right to go behind the returns, if such evidence would be competent under existing laws.

if such evidence would be competent under existing laws.

But I will say further that I am opposed to this amendment, and every other amendment which would make the bill fairer to one side than to the other, or even appear to do so. In saying this I do not mean to express by the slightest implication that I think they would have the right to go behind the returns, nor do I here mean to express any opinion upon that question one way or the other.

Mr. President, it seems to have been assumed by many of the politicians and partisans in and out of Congress that all the members of the commission created by the bill, whether taken from the Senate, the House, or the Supreme Court, will necessarily, or as a matter of course, be governed in their decision by the partisan views, partisan the House, or the Supreme Court, will necessarily, or as a matter of course, be governed in their decision by the partisan views, partisan bias, or partisan prejudices of the political parties to which they respectively belong, or with which they have generally voted, and without reference to the real merits of the legal questions involved. But while this may be true of mere partisans and mere pettifoggers, who sometimes intrude upon and always pollute when they do intrude upon the province of judicial investigation and judicial decision, I must enter my earnest protest against this argument when it is to be applied to lawyers and jurists of the high legal attainments, reputation, and self-respect which I take it for granted will be possessed by the gentlemen who will be selected by the respective Houses as members of this commission, and especially to the judges of the Supreme Court, who will be solemnly sworn to discharge their duties according to the Constitution and the laws. My own observation and some slight knowledge of the mode of exercising judicial functions satisfy me that all such conclusions are false, scandalous, and unjust; that eminent and reputable members of the bar who have been elevated to the bench, if they have a particle or vestige of self-respect, elevated to the bench, if they have a particle or vestige of self-respect or any regard for their oaths, their reputations, or the good or evil fame which is to follow the performance of judicial duties, will at once feel the importance, the vital importance of exercising judicial imfeel the importance, the vital importance of exercising judicial impartiality, forgetting or promptly suppressing the habit of looking only to one side of the case as a mere advocate, and at once appreciating the necessity of giving due attention to the real merits and the weight of argument upon both sides, and above all to watch and promptly to check in their own minds the influence of party bias or prejudice. No, I will not, I dare not think so meanly of the legal profession, to say nothing of the members of the most august judicial tribunal in the world, as to take it for granted that, notwithstanding their solemn oaths, they will sacrifice their own self-respect, the respect of their fellow-citizens, and their fair fame in the history of their country, for any paltry consideration of mere party or partisan advantage. I will never believe that such men will thus degrade and prostitute their high functions and crush out their own self-respect until the damning fact shall be made clear by unimpeachable evidence. When all confidence shall thus be lost in the integrity of the judicial character, farewell at once and forever to all hopes of liberty and law.

And now, in conclusion, I will say that this bill, being equally and obviously fair to both parties, that party which shall reject it without offering something equally fair will, if the other party accepts it, in my judgment, forfeit the support of the people, and necessarily, if not descreedly go down.

In my Judgment, for left the support of the people, and necessarily, in not deservedly, go down.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me a minute? I should like to say a few words in reply to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. THURMAN. I shall not speak so long that the Senator cannot say them very well after I am done.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will give me five minutes, it will restrict me.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will give me live minutes, it will gratify me.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well, I will do so.

Mr. DAWES. The concluding words of the remarks of the Senator from Michigan are so exactly what I should like to say myself that I hardly think it possible that our views could be so far apart. The Senator, however, is not entirely accurate when he says that I object to the bill because of some doubt about the jurisdiction of the commission which it creates. I do not object to the bill, nor do I object to what is considered by those who have thus far advocated the bill to be the jurisdiction conferred. I object to certain phraseology in the bill because the t phraseology, I am told, has been put into the bill to meet different and antagonistic views; and, under that phraseology, men holding different views are authorized to say that the language of this bill is broad enough to cover their views. Inasmuch as my friend from Michigan, as well as the distinguished Senator from New York, both disclaim any such construction upon this language, New York, both disclaim any such construction upon this language, at the same time admitting that without this equivocal language it could not command the support of those that maintain the very thing which they disclaim, anxious to make this bill as perfect as possible, and with a desire that it shall accomplish just what the Senator from Michigan hopes it will, and because with him I do not desire that the bill shall give to one side any advantage whatever that it does not accord to the other, I want this bill to be explicit and to express what the Senator from New York and what the Senator from Michigan agree with me it could be expressed as the Conwith me it ought to express, and what they agree with me the Constitution itself commands.

This phraseology which troubles me, and which the Senator says is nothing but a questical of the admission of evidence, covers the whole jurisdiction. It is in this language that jurisdiction is given to the commission. After these double returns are committed to this commission, the only jurisdiction they acquire and the only power to adjudge and determine they have is gathered from the papers to be submitted to them:

And may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law—

Which my friend from Michigan says does not alter it allbe competent and pertinent in such consideration

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The Senator from Massachusetts must certainly have misunderstood me, for I said expressly that I intended to express no opinion whatever upon that point.

Mr. DAWES. Then I am the more surprised that the Senator from Michigan is not willing to express an opinion upon the point whether the functions of the State authorities are to be taken possession of by the functions of the State authorities are to be taken possession of by this commission; whether this commission can, if it see fit, turn itself into a returning board for Louisiana, or a board of canvassers for the State of Michigan, or take to itself the functions which the laws of Massachusetts have clothed the governor and the council of that State with, to say what is its voice, to say whom it has made an elector. If my distinguished friend from Michigan is unwilling to east the beautiful beautiful the says there where a beautiful in page 2000 and 1000 are the beautiful to the says the say that because there are those whose support is necessary to this bill who will not give it that support unless its language may be so uncertain and equivocal that they can claim that it is broad enough to lead them to this conclusion, then I regret very much that this measure, if it has my support, must have it, feeling that he and I surrender to the necessities of this bill that bulwark of State rights without which the States cease to elect a President and the two Houses of Congress benceforward become the body that is to choose Houses of Congress henceforward become the body that is to choose the President of the United States.

It is because I want to make this bill clear and speak the language of the Senator from Michigan and speak the language of the Senator from New York, that I desire to strike out of it any words that convey an uncertain sound, and they are these words. For what purpose, as has been well asked, are they to take into consideration any paper, or testimony, or deposition that is pertinent, unless we point out what is pertinent by our declaration? This is all the more necessary if there are several and diverse interpretations of the Constitution itself. It is competent to us under the Constitution to enlarge or tion itself. It is competent to us under the Constitution to enlarge or tion itself. It is competent to is under the constitution, make it greater to limit and confine the jurisdiction of this commission, make it greater or less under the Constitution as seems proper and just in our eyes. If in the limit of the Constitution we do not know where that leads us, inasmuch as we are not agreed where that limit is, it becomes us, it seems to me, to set up the milestones ourselves under that Constitution.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, if there were fit opportunity I should be disposed to discuss this bill more fully perhaps than I ever yet have discussed a measure in the Senate. I should be disposed to give at very considerable length, and with much historic illustration and many references to authorities, the reasons which have brought my mind to the conclusion to support this bill and to support it earnestly; and also with something of boldness, and no small reference to authority and the opinions of able men who have lived in this country and whose names are revered to attempt to show that not one single and thority and the opinions of able men who have I'ved in this country and whose names are revered, to attempt to show that not one single point of opposition that has been made against the bill can be sustained by sound reasoning or by any respectable authority. But I am admonished by the lateness of the hour, by the fatigue of the Senate, by I might say a regard for the health of the Senate and my own, to forego what I should so much wish to perform. Therefore the remarks that I shall submit will be comparatively brief. Indeed I have been said so much more ably by those who have preceded me deed I have been so well anticipated in much that I would say, and it has been said so much more ably by those who have preceded me in support of the bill than I could say it, that it is not a matter of regret to me that I am confined to a limited space of time. I want especially to express the gratification with which I have listened to the speech just made by the Senator from Michigan, who took so clear, so lawyer-like, and so judicial a view of the subject.

Mr. President, it has been said that this bill is novel. It is novel neither in principle nor in its frame-work; and he who thinks it is novel must think so because he has not carefully studied the Constitution of his country or read its history with profit. Again, it has been said that it goes outside of the Constitution. It does not go outside of the Constitution, unless the opinions of the most eminent men who have lived since the Government was formed are worthy of no regard. Again, it is said that it constitutes a court to decide a single and existing case. Why, sir, if that were true, the ease to be decided by it is one of such transceadent importance, one upon which decided by it is one of such transcendent importance, one upon which the interest and prosperity, and perhaps the peace of forty-odd millions depend, a question so transcendent that the very perpetuity of the Republic itself may depend upon its peaceable solution—if it were so that the bill constitutes a court for the decision of a single case, there never was greater reason teconstitute a court. Before the importance of this subject other jurisdictions sink into comparative insignificance. If the tribunal to be created by this bill shall render a judgment that in the opinion of enlightened history shall be a sound, and honest, and just judgment, it will be one of the grandest tribunals in the minds of students and in the reverence of the people of this Republic that ever sat in this land.

Again, it has been said that the bill provides for a secret tribunal. There is not a word in the bill that looks to secrecy. This tribunal may sit in public or in private, just as a court sits in public and consults in private. It may do the one or the other. It may do as we did in the impeachment case, hear the evidence and the arguments in public, and then, as a court does, retire to its chamber to consult upon its judgment; but there is no more injunction to secrecy in this tribunal than there was upon the Senate in the trial of the impeachment or than there is upon the Supreme Court of the United States

Again, it is said that it will give the making of the President to one man. Assuming that the five Senators who are chosen will be so partisan, that the five Representatives who are chosen will be so so partisan, that the five kepresentatives who are chosen will be so partisan, that the five judges who may be on that tribunal may be so partisan and corrupt that every one of them, disregarding his honor, disregarding his obligation to truth and to law and to justice, disregarding the solemn oath that he is to take as a member of the commission, will be so corrupt that he will have no other guide for his decision than the behest of party, it is said that the decision will be that of one man, as the fifteenth member happens to be a democrat or a republican. I say with teenth member happens to be a democrat or a republican. I say with the Senator from Michigan that if the public men of this country have reached that depth of corruption and degradation our institu-tions have lasted too long. It is time to cease to have judges of your Supreme Court; it is time to cease to honor and to respect Senators and Supreme Court; it is time to cease to honor and to respect Senators and Representatives in Congress; it is time to cease to ask the people to yield a willing obedience to the laws and a willing and reverential obedience to the decisions of the courts, if those who constitute the highest officers in all the land, members of the highest judicial tribunal, members of the highest legislative assembly, are so utterly corrupt that they are willing to be forsworn, in the decision of a cause submitted to them, at the behest of their party. I do not believe it, and I believe it the less that I come from the committee that reported this bill; and after three weeks' constant labor on that reported this bill; and after three weeks' constant labor on that committee, I say now, democrat as I am and firm as a democrat can be, that I would be willing to submit the decision of this cause to that committee itself; because I did see in the deliberations of that committee, I did feel it in the very atmosphere that surrounded us, that when the appropriate content of the co that when the emergency comes, when the trial comes, men can rise above party, and that they do rise above it.

But, sir, a very novel objection was started by my colleague, and although it is a little out of order to notice it now I will dispose of it at once. Speaking of the fact that it would require the concurrence of the two Houses to overrule the decision of this tribunal, he quotes a provision in the Constitution which is in these words, a familiar provision of the Constitution :

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

Why, did my colleague forget that that provision has reference solely to legislation, purely and entirely to legislation; that it is in that part of the Constitution that defines the legislative power? Does he suppose that, in deciding who has been elected President of the United States by the people, Congress exercises a legislative power? Does he suppose that we legislate a man into the Presidency? Does he not know that all our duty is to ascertain who has a majority of the votes of all the electors are interested and that that is a majority of the votes of all the electors appointed, and that that is a quasi-judicial, and not a legislative, function † Does he not know one thing further, that we are to inquire if any man has received a majority and who that man is, and, if not, then to ascertain that no man has received a majority; and then the Constitution says what shall be the consequence? There is not one particle of legislation involved in any such thing, and the

is not one particle of legislation involved in any such thing, and the clause of the Constitution to which my colleague refers on this subject has no more to do with it than a chapter in the Koran.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it does not disturb my colleague, I would ask what cases can be give where a concurring vote of the two Houses is required except in the exercise of legislative authority?

Mr. CONKLING. Amending the Constitution, for example.
Mr. SHERMAN. That is legislative.
Mr. THURMAN. The twenty-second joint rule, for example.
Mr. SHERMAN. That is admitted to be void.
Mr. THURMAN. O, admitted, is it?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is void now; it was not proper legislation; and my colleague concurred in voting it out of existence.

Mr. THURMAN. If my colleague will give me room to say it, I never had a chance to vote it out of existence that I ever heard of myself.

Mr. SHERMAN. I again repeat my question, for I wish it answered.

Mr. THURMAN. It is answered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Congress is the law-making power of this countries of the concurrence of the concurre try, and I ask my colleague to tell me what cases require the concurrence of the two Houses that are not of a legislative character. Making a constitution is legislative and the question about an amendment to the Constitution. Tell me the cases and then I perhaps shall have my doubt removed. I used this argument simply to show that the two Houses were not invested with the power, by concurring votes, of rejecting a vote, because, according to the plain language of the Constitution, every concurring vote of the two Houses must be submitted to the President, and it could not be possible that the framers of the Constitution contemplated that a vote in the count of presidential electors should be submitted to the President.

Mr. THURMAN. If my colleague is right, then it follows that, if we proceed to count the votes without any rule at all, and an objection is made to a count, and the two Houses separate, and we concur in either admitting the vote or rejecting it, we must send a message up here to the White House to ask President Grant whether he agrees our proceeding!

Mr. EDMUNDS. And wait ten days for an answer.
Mr. THURMAN. And wait ten days, until we get a veto message or an approval.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary, I denied that the framers of the Constitution would do so silly a thing. They have provided that every concurring vote of the two Houses shall be submitted to the President, and therefore I say it is not possible that they contemplated that the two Houses should, by a concurring vote, count a President in or count a President out.

Mr. THURMAN. Ishould like to know from my colleague, although he interrupts the thread of my argument, who is to count, in his esti-

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already stated it.
Mr. THURMAN. Who?
Mr. SHERMAN. I will repeat it. I believe that the count proair. Shekman. I will repeat it. I believe that the count provided for by the Constitution, according to the established forms, is the mere reading of certain acts of the State governments in accordance with their laws, noted down by the presiding officer of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses, they no doubt having more ate in the presence of the two Houses, they no doubt having more or less to do in counting those votes; precisely what, has never been ascertained either by law or otherwise. If I have the leave of my colleague, I would be glad to say that what I assert is this: that they simply tabulate the results of the acts of States; they have no right to make electors for the States. All they do is to read over and tabulate the votes cast by the electors and announce the result.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well, now we will begin to count. If this bill pass we will go at it alphabetically. We come to Colorado, and here is an objection that Colorado is not a State, just as there was in respect to Missouri in 1821, just as there was in respect to Missouri in 1821, just as there was in respect to Missouri in 1821, just as there was in respect to Missouri in 1821, just as there was in respect to Missouri in 1821, just as there was in respect to Missouri in 1821, just as there was in respect to Missouri in 1821, just as there was in respect to Missouri in 1821, just as there was in respect to Missouri in 1821, just as there was in respect to Missouri in 1821, just as there was in respect to Indiana in respect to Missouri in 1821, just as there was in respect to Indiana in 1817. Then who is to decide it? My colleague has not told us yet who is to decide it. He says that the Houses are to have more or less to do with that question. I do not care whether they are to have to do with that question. I do not care whether they are to have more or whether they are to have less; the two Houses have something to do with it, and that implies that they are to vote upon it, and then, according to his logic, they send the vote to the other end of the Avenue, and wait ten days to know what the President thinks

No, Mr. President, that will not do at all. I certainly mean to treat my colleague with the highest respect, but in the haste of speaking he has laid down a proposition that will not bear investigation, and so I dispose of it.

It has been further said that this bill infringes the prerogative of the President of the Senate. After the argument of the Senator from Vermont and of the Senator from New York I shall certainly not speak upon that point. I have one single remark, however, to make to those who are talking about adhering to precedents, and who say that we want no law, that all we have to do is to go on as we have done for eighty years or more. I want to say to them that I defy any man to show me one single instance in which the President of the Senate ever decided a disputed question in respect to an electoral vote. You cannot find in all our history one single instance. The only time that ever there was an expression by a President of the Senate upon that subject was the positive disclaimer by Mr. Mason that he had any such authority. So much for that.

Now I come to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts,

[Mr. Dawes.] Really I should have liked very much better if the Senator from Massachusetts had come out boldly against the bill, for his amendment is a dagger-thrust at the heart of the bill and nothing less. He says that this bill is framed because of conflicting views. He is entirely right about that. If there had been no conflicting views in respect to the interpretation of the Constitution among the members of the Senate and the members of the House of Representatives, and between the two Houses, there would be no necessity what-ever for the bill. If both Houses were agreed that no vote should be counted unless both Houses concurred in receiving it, there would be no necessity for a bill. If we were all agreed that no vote should be be no necessity for a bill. If we were all agreed that no vote should be rejected unless both Houses concurred in rejecting it, there would be no necessity for a bill. It is simply because there are these conflicting opinions and that in the present position and posture of affairs these conflicting opinions are likely to plunge the country into discord, to paralyze business, paralyze trade, unsettle the habits and opinions of the people, destroy respect for the Government and jeopard the best interests of the Republic, that a mode of getting out of this difficulty is provided by the bill. Have Senators reflected how numerous are the points upon which there are conflicting opinions on this subject? Let me enumerate a few of them. I will not say a few, either, but not all by any means.

When your committee got together, after a free and friendly con-When your committee got together, after a free and friendly conversation and discussion of the subject, and the reading of no small amount of history, it was soon discovered that to frame a bill upon the idea of defining by law what the Constitution means, settling that by law, would be a simple impossibility, and that no such bill could pass; for you could not frame a bill according to the onetheory or the other opposite theory without its being supposed that it gave advantage to one party or to the other party. In the present circumstances of our country, and as the majorities of the two Houses are of different polities, it was perfectly clear that any bill that gave the least advantage. politics, it was perfectly clear that any bill that gave the least advantage, ay, the weight of the dust in the balance, to either party, could not become the law of the land. Therefore it was that we did not attempt to do what the Senator from Massachusetts thinks is so easy to do, namely, to interpret the Constitution in a statute. It would have been the most idle work that ever sane men attempted had we tried to do any such thing. All that we could do was to constitute a tribunal as honest and impartial and fair as we could make it, as likely to be intelligent and learned and honest as we could find, and as likely to command the respect of the country as any we could frame, and submit to that as we submit to our supreme judicial tribunal, the Supreme Court of the United States, the constitutional questions that are involved in this subject. Is there anything strange or novel in that? Is there a constitutional question or can there be one that we do not submit to the final arbitrament of the Supreme Court of the United States? In a case like this, where there is no opportunity of any such submission, where such a submission would be of doubtful constitutionality in view of the power conferred by implication at least upon Congress, is there anything strange in getting the aid, the advice, the judgment of a tribunal so carefully framed to make it houest, to make it able, to make it learned, to make it command the honest, to make it able, to make it learned, to make it command the respect of the country, as the tribunal provided for in this bill? Is there anything strange in that, and especially is there anything strange in it when the two Houses of Congress, being charged with this great duty, reserve the power to overrule the decision of that tribunal and to decide otherwise, if the two Houses consider its decision to be wrong? I should like to know where there is anything that is justly subject to censure in a proposition like that.

But I said that I would state some of the conflicting opinions upon the interpretation of the Constitution to show with what your con-the interpretation of the Constitution to show with what your committee had to grapple, and to show what would be the field of inquiry upon which we should have to enter if we were to take the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts and proceed to interpret the Constitution by statutory provisions. Let us see what they are. One proposition is that both Houses must concur to count the vote. That is a proposition very strongly and very logically supported by able men. On the other hand, it is said that the true interpretation is that both Houses must concur to reject a vote. Right upon that fundamental question, so important, there is a direct antagonism of opinion. That is number one.

Let us go to number two. It is said that the two Houses act as one body, as a joint convention, in counting the vote, and the opone body, as a joint convention, in counting the vote, and the opposite opinion is that they act as separate organized bodies; the first opinion having the sanction of the great name of Mr. Jefferson and nearly all his supporters in 1800. The second proposition, directly antagonistic to the first, having the support of the more practical men of later times, and, indeed, it had the opinion of the party in the majority in 1800 in the Government. There is the second case of directly arteresistic consistency.

Let us proceed to a third, that the House of Representatives is the sole judge whether there has been an election, and the opposite opinion is that the House is not the sole judge, but that the Senate has an equal right to decide. What more important question than that was or could be mooted? What question more fundamental in its character could be considered? And yet here are the most antagonistic opinions upon it. Writer after writer, men who have been chiefjustices of the supreme courts of their States, men who have held positions in the highest judicial tribunals of the land, are out in elaborate opinions on one side or the other side of that great question. How are you to decide that in a bill and expect it to pass both Houses of Congress?

That is the third. Let us proceed to the fourth; that touches the amendment. It is that it is competent to go behind the certificate of the governor, and the directly opposite opinion that it is not competent to go behind the certificate of the governor.

The fifth is that it is competent to go behind the decision of a canvassing or returning board, and in opposition that it is not competent to do so. Are you going to decide that question and are you going to decide that in a bill? The Senator from Massachusetts intimates that if his amendment be put in the bill there are certain Senators here who will not vote for it. He is quite right. He knows he is right. He knows it would not get one vote on this side of the Chamber and it would not get one vote of a particular party in the other end of the Capitol, and yet he urges it, and still he talks about being in favor of the bill. Why, sir, upon that question and upon other questions we are obliged to submit in the first instance to this tribunal, composed as it is, to decide, reserving to ourselves power to reverse its decision if the two Houses can agree to reverse it.

This question of going behind a returning board has a great many points in it. The Senator from Massachusetts seems to think that the only point in going behind a returning board is whether we can go clear to the bottom and find out how seven millions of people vote. If he says that he is opposed to that, I say so am I. But that is one thing. Going behind the decision of a returning board is quite another thing. And that brings me to notice this point of difference. It is held by some that the decision of a returning board may be impeached for want of jurisdiction and by another set that it cannot be. I commend that to my friend from Massachusetts who is a lawyer. On the one side it is said that every act done by any tribuual from the highone side it is said that every act done by any tribunal from the highest court in the country to that of a single individual, if it is beyond his jurisdiction, is utterly null and void, and that returning boards are no exception to this rule, and if they, beyond their jurisdiction, ultra vires, undertake to disfranchise people, every act of disfranchisement is utterly null and void. On the other hand, this proposition is denied. Let me submit to my friend from Massachusetts that the decision of the proposition the one way or the other does not take him down to the seven millions of voters who cast their votes at the last presidential election nor one step toward it. Furthermore let me tell him that that does not even touch the integrity of the returning board, for, if these returning boards had been composed of the eleven him that that does not even fouch the integrity of the returning board, for, if these returning boards had been composed of the eleven apostles after Judas Iscariot had hung himself and were they as pure as human tribunals could be, yet, if they went beyond their jurisdiction, in the opinion of some men their acts would be utterly void. Then, sir, comes another question: Supposing them not to have gone beyond their jurisdiction, but to have acted fraudulently, some say that their decision may be impeached for the fraud. because fraud vitiates everything, even the decisions of a court, and others say that no such inquiry is admissible at all.

Then it is said that if the decision of a returning board can be reviewed the decision of all other election officers may in like manner.

viewed the decision of all other election officers may in like manner be reviewed, and so you would have to review the decision of the one or two or three hundred thousand election officers in all the United States and see whether they complied with the law or not. other hand, it is said that no such absurdity follows. That is the eighth case of conflicting opinion.

Then the ninth case is this: It is said that, if the acts or omissions of election officers can be reviewed, the qualifications of the voters, the people themselves, and all the circumstances of the election, of bribery, intimidation, &c., may be inquired of; and that proposition is denied on the other side.

Then the tenth case is: that the decision of the highest State court as to the powers of her returning board is conclusive. The opposite opinion is that it is not conclusive.

Then the eleventh case of antagonism is that in adjudicating what are electoral votes the strict rules of courts of law must govern in the

are electoral votes the strict rules of courts of law must govern in the reception of testimony; and the opposite opinion that a broader rule, the parliamentary rule of evidence, is the true rule.

Now, sir, not to fatigue the Senate with further illustrations, here are eleven clear and well-stated propositions upon which the most directly antagonistic opinions are held, and the decision of any one of these propositions in this bill, if it could be made, would most probably decide the present contest in regard to who is President-elect. How then could anybody expect that your committee would undertake a task that would make their bill a felo de se, that would he certain to defeat it and hold them up as more partisans or as men be certain to defeat it and hold them up as mere partisans or as men without sense in the conduct of public affairs?

Sir, we took the only course that was open to us. We provided a tribunal, just as individuals who cannot settle their controversies tribunal, just as individuals who cannot settle their controversies must go to the courts in order that they may be settled by a judicial tribunal. Just so when these two Houses cannot agree, they must call in the benefit of an honest, an able, and a learned tribunal, and weigh its decision before they ultimately decide; and that is all that this bill does. Therefore it is that this bill leaves every question to this tribunal with the power, as I said before, of review and reversal by the two Houses. I will speak more about that presently. It decides not one of them; it does not intend to decide one of them, except one single one; that is, it puts an end to the pretension that the President of the Senate is the sole judge who is to determine whether States are in the Union and whether this body of men or that body of men are the electors of President or Vice-President of the United of men are the electors of President or Vice-President of the United

Mr. President, what are the advantages of this bill? I can only enumerate them; I cannot dilate upon them. In the first place it does just what I have said; it puts an end to the pretension that the President of the Senate is the sole judge. In the second place it requires him to produce everything purporting to be a return, for if it did not require him to do that it would in effect leave him to be the so'e judge by keeping one return in his pocket and producing the other only. In the third place it requires him to produce the returns in the alphabetical order of the States.

I do not mean it to be understood from anything I am saying here that I have the slightest idea that the present occupant of the chair would do any unfair thing—not the slightest in the world. It is from no want o' confidence in him that these provisions are put in the bill, but it is that because they are right and will be of good example. In fact they are taken from the bill of the Senator from Indiana, which massed the Senate at the last session, long before it was known there passed the Senate at the last session, long before it was known there would be any such contest as now exists in reference to the election of President. That had therefore, sir, not the slightest reference to

It requires him to produce the returns in the alphabetical order of the States; a very proper provision, and that ought long ago to have been adopted; for, otherwise, if this country should be and the Sen-ate should be cursed with an unscrupulous President, if he had the ate should be cursed with an unscrupulous President, if he had the discretion to produce the returns just in such order as he saw fit, he might give a manifest advantage to one side or to the other.

In the fourth place it gives time for the consideration of objections, and in respect to that I beg leave to say that I wholly dissent from the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey the other day and from those of my colleague too, who drew an inference as to the meaning of the Constitution from the want of time to consider these objections. This bill does give time to consider them and to consider them with a reasonable decrease of certainty and intelligence. a reasonable degree of certainty and intelligence.

In the next place it provides for the meeting of the two Houses in a given place, and prevents any conflict between them as to the place of meeting.

Sixthly. Ascending from these smaller matters, it provides for a tri-bunal as fair and competent as could be devised. If any man can find a fairer tribunal consistent with the Constitution, I beg him to propose it. But no such proposition has yet been made.

In the next place it secures a regular and orderly mode of procedure, and next it secures a decision and thereby avoids a resort to violence. At the same time it leaves the circumstances of the election open to future and legitimate criticism. In the mean time it tends to bring peace and prosperity to the country and to strengthen and preserve our republican institutions.

These, sir, are the advantages of this bill, and they can scarcely be overest mated. I shall indulge in no rhetoric upon them. If the bare statement of them does not impress every Senator, it would be vain in me to attempt to do it by elocution. Then, sir, if this bill is advantageous, the only remaining question is, is it constitutional?

Upon that subject let it be granted that the Constitution contemplates that the votes shall be counted by the two Houses, which is certainly my understanding of the Constitution; yet it must be admitted that no mode of procedure is prescribed. That is left to the mitted that no mode of procedure is prescribed. That is left to the law-making power. The case in its present condition comes within express provision of the concluding paragraph of section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, the familiar paragraph that Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper, &c. Congress may, according to its best judgment, prescribe the mode; and this will does not him a more.

But it has been asked, may the concurrence of both Houses be re-Suired to almit or to reject a vote? Certainly if the two Houses are to count there must be some rule on this subject. It cannot be that the concurrence of the two Houses is required to accept and that the concurrence of the two Houses is required to accept and that the concurrence of the two Houses is not required to reject. Those propositions cannot very well stand together. It must be that there is some rule which necessity requires to be adopted, and who is to prescribe that rule? Who can prescribe it but the law-making power? The Constitution has devolved a duty-here just as we devolve a duty on two judges who hold our circuit court. The court is held by two judges. What do we do in the case of the circuit court? The circuit judge and the district judge constitute the court. What do we do in such a case but prescribe a rule of decision? and that rule is that where they differ in opinion the opinion of the circuit judge that where they differ in opinion the opinion of the circuit judgeshall prevail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That has been the law since 1802.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly it has; but take a State court; take the old supreme court of the State of Ohio, so renowned in the history of the State, two of the judges going together to hold the circuits, and what was the rule? That both must concur to make a decision. Sopsir, is there anything strange in this? Here is the judicial power of the United States vested in the courts, the Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish, and do we not regulate in respect to those courts court and such interior courts as Congress may from time to time or-dain and establish, and do we not regulate in respect to those courts how many judges there shall be, what shall be a quorum, and how many of them must concur to render a decision? Do you not so pro-vide by law, although the judicial power is vested in those courts by the Constitution itself? Why, sir, it will not do to say that there can be no law that shall regulate this mode of procedure and settle this great question. What do we hear to-day?

this great question. What do we hear to-day?

What is the argument in favor of the President of the Senate, one man, deciding this question? It is said he must decide it ex necessitate rei to save the life of the Government and to prevent our being without a Chief Magistrate. It is the necessitas upon which the argument is founded; but when the law enables you to provide that the two Houses, not one man—not one man who holds his position by the will of one of the Houses alone, who may be made and unmade a dozen times a day—when the law provides that the two Houses shall decide this question, pray where is the necessitas? What becomes of that, I should like to know, when by the lawful and constitutional exercise of the power expressly conferred upon us we put all necessity out of the case and furnish a fair and honest tribunal?

But again, sir, this rule commends itself for another reason. In considering this question of whether the concurrence of the two Houses may be required to admit a vote or to mixet it we must have been

may be required to admit a vote or to reject it, we must never lose sight of the great principle which lies at the foundation of the inquiry. That great principle is this, that no State shall be unjustly deprived of its vote, and that any mode that opens a wide door for the perpetration of such injustice is inadmissible and could not have been contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. That is the guiding star for us, and tried by that standard this bill, which requires the concurrence of the two Houses, is infinitely more defensible, infinitely better in principle, and in time if it should grow into a precedent, will be infinitely more beneficial in its effect than the twenty-second joint rule could ever be.

To say nothing of the absurdity of a State losing its vote because a single House of Congress saw fit to vote to reject it, to say nothing of the apparent injustice of such a thing as that as the twenty-second rule allowed, even where there was a single return, to say nothing about that, does not every man see what a temptation is held out to one of the two Houses to reject the vote of a State and thereby take one of the two flouses to reject the vote of a State and thereby take to itself the election of President of the United States. Why, sir, suppose the Forty-fifth Congress were now in existence, were sitting in the other end of the Capitol with a democratic majority of 6 or 8 members when counted per capita and with a republican majority when counted by States of nearly 2 to 1, how would the proposition look to take the vote away from the people and put it in the hands of that body alone?

Mr. President, I do not wish to illustrate by the present state of affairs particularly; but I hope the Senate will look beyond the present state of affairs, and see that they are making a precedent, one that is to endure and the principles of which must endure and ought to endure, or the bill ought not to pass; and I do say, therefore, that every man who believes as I do, that the counting of this vote believes to the two House of Courses as anarytic premiud hodies. every man who believes as I do, that the counting of this vote belongs to the two Houses of Congress as separate organized bodies, standing on a perfect plane of equality, one having no superiority whatever over the other, must say that any construction of the Constitution which gives to one House the right to decide, and the proposition that it belongs to the President of the Senate, which would practically give to the other House alone the power to decide, is an inadmissible interpretation of the Constitution and fraught with evil and destruction to our institutions. No, sir, this trust of counting the electoral votes is a great, a mighty trust. It is a trust of the most high and delicate nature. It requires all the intelligence and patriotism of Congress to perform it, and to perform it well. It is not given to one-half of Congress or to the other half of Congress, much less is it given to one man.

Sir, this leads me to say, in respect to the details of this bill, that the first section of the bill provides for cases in which there is but one return. But before I proceed to that I ought to refer to the bill of 1800 and that of 1824. The bill of 1800, as it passed the Senate, made the decision of the grand committee provided by that bill final, and the Houses had nothing to do with it. The House of Representatives amended that by providing that the vote of no State should be rejected unless both Houses concurred in rejecting it; and I say to my democratic friends here that for that proposition that no vote should be rejected without the concurrent vote of both Houses of Congress, every single republican of that day, of whom we are the political successors, every single democrat in Congress at that day, headed by the most illustrious names in democratic history almost, voted; and not most illustrious names in democratic history almost, voted; and not only they, but a large number of the most distinguished federalists of the day.

Then we come to the bill of 1824 which passed the Senate, and I beg leave to refer to that. I will refer to the first section of that bill upon a point that I have already mentioned as showing how it was under-

This bill was read a third time and passed, as follows:

I will only read a few sentences. The fourth section reads:

That, before the Senate and House of Representatives shall assemble for the purpose of counting the votes, as hereinafter directed.

It assumes directly that the counting of the votes belongs to the two Houses and prescribes a mode in the fifth section. When it comes to the fifth section it says:

So soon as the question shall be taken in either House.

That is, where objection has been made and the two Houses have separated to vote upon it.

A message shall be sent to the other, informing them of the decision of the question and that the House sending the message is prepared to resume the count; and when such message shall have been received by both Houses, they shall again meet in the same room as before, and the count shall be resumed. And if the two Houses have concurred in rejecting the vote or votes objected to, such vote or votes shall not be counted; but unless both Houses concur, such vote or votes shall be counted.

This was the bill introduced by that democrat, Martin Van Buren, and that passed the Senate and was reported without a single change of a letter in the other House by no less distinguished a man than

Daniel Webster, and its passage by the House recommended. I think, then, there is some authority in these great names for saying that it is competent for us to provide that both Houses must concur in the is competent for us to provide that both Houses must concur in the lecision rejecting a vote. I need not go to the illustrations that were so well put by the Senator from Michigan, of the report of a master commissioner to a court; but let me put one single case by way of illustration. A chancery court, we will say, consists of two jndges; they send a case to a master commissioner for report; the constitution of the State vests the judicial powers in that court, but they send a case to a master commissioner; he makes a report upon the facts. What then? Every lawyer knows that that report stands like the special verdict of a jury, and cannot be overturned except by the concurrent vote of the two judges; and who ever heard in a case like that that the judges had abdicated their judicial power? Who ever decamed of it?

We have had in my State ever since 1802, ever since the State existed, a most salutary law, extremely popular, which enables people who have controversies to submit them to arbitration and to make the submission a rule of court, and when the arbitrators come in who have controverses to submit them to arbitration and to make the submission a rule of court, and when the arbitrators come in with their award the court renders judgment upon that award, unless exception shall be sustained on the ground of fraud or excess of jurisdiction. But it takes both the judges, when the court consists of two, to sustain the exceptions, and if they do not vote to concur the award stands; and yet the constitution of my State vests the judicial power in the courts just as fully as any power is vested in Congress, or as the judicial power is vested in the Supreme Court of the United States, and does not say one word about arbitrators or the effect of their finding.

Sir, in my judgment, the error into which people have fallen in supposing that the concurrence of both Houses must be necessary in order to count a vote results just as the error of my colleague, I submit, from treating this thing of counting an electoral vote as a legislative act; and one objection to this bill is founded on that misconception. I have seen it gravely put in a newspaper "Could Congress send to this tribunal a bill and agree beforehand that just as the decision of the tribunal upon that bill should be it should be the law of the land unless both Houses of Congress overruled it?" Yes, sir, as absurd a question as that has been put, and I have no doubt in real, downright earnestness, utterly forgetting that the passage of a bill is a legislative act, no part of which can be delegated, and that no part of the power of Congress can in any mode be grauted away. The counting of these votes is in its nature a judicial act, and we have a right to get all the aid that is within our power to enable us to perform that act wisely, and justly, and well. There is no analogy whatever between the sending of a bill to a commission and sending an investigation of these facts to a commission.

Now, sir, the first section of this bill provides for a case in which supposing that the concurrence of both Houses must be necessary in

Now, sir, the first section of this bill provides for a case in which there is but one return from a State, and provides that that shall not be rejected without the concurrent vote of both Houses, just as the House of Representatives contended in 1800; just as the Senate declared in Mr. Van Buren's bill in 1824; just as the Senate, by a considerable majority, declared not nine months ago, upon the bill of the Senator from Indiana, which is the foundation of this bill, which is the bill we took up in committee and amended and have reported to

If I am right, then, in saying that it is constitutional where there is but one return, I think it is very easy to demonstrate that the second section of the bill is likewise constitutional, and I beg the attention of the Senators to the very brief argument I have to make upon this question and then I will relieve them from hearing me any further.

Why ought both Houses to concur to reject the vote where there is but one return? It is because every presumption ought to be in favor of that single return in order that the vote of the State may not be lost, and it ought not to be rejected unless its illegality is so clear that the concurring minds of both the Houses shall say "we cannot receive that vote." It is a presumption necessary to preserve the right of the State; it is a presumption necessary in order to do justice; and it is a presumption so strong that it would be an absurdity in lockie to say that it was overthrown when one House said this justice; and it is a presumption so strong that it would be an absordity in logic to say that it was overthrown when one House said this is a valid return and the other House said "it is not," for that would be to give to the House that denied its validity a pre-eminence over the House that asserted its validity, and enable the one House against the voice of its co-equal in this decision to overrule the presumption in favor of the validity of the return. There is no good logic in saying that one House should have that rower. ing that one House should have that power.

Then, sir, we come to the case of two returns. That is different. There there is no presumption perhaps in favor of either of them, and that is what creates the trouble. There is no presumption in favor of either of them. We have had them here. We had two returns from the State of Louisiana at the very last count of the presidential votes. The official character of the electors in each list was certified by a man calling himself governor, and to each of them the seal of the State was attached. There may be in that case, there may be in other cases, no presumption in favor of the one or the

What, then, does the second section of this bill do? It sends those returns to a competent, able, and impartial tribunal, and says to that tribunal, "Investigate this subject; you have the time to do it; Con-gress has not; Congress must proceed with its appropriation bills, and for Congress to take the time to do what you are directed to do might consume all its time and the Government would fail for want of means to carry it on."

Take this honest, learned, impartial tribunal says the bill; let them examine the case and give us their judgment upon it. When that judgment comes from a tribunal of this character in favor of one of these returns it creates a presumption in its favor that ought not to be overthrown except by the concurrent voice of the two Houses. It creates a presumption in its favor as strong, if not stronger, than that which existed in favor of a single return; and that is the philosophy of this existed in favor of a single return; and that is the philosophy of this bill. It is the presumption in favor of a return, so as not to deprive any State of its vote; that presumption which exists where there is but one return, or that presumption which is created by the decision of this tribunal, which shall not be overthrown except by the concurrent voice of the two Houses. But it is said, "Well, now, that is practically to leave it to the tribunal. Nay, further, that is practically to leave it to one man." Why, Mr. President, suppose it were left to this Senate alone, might not the vote be 35 against 35, and then would it not be the thirty-sixth man that settled it? Suppose you were to leave it to five hundred and one men and there were two hundred and fifty on one side and two hundred and fifty-one on the other, might you not just as well say it is the one-man power? Why significant is the content of the suppose the same tributes and the suppose the same tributes and the same tributes and the suppose that the suppose you were to leave it to five hundred and one men and there were two hundred and fifty on one side and two hundred and fifty-one on the other, might you not just as well say it is the one-man power? Why significant is the suppose the suppose you were to leave the suppose the sup might you not just as well say it is the one-man power? Why, sir, might you not just as well say it is the one-man power? Why, sir, there is nothing in that at all.

Nor does it militate against the constitutionality of this bill one particle that in the present state of affairs—that is to say, with two Houses having different political majorities—practically the decision of that tribunal may settle the question. That does not militate against the constitutionality of this bill in the slightest degree. Y unight just as well say that it would militate against the constitutionality of a law if you was a proposed. tionality of a law if you were to provide that a case involving a constitutional question might be appealed from the Court of Claims up to the Supreme Court.

It might be said, "Why, the practical effect will be that, as the judges of the Supreme Court are six republicans certain and two democrats, and one that cannot be counted, therefore, as a matter of course, the judgment will be in favor of the republican interpretation of the Constitution." Would that be any argument against a bill conferring jurisdiction on that court? Where do you find in the Conconterring jurisdiction on that court? Where do you find in the Constitution anything about the politics of the members of the Supremo Court? Where do you find in the Constitution anything about the politics of Senators on this floor? Where do you find in the Constitution anything about the politics of members of the House of Reptution anything about the politics of members of the House of Representatives? And can you say that a bill is unconstitutional because it may so happen that the court that is to decide the case, be it the Supreme Court of the United States, or a circuit court, or a State court, or a congressional tribunal, will happen to be composed of more members of one political party than the other? That is not constitutional reasoning. That is politicians' reasoning; that is office-holders' reasoning; that is office-holders' reasoning; but that is not constitutional reasoning. That is politicians' reasoning; that is once-noncess con-oning; that is office-seek-rs' reasoning; but that is not constitutional reasoning. This is the act of the two Houses, and this bill contem-reasoning. reasoning. This is the act of the two Houses, and this bill contemplates nothing else; and it is just as much in a constitutional sense the act of the two Houses and the decision of the two Houses as if both Houses were of the same political complexion, and no man who is a lawyer can deny it; and therefore it is a simple absurdity in any man reasoning as a lawyer to say that this bill is an abdication of the powers of the two Houses

A friend suggests to me that it is said it is a delegation of authory. What I have just said is a sufficient answer to that. You might as well say that there was a delegation of authority whenever we send a committee out to investigate, or when we made a committee on coinage at the last session of Congress, or a conference committee, or any other agency. As long as the power to decide in the last resort is reserved to the two Houses, there is no delegation of autho ity. The provisions are only means to acquire information to get light to aid the two Houses in making the ultimate final decision, and therefore the resort is resorted.

fore there is no delegation.

Mr. President, I have taken up more time than at this late hour I ought to have done, but I feel and I have felt the responsibility to which I have been subjected in helping to frame this measure. I have one satisfaction that I shall never lose, and that I should with difficulty find words to express, in the fact that in that committee there never was an unkind, or short, or harsh remark or word; but we performed our duty as men anxious to do what the country needed and what the country had a right to expect from us. For what we have done I take my full share of responsibility. Praise it, or blame it I want no better praise hereafter no kinder recollection in the it, I want no better praise hereafter, no kinder recollection in the minds of my countrymen than that I contributed my humble efforts to bring to a peaceable solution this question which now agitates this country and endangers it.

[Mr STEVENSON addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. MORRILL.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to fatigue either myself or the Senate at this late hour of the night, and I shall therefore occupy but a brief moment in submitting some observatherefore occupy but a brief moment in submitting some observations that have occurred to me in the progress of this debate.

Whoever contributes to the rescue of his country from peril, whether real or only imaginary, deserves well of his country and will receive its plaudits. The committee who have reported this bill have been engaged in an important work, and whether it receives approval or not, it will be admitted that it has been done patriotically and with ability. The remedy proposed is for what has been long held, by ability. The remedy proposed is for what has been long held, by statesmen and by eminent commentators upon the Constitution, to be a weak point in the practical working of our frame of government—a point which this year, after the lapse of three-fourths of a century, is point which this year, after the lapse of three-fourths of a century, is once more brought prominently into view by an almost equal division of the electoral votes. Most of the present Senate of all parties are committed to the doctrine of the propriety of legislation for the purpose of deciding all disputes relative to electoral returns of the votes for President and Vice-President. It is too late to say that no legislation is required. The question to-day is whether the legi-lation proposed is better or worse than no legislation. My respect for the committee, and admiration for the eminent ability displayed by them in their explanation and defense of the measure, has led me to displayed. in their explanation and defense of the measure, has led me to dis-trust myself when I feel it necessary to obtrude any comments upon their work.

I am one of those who believe that Hayes and Wheeler have been fairly and legally elected, and that this would be conceded but for the undue eagerness of a party so long out of power that they have claimed victories before they were won, and have I fear resorted to desperate expedients to mystify and cover up actual defeats. Too much has been surrendered to this party, as it appears to me, by our republican friends. With a bad case, as we think, they are to have almost an equal chance of success as against a good one.

It may be asked, if you are so confident that the men of your choice have received a majority of the true and valid electoral votes, why are you unwilling to submit that question to the decision of a fair and impartial tribunal. Here is my grief. The make-up of the commission assumes that fourteen-fifteenth parts of it are to be partisans, and the other fifteenth part is left to an uncertainty, and this supreme mission assumes that fourteen-inteenth parts of it are to be partisans, and the other fifteenth part is left to an uncertainty, and this supreme fraction, about which absolutely nothing can be known, is after all the only part upon which all parties base their hopes and reliance. This one of fifteenth part is expected to be true and unbiased. But for this, the bill would nowhere find any support. With this part left out, the commission would be just half and half, republicans and democrats, and all of them "as fixed as fate and foreknowledge absolute". lute" in their convictions as to the merits of the election returns as well as of the merits of the candidates.

I should have greatly preferred, if there was to be a submission of the questions involved to the arbitrament of any tribunal, that that tribunal should have been the Supreme Court in its entirety. thad appealed to that court in their pre-eminent judicial character as the great court of the nation, accustomed to decide weighty matters wholly aloof from the party strifes of the day, we might have a well-grounded hope that each one of them would have brought nothing into consideration in rendering a final judgment upon all of the questions in dispute but the law and the facts, nothing but truth and the Constitution. Instead of this we have the geographical selection of four of the judges according to their ancient political affinities and one is as yet the Great Unknown. I think it would have been better not to have recognized any one of the Supreme Court as a political partisan, and certainly better not to have directly employed any one of them as such. As it is they seem to be invited to rekindle the old of them as such. As it is they seem to be invited to rekindle the old slumbering embers of party hate or of party attachment, from which their prayer should be "Good Lord deliver us!" It is true that they may all exercise a more elevated standard of judicial propriety than we are imputing to them; but I would have preferred not to have started on a suspicion. "Give me your confidence and I will deserve it," said the elder Pitt to the King; and if that confidence had been given to the whole court, I feel sure it would have tried to deserve it. As the Constitution does not declare in plain terms by whom the votes for President shall actually be counted, I am ready to admit that we have under consideration a case which Congress has been clothed with constitutional authority to regulate by law and which it is its duty to exercise, that is to say, to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution all powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States; and, if I venture once more with some diffidence to criticise some parts of this bill, it is not because of any denial of constitutional authority to legislate upon the subject, or because of any unconstitutional provisions of the bill, but because I think something more was required than a mere expedient subject, or because of any unconstitutional provisions of the bill, but because I think something more was required than a mere expedient to bridge over the exigencies of the present occasion. The life of this bill by its terms is confined to the month of February, 1877, and after that it is to be consigned to the tomb of the Capulets and to have no force or virtue forever either for good or evil. I shall be pardoned for suggesting that it might have been wiser, certainly more expedient, to have provided a measure of broader scope, fit to live for the next century, and appropriate to whatever party should happen to wield power or to control the destinies of the country.

Undoubtedly the difficulties of the situation were of a grave character—perhaps too grave to admit of solution so soon after the heat of a presidential contest—but if the measure could have contained provisions of a suitable form and character to be worthy of perpetuation, such statute law as would command the irrepealable support and acquiescence of future generations, the authors would have been en

Notwithstanding these objections and with some reluctance, I am yet inclined to support the bill, and for the reason that if no law is to pass we shall be left to drift on a troubled sea with no harmony in the crew, officers, or pilots as to which way to steer. I have sometimes been disposed to think, in the absence of any law regulating the count of the electoral vote, and in presence of any disagreement between the Senate and the House of Representatives, that from the necessity of his position the Vice-President or the President pro tempore of the Senate must count the vote.

It may be, as has been wittily suggested by the Senator from New Jersey who usually sits upon my right, [Mr. Free Inghuysen,] that we might at once solve all difficulties by electing the Nestor among we might at once solve all difficulties by electing the Nestor among democratic Senators as our presiding officer; but on the whole it might be said "that won't do." [Laughter.]

It is right here that we encounter a mixed and very heterogeneous record of senatorial votes with a very large majority of all parties against the exercise, on the part of the presiding officer of the Senate, of any power to count disputed votes. Besides many other instances on the record I call attention to the vote of the Senate, on the 22d of March, 1876, upon an amendment proposed to the bill then under consideration, in these words:

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the second section of the bill the following:

"But, if the two Houses fail to agree as to which of the returns shall be counted, then the President of the Senate shall decide which is the true and valid return, and the same shall then be counted."

Upon that amendment the result of the vote was—yeas 7, nays 38. Four republicans and three democrats only voted for the amendment. After such a vote, I submit that the number of adherents to the doc-

After such a vote, I submit that the number of adherents to the doctrine of power on the part of the President of the Senate to decide upon returns when the two Houses fail to agree are, however respectable, too few to rely upon in a great emergency. They might be enough for good leaders, but there would be none left for followers. Officers enough, but no army.

If this bill fails, then the whole question will be remitted to a controvers; between the House and the Senate, with the probability that no agreement could be reached before the 4th of March next, and with the possibility of a result not creditable to our institutions nor satisfactory to any party. Of course it is less labor to criticise a measure of this sort than to frame it. I might not have favored the report of precisely this bill, but, it having been matured, after the most elaborate consideration, and reported by the highest judicial authority of the Senate, and as no other measure having any chance to be acted of the Senate, and as no other measure having any chance to be acted upon is now possible, I feel constrained not to withhold from it my vote.

Mr. MORTON, (at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes a. m. Thursday, January 25.) Mr. President, although I do not believe that this bill will be defeated or that anything which I can say will change the vote, I desire to say something with regard to it, which I feel utterly unable to do to-night. I am quite worn out and I shall ask that the Senate now adjourn. I make that motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry to disoblige my friend, but the public exigency I think must compel us to go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question upon the motion and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a second?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; the Senator shall have a second with all my heart.

all my heart.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Before I vote upon the motion to adjourn I desire to know of the Senator from Indiana whether or not he is unable to proceed with his remarks to-night. If he is unable to go on, I shall vote to adjourn. Mr. MORTON. Mr. MORTON. I will say that I feel quite worn out. I have been here and in committee since ten o'clock this morning, and am certainly physically unable to do myself and the subject any sort of

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I make a little speech on this motion to ad-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection, debate not being in order? The Chair hears no objection. By unanimous consent the Senator from Vermont may proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Indiana is one of the many Senators in this body to whom it always gives me great pleasure to listen. I have listened to him twice in this debate already with great listen. I have listened to him twice in this debate already with great attention. This bill has been dragging on day after day with one misfortune and another, and we had better defeat it to-night than let it drag itself to death when the day of inevitable doom comes, good or bad, with the bill undisposed of between the two Houses and unsigned by the President, if it is to pass at all. Therefore I am sure my friend will not feel that it is out of any want of consideration to him personally that I ask the Senate to do what I know is an unpleasant thing, to sit here and finish this bill now. I can do no less than that in doing what I think to be my duty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senate will indulge me in making a single remark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair

Mr. SHERMAN. It must be remembered that this bill has been pushed with an unusual degree of celerity for a bill of its grave importance. The Senator from Indiana, as is known, is the only member of the committee opposed to the bill. He is known to have been unwell the day that he addressed the Senate. It is well known that on the day he opened his remarks he spoke for about three-quarters of an hour with manifest debility, so marked that I at least, sitting by his side, urged him not to proceed with his remarks until finally he said he could not go further. It must be remembered that as to division of time those who have been opposed to the bill have occupied about four or five hours at the utmost in point of time, while one Senator who defends the bill has spoken many more hours than that. Certainly I would not have desired that Senator to have abbreviated his remarks in the least, because his speech was very able and interesting. Yet under these circumstance it does seem to me that to insist that a gentleman in the position of the Senator from Indiana, the only member of this committee who dissents from the bill, and who will be better prepared to give us the ground of opposition to the bill to-morrow, shall speak at this hour, half an hour after midnight, after a continuous session of fourteen hours, is carrying a process of forced debate further than I have ever seen it carried in the Senate. This remark I can make: I have heard that to-morrow the discussion will go on upon this bill in the other House, and consequently no time will be lost if the vote is taken here sometime to-morrow. Under those circumstances there is no occasion to time to-morrow. Under those circumstances there is no occasion to press a vote to-night, and no time is gained by forcing the vote. It is supposed that when the Senator from Indiana speaks the Senator from Vermont himself will desire to reply to him, and that will be the end of the debate, so far as I know. I do not desire to participate in the debate any further; and I make this appeal and this statement of facts must be apparent to Senators; it is manifest to me. I trust, therefore, the Senator from Vermont will allow an ad-

me. I trust, therefore, the Senator from Vermont will allow an adjournment, and to-morrow I have no doubt we shall be able to reach a vote at a reasonable hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall do everything that the Senator proposes, and with cheerfulness, if that is the desire of the body. If the Senate wishes to see this bill go down into the tomb of death from sheer inanition before next Tuesday, which is the first day upon which it is to act, then it must do so; I shall not stand in the way. The bill is not my bill; the case is not my case; but the country is my country. If this bill is to get through this body, let us pass it; if it is not, let it die. Remember, after we pass it, it is to have three readings in another body on three different days, and be debated, and to go to another body on three different days, and be debated, and to go to the President between now and that time. So Senators can readily see that it is merely killing it to adjourn now. If the Senate wishes to do it, very well; it is the business of the Senate, not mine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to adjourn, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 41. as follows:

41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dorsey Eaton, Ferry, Hamilton, Hamlin, Ingalls, McCreery, McMillan, Mitchell, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Sharon, Sherman, Spencer, Teller, Waileigh, and West—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn Barnum, Bayard, Blaine, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chaffee, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill, Price, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—41.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cragin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Logan, Norwood, Oglesby, and Robertson—8.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I will endeavor briefly to express some of the views which I have upon this bill. The haste in the consome of the views which I have upon this bill. The haste in the consideration of this bill which is made by the Senator from Vermont is without good foundation upon his own showing. That it would advance this bill in any respect to pass it to-night instead of passing it to-morrow night at five o'clock it would be impossible for him to show. I refer to this not expecting that any change will be made but simply in reference to the spirit of this demand. I believe I have never been west in sources to courtee to the very lower than the bedy nor m reference to the spirit of this demand. The never been wanting in any act of courtesy toward any member of this body, nor do I intend, however scantily they may have served me. The whole argument in favor of this bill is in my opinion a mistake, to put it in the mildest phrase. It proceeds upon the idea that unless this bill is passed that all is lost; that some great disaster is impending over the country and unless this bill is passed it will inevitably occur. If this bill should not be passed, if no bill is passed, it will leave this country medicals in the ardition in which it was from 1750 up to 1855 when precisely in the condition in which it was from 1789 up to 1865, when the twenty-second joint rule was first adopted; that is, without any law, rule, or regulation upon the subject. During that time the country got along without having the public peace endangered and country got along without having the public peace endangered and without disturbance, and I do not see now why we could not proceed in the future at least so far as this election is concerned in the same way, and as I believe without the slightest danger.

I know that an alarm has been created by threats upon the part of the democratic party in various portions of the country. I know that a panic now exists in this country and in this body far greater than that of 1873, and equaled only I believe by that of the battle of Bull Run in 1831. We are asked to do this upon the score of magnanimus was a party. We of magnanimity. We are asked to be magnanimous as a party. We are asked to sacrifice and surrender advantages which belong to the republican party as a matter of law, as a matter of right, and as a matter of practice, since this Government was first founded. We are asked to do that by the democratic party, to meet them half way, to surrender to them certain rights to which they now have no title and to give to them certain chances which they will not have unless this bill is passed. The republican party is in a condition to be magnanimous. It has been strangled to death in every Southern State but three. It is struggling for breath in those three States with the hand upon its throat. The attempt has been made in Oregon, and yet we are asked now to come forward and be magnanimous and, if it is necessary, to surrender our future chances of existence for the purpose of obtaining that character.

Mr. President, I believe I am as magnanimous as most men. I believe that my desire to do right is as strong as that of most men. I could, if I would, very cheaply indulge in lofty and patriotic expressions, such as I frequently hear in this country; but they are very cheap and so often they are the mere cover for treachery and desertion that I think a man is liable to suspicion when he indulges in them. If this matter shall be left without the passage of this bill as it has been from the foundation of the Government, what have we to apprehend? Let us come right to the question; what have we to apprehend? Are we to apprehend violence? Are we to apprehend the invasion of this capital? Are we to apprehend that if the President of the Senate shall proceed to count this vote as it always has been done, the House of Representatives will take some revolutionary action by which our institutions perhaps may be overturned, or that we shall have a dual government? I am not afraid of that believe that any individual or any party who attempts that will be utterly crushed out; I believe if we go on just as we have gone for more than three-quarters of a century no man, no party, will dare to raise their hand.

We are asked to provide a bill, a method of counting this vote, by which the republican party is to be the loser and the democratic party is to be the gainer. I do not blame the democracy for their desire to succeed. I do not blame them for their purpose in getting new advantages; that they will take all that we will give is very certain. I have just seen from the vote which has been taken here to-night that they are very nearly unanimous in favor of the passage of the bill, because it is to give to them certain advantages, certain chances that they will not have outside of the passage of this bill. As the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] said the other day, it is emphatically a democratic measure. I do not care where it comes from; I do not care who originates it; I say the bill is in the interest of the democratic party; and that party so understands it, and their action in the Senate to-night will verify what I say.

Let me consider for a very few minutes the clause in the Constitution which has been so often recited. I am not going to give my own convince about it as much as to refer to it historically. opinions about it so much as to refer to it historically. In the first place, I must say that the fathers of the Constitution and the men who conducted this Government for the first forty or fifty years did understand that the President of the Senate counted the vote, and that he would count it until there was legislation providing otherwise. I am not now arguing whether this understanding was right or wrong, but I am simply saying that they so understood it. That they did not understand the Constitution as well as many of our people do now, I may perhaps safely admit; but, according to the perfect understanding of the men who made the instrument, they thought in the absence of legislation the President of the Senate would count the vote. Before the Constitution was put into operation, before we had a President and a Vice-President, when it became necessary to launch the ship of state, a President of the Senate pro tempore had to be appointed. There was but one single purpose for the appointment, and that was to open the certificates and count the vote, so that the President and Vice-President might be installed. Therefore, in the resodent and vice-President might be installed. Therefore, in the resolution that was passed by the Continental Congress it was expressed that this President of the Senate pro tempore should be chosen for the purpose of opening and counting the votes only; that is, they meant to say when those duties were performed his office expired. They did not mean to invest him with the power to open the certificates and count the vote; not at all; because if Congress had the power to count the vote it would have taken both Houses to authorize him to count the vote; but, inasmuch as the Senate only passed that resolu-tion, we must give it the simple construction that they gave it at the time. That resolution described the President of the Senate as appointed for the sole purpose of opening and counting the vote, and when that was done his office expired, and he was to last no longer as the President protempore of the Senate, and that is all they meant. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] very ingeniously argues that he was empowered to count the vote by the resolution of the Senate just as much as he was empowered to open the certificates, and not a bit more; that it simply defined the purpose of his appointment, and that then his office should expire. After the President of the Senate pro tempore had counted the votes and General Washington was elected President and declared to be so, this President of the Senate issued a certificate of election to General Washington over his signature, in which he declared that a certain day add in a certain law. ture, in which he declared that at a certain day and in a certain place he had opened the certificates and had counted all the votes. The Senator from New York and others say he did not count the votes. Well, he thought he did. He certified that he had done so over his signature. We are now told that he was mistaken; that he never counted the votes, and that no President of the Senate ever did count the votes, and that no Presidents of the Senate ever did count the votes. Nine successive Presidents of the Senate, from 1789 to 1825 inclusive, issued certificates of election to the President-elect in which they solemnly declared that they had opened the certificates and had counted all the votes. This declaration they made for thirty-six years, during nine consecutive presidential elections. After that the practice changed; certificates of election were no longer issued to the President-elect, but a joint committee of the two Houses notified the President of his election. If you will look through the different en-tries of the Journals of the Senate and the House of Representatives you will find during the first election it was recited that the House had repaired to the Chamber of the Senate to attend the opening and the counting of the votes, or, in another entry, to witness the opening and the counting of the votes, not that they pretended they had taken a part in the actual count of the votes, but they recited that they had attended the Senate to witness the counting of the votes.

There is another thing that is very significant, and that is that in the resolutions passed by the two Houses, beginning in 1787 and coming down to 1865, inclusive, up to the time of the adoption of the twenty-second joint rule, each and every resolution recited that they had appointed one teller or two tellers to sit at the Clerk's desk and there to make a list of the votes as they were declared, not to count the votes, not to take any part whatever in this performance except to make a list of the votes as they were declared? Who was to declare the votes, and how were they to be declared? The very first entry in the Journal of the House in 1789 shows by whom the votes were to be declared. It will take but a moment to refer to it:

Mr. Parker and Mr. Heister then delivered in at the Clerk's table a list of the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States as the same were declared by the President of the Senate in the presence of the Senate and of this House; which was ordered to be entered on the Journal.

This was the way they understood it. Perhaps they were all wrong in regard to it. Let me consider for a few moments the article in the Constitution itself which recites that the electors shall seal up their votes and transmit them to the President of the Senate, and that he shall open all the certificates in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the votes shall then be counted. In the first place he is to do it in the presence of the Senate and House of Repreplace he is to do it the beassembled in one chamber. We must suppose that the contact is close. The chamber is comparatively small and well filled. It would be physically impossible that the two Houses, each acting as a House, preserving its autonomy, could count the votes together in the same chamber and at the same time. Physically as we know that would be impossible; but it was to be done ically, as we know, that would be impossible; but it was to be done in their presence. They were to be there as witnesses. It is a common provision of the law that deeds and other legal instruments shall be executed in the presence of witnesses, in the presence of third par-ties. It was as well known to the lawyers of that day as it is to the lawyers of this day. When it was said that a thing was to be done in the presence of a person or of a body of persons it was understood in the presence of a person or of a body of persons it was understood that they were there simply as witnesses, and not to take a part in the performance of the act itself. In looking over the statutes of the States now in regard to the votes of electors in different States you will find in some eight or nine of them, perhaps not quite so many, but in five or six certainly, that it requires that the electors shall east their votes in the presence of the governor of the State. Would you say that he is to take part in the vote in the electoral college because the statute of the State requires them to vote in his presence? In looking over your statutes now for various purposes, for a thousand purposes, how often do you find that a thing is required to be done in purposes, how often do you find that a thing is required to be done in the presence of another who is to take no part whatever in the performance of the act? Bids are to be opened by the Postmaster-General in the presence of the public, where everybody can be present. Sometimes the law specifies the names of the persons who shall be present when bids are opened, but it does not follow that they are to take any part in the giving out of the contracts; they are simply to be present. This seems to have been the way in which the fathers the Republic understood this provision that the Senate and House of Representatives were to be present. There is some significance in the fact that when the convention came to pass upon that clause they the fact that when the convention came to pass upon that clause they passed upon it in this form: The first part adopted was, "The President of the Senate shall, in that House," meaning the Senate, "open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." After that they added by an amendment, "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives," those words coming in after the word "counted;" so that all that was to be done, both opening and counting, was to be done in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives. resentatives

Let us consider for a moment what certificates are to be opened. Here is perhaps the main question in the case. Without regarding who shall make the mere count of the votes, whether they are to be counted by the President of the Senate or by the two Houses, let us consider what is the duty of the President of the Senate. The electconsider what is the duty of the President of the Senate. The elect-ors are to send their votes sealed up to him. He is to be the custo-diau. In the next place, he is required to open all the certificates in the presence of the two Houses, and the votes shall then be counted. What certificates is he required to open under the Constitution of the United States? Clearly none but those that come to him from the electors of the State. He is not bound to open a bogus certificate; he is not bound to open a bogus certificate; electors of the State. He is not bound to open a bogus certificate; he is not bound to open a fraudulent, made-up package purporting to be a certificate. He is required to open the certificates that come from the electors of Maine, as the case may be, whatever the State, and none other; and although there may be a half dozen packages in his possession, or sent to him purporting to be from the State of Maine, he is not required to open them all and place them before the two Houses, but he is only required to open that certificate that comes from the electors. The question is asked, how shall he know what certificate does come from the electors? He is bound to take notice who have been chosen as electors in the State of Maine. As an officer of the United States, he is bound to take notice of a public event of that kind, and he is bound to act upon his intelligence just as public officers are required to do in a thousand other instances, and where they are responsible if they make a mistake. The names of the elect-ors are to be indersed upon the outside of the certificate, and he can see from the names indorsed there whether they come from the government of the State, or whether they come from persons outside and officially unknown. Take the case of the State of Louisiana, if you please. There are two certificates said to be in the hands of the Presplease. There are two certificates said to be in the hands of the President of the Senate. Is he required to open both of them under the Constitution of the United States? I say not clearly. When he takes the certificate that comes from the authorities of the State of Louisiana and opens that and it is read, he cannot be required to open the other or the bogus certificate; and if he refuses to present it, I will ask you how you are to get it officially? So much then upon that subject.

Suppose now that from the State of Louisiana he opens the certificate that comes from the authorities of Louisiana. cate that comes from the authorities of Louisiana. That certificate has been made out by the electors who were certified by the authorities of Louisiana as having been elected. Is that a cause of revolution? Do I understand that the democratic party threatens violence or revolution if he takes that responsibility? There is the question. It is not that the elector may happen to have the certificate of the governor even of the State of Louisiana. The governor's certificate is an attestation or evidence prescribed by an act of Congress. As that kind of evidence is prescribed by a law of Congress, it is possible that Congress by another law may go behind that; but there is another kind of evidence that Congress cannot go behind, and that is the certificate of the returning board of every State hind, and that is the certained of this Union. The returning boards or canvassing officers are appointed by the laws of the States to determine the result of the election. That is the binding authority behind which the Congress of the United States cannot go. I may remark that every State in this Union has its returning board. The States of Nebraska, of Maine, of Vermont, of Indiana, all have their returning boards. They are not called by that name in every State, but they have essentially that character. Their powers are different in different States. In some it with more or less discretionary power to be exercised by them; but the extent of their power does not change their character. The State of Maine has its returning board, that is to say, it has certain officers provided by the laws of Maine who are to count the votes and determine who have been chosen as electors in that State. officers thus appointed have counted the votes and made their returns, there is no power, I maintain, in the Congress of the United States or anywhere to go behind that certificate or return; and if they do that, it is the end of presidential elections.

Mr. PADDOCK. I would remind the Senator from Indiana that the returning board of the State of Nebraska is the Legislature of the

Mr. MORTON. There the Legislature has been made the returning board. In my own State that is not the case; it consists of certain State officers. In the State of Oregon it is a single officer. The secretary of state in the State of Oregon is made the returning board. He is required to count the votes and his certificate stands as the evidence of the result. We have no power to go behind it and the governor of Oregon has no power to defeat it by giving a false certificate.

Now, Mr. President, I have referred you simply to the opinions of the fathers and the practice of the Government upon this subject, not as advancing my own opinion. I want to say right here that up to 1865, under the operation of the twenty-second joint rule that is now generally considered to be unconstitutional and to have been a monstrosity, neither House of Congress ever declared a vote. You may look through these records in vain to find the evidence that either House ever declared a vote. On two or three occasions, where the question was whether the State was in the Union and had a right to vote, it will be found that they dodged the question by requiring the vote to be counted thus and thus, if it made no difference in the result; but in the only cases where they assumed that power it was not a matter of count as to whether the electors were eligible or had voted by ballot, or whether the candidate was eligible, but the quesvoted by ballot, or whether the candidate was eligible, but the question was whether the State was in the Union, a question that does properly belong to the whole political department of the Government. So it was in regard to Missouri. So it was in regard to Indiana. So it was in regard to Mishigan, and so it was in regard to Tennessee, Arkansas, and Louisiana, in 1865 when the joint rule was adopted for the express purpose of meeting those cases in which it was claimed by a large part of the republican party that they were not States in the Union, but had lost their position as such; and to keep out their votes that rule was very unnecessarily and improperly out their votes that rule was very unnecessarily and improperly out their votes that rule was very unnecessarily and improperly adopted without a word of debate.

I have listened in vain for a discussion of the question here as to what is the condition of things if there is no legislation. I started out the other day with a proposition conceding the right to legislate, and as I have heretofore urged upon the Senate the duty to legislate, but that, in the absence of legislation, the President of the Senate must, to use a common phrase, ex necessitate rei, count the votes.

have listened in vain to hear that position answered. I wanted to hear the Senator from New York and the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Ohio tell us what was our condition if there was no legislation. The effect of the argument of the Senator from Vermont the other day was that neither the President of the Senate nor the two Houses had a right to count a vote in the absence of legislation; so that, in point of fact, for seventy-five years the votes were counted without authority of law. I did not believe that position then. I do not believe it now. I do not believe that, for three-quarters of a century, this government went on in violation of law; yet that is the argument that has been made. I wanted these Senators, to use a common phrase, to face the music and to tell us what was our condition in case there was no legislation. I wanted to hear them upon that point; but we have not heard them. If there is no legislation hereafter, as there has been none heretofore, I think the Government must go on as it has gone on heretofore.

The Senator from New York read from a report that I had made and I want to call attention to something else that he did not read in that The Senator undertook to read a sentence of it and when he read half the sentence he took an intermission of half an hour and made a very long speech and then went back and finished the sentence. I want to read that sentence just as it is here, without this long intermission:

But the exercise of these high powers may devolve upon him ex necessitate rei, and, whatever decision he may make between the two sets of electors or upon the sufficiency and validity of the record of the votes—whether on the evidence of the right of the electors to cast votes or whether they have been cast in the manner prescribed by the Constitutior—his decision is final.

The authority of that declaration is sustained by Chancellor Kent; it is sustained by the practice of this Government for three-quarters of a century; and are we now to be told for the first time that that position is not correct?

In another place in the same report I used this language:

It seemed to be a necessary conclusion from these discussions that it was a casus omissus in the Constitution, and that the power of the President of the Senate to count the vote resulted ex necessitate rei, from the failure of the Constitution to give to the two Houses any jurisdiction over it; but they were to be present at the counting as solemn witnesses of its accuracy and result.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the date of that report? Mr. MORTON. The report, I believe, was made in 1874.

Mr. MORTON. The report, I believe, was made in 1874.
Mr. CONKLING. June 1, 1874.
Mr. MORTON. The Senator from New York and, I think, the Senator from Vermont, argue that if it had been the intention of the Constitution to give to the President of the Senate the right to count the vote, it would have said so. Might I not ask this question: If it had been the intention of the Constitution to give the two Houses the right to count the vote, would it not have said so? Would it not have been as easy to say so in the one case as in the other? But inasmuch as the President of the Senate was mentioned for one thing and nobody else was mentioned, it was very naturally inferred by the fathers of the Republic for a great many years that the President of the Senate was to count the votes as well as to open the certificates. I will remark here that the framers of the Constitution anticipated none of this trouble. They did not look forward to two sets of returns. They did not look forward to ineligible electors. They did not look forward to irregularities in action. They provided for a very simple process, that the certificates should be opened in the presence of the two Houses and the votes should then be counted. That was all there was to do; first, to open the certificates and then to count the votes contained in those certificates. We are now told that these votes must be assorted; that when they are opened they must be canvassed to see whether they are lawful votes or not, whether they were cast by eligible persons and for persons having the proper qualifica-tions. There is no time for such an examination. The process was to be simple and brief, to open all the certificates and then count the It might be that the votes were east for a man who was not votes. It might be that the votes were cast for a man who was not thirty-five years old. That objection is to be met at once. Somebody gets up and says, "He is thirty-five years of age," Here is a very grave issue of fact. Is there any time or place to try that question? Suppose it is stated that the electors were not eligible, that they were all office holders. On the other hand it may be denied. It may be asserted that they never were office-holders, or that they had resigned their office in due season; and here is an issue of fact that may require depositions and may require witnesses. Is there any room or place there to try that question in the presence of the two Houses? Was it thought about? I think not. The whole process contemplated was to open the certificates and count the votes contained in those cerwas to open the certificates and count the votes contained in those certificates. Where does the judicial power come in? If there be judicial power there, it was in the President of the Senate, and that is where he should determine which was the right certificate and bring that forward. I think somebody said yesterday, when this question was being discussed, that he had no more judicial power than a porter has in opening a bale of goods. The porter, perhaps, may be required to take notice whether he is opening a bale of silks or opening a bale of shoddy blankets. He may be required to take notice what is the bale of goods that he is called upon to open; and the duty imposed upon the President of the Senate is to take notice that he opens the certificates from the electors of the State, and from nobody else.

I wish to notice very briefly a quotation the Senator from New York

read from the report which I made on the Louisiana case in 1873. I

If Congress chooses to go behind the governor's certificate, and inquire who had been chosen as electors, it is not violating any principle of the right of the States to prescribe what shall be the evidence of the elec ion of electors, but it is simply going behind the evidence as prescribed by an act of Congress.

There is the distinction that so many have lost sight of, that the law requiring the certificate of the governor of a State is an act of Congress that may be repealed at pleasure. But that is not the evidence of the election prescribed by the State. The States have their own laws; they have their own officers for determining who has been elected, and behind their determination Congress has no right to go.

And, thus going behind the certificate of the governor, we find that the official returns of the election of electors from the various parishes of Louisiana had never been counted by anybody having authority to count them.

That was the point made at that time in regard to the votes for President, that the votes in Louisiana had not been counted by the returning board at all. The votes for President of the United States never were counted by the returning board of Louisiana in 1873. If they had been counted by the returning board, we could not go behind them according to the very position that I took here at that time. It will be remembered by some Senators who have been here since 1873 that in all that Louisiana struggle, first in regard to the proposal to call a new election and afterward in regard to the admission of Pinchback, I took the ground from first to last that Congress had no right to go behind the decision of the returning board in Louisiana; that when they found that certain members of the Legislature had been elected, although they might have found that fact lature had been elected, although they might have found that fact upon insufficient testimony or upon no testimony at all, still it was an act of the board appointed by the laws of the State for that purpose, and we had no right to go behind it. That was my position then, as it is my position now. I believe it is a vital point in the constitutional doctrine of our country; and I believe that this very bill that I am opposing in vain to-night will violate, and I believe it is intended to violate, that doctrine. I wish to consider very briefly this bill, and first to speak in regard to this commission. This tribunal is called in the bill a commission. The Senator from New York designates it as a committee. It would be an odd sort of a committee of Congress made up in part of men who are not members of Congress, and therefore calling it a committee seems to be a misuomer.

gress, and therefore calling it a committee seems to be a misuomer. Now we come to the character of this commission, and my labor Now we come to the character of this commission, and my labor in the argument has been very greatly reduced by the admission tonight of the Senator from Ohio. He stated to-night distinctly that this power of the two Houses to pass upon the returns and count the votes is a judicial power. He did not leave that in doubt. He did not leave the power floating through the Constitution to be located by an act of Congress, as the Senator from Vermont did the other day; but he described it as a judicial power, and he said that it belonged to the two Houses. Then we are brought face to face with the proposition that here is a judicial power which the Senator says the proposition that here is a judicial power which the Senator says is placed in the two Houses, and the question arises, can this power be delegated to a commission? I do not care whether it is composed entirely of members or whether it is composed entirely of outsiders, can this power be delegated at all? I say it cannot, except in violation of the plainest principles of the Constitution of the United States. If the power belongs to the two Houses, as the Senator from Ohio says it does, it must be exercised by the two Houses, and cannot be transferred to the Supreme Court or any intermediate tribunal made up half and half. If it is a mere floating power, to be located only by an act of Congress, then this objection may not prevail; but the Senator from Ohio places it squarely as a judicial power belonging to the two Houses. How does he and how does the Senator from New York get over this difficulty? They say, Congress is in the habit of appointing commissions made up of members and persons who are not members, and he instances the silver commission, composed partly of Senators and Representatives and of learned persons who do not belong to Congress. This is lame and impotent and the proposition that here is a judicial power which the Senator says sons who do not belong to Congress. This is lame and impotent and shows the futility of the whole doctrine, for in this very case of the silver commission its findings amount to nothing and have no force until they are embodied in a law and passed by both Houses of Congress. It comes merely as information; it comes merely as instruc-tion. But suppose it was provided that the finding of this silver commission should stand as the law unless reversed by both Houses commission should stand as the law unless reversed by both Houses of Congress, would not that be clearly a delegation of legislative power? There the case entirely changes. If you say that their action shall be binding as law, unless both Houses of Congress shall reverse it, then you have conferred upon them the power to legislate subject only to reversal by the affirmative action of both Houses of Congress. Will any man in his senses pretend that that can be done, that legislative power can thus be transferred? Why cannot legislative power be transferred? Because the Constitution has placed it in the two Houses. Why can you not transfer and delegate a judicial power. Houses. Why can you not transfer and delegate a judicial power that has been placed in the two Houses? Simply for the same reason that the Constitution has placed it in the two Houses. I do not care bloody blankets. He may be required to take notice what is the bale of goods that he is called upon to open; and the duty imposed upon he President of the Senate is to take notice that he opens the certifiates from the electors of the State, and from nobody else.

power belonging to the two Houses. It is begging the question when you compare this to the silver commission or to a conference committe. As I said the other day in regard to a conference committee, the action of a conference committee amounts to nothing until it has the action of a conference committee amounts to nothing until it has been ratified by both Houses of Congress. We cannot appoint a conference committee and put into the resolution that their findings shall be valid and stand as a law until both Houses shall reverse it. Everybody will admit that that would be unconstitutional. Why? Because it would be the delegation of legislative power. If this judicial power is placed by the Constitution in the two Houses of Congress, you cannot delegate it any more than you could the legislative power. I do not care what the character of the power is, if it has been plead in the two Houses by the Constitution it cannot be delegate. been placed in the two Houses by the Constitution it cannot be delegated, be it legislative or judicial.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the character of these supreme judges. There has been a haze, a cloud, over this whole debate until the Senator from Michigan to-night took bold and clear grounds upon it. understood the Senator from Delaware to take the same ground, but upon asking him a question I found he did not exactly do so. The Senator from Michigan said that we were not creating a new office and that we were not giving to these men a new official character, that they were appointed as judges in their official judicial character, and that this new jurisdiction was to be cast upon them by this bill. So I understand the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Delaware that these supreme judges are acting as judges in their official capacity except that their jurisdiction has been enlarged. This brings us to the strange anomaly that has no foundation in the Constitution, that we can make up a judicial tribunal partly of members of Congress and partly of judges of the Supreme Court. It seems to me that a proposition of that kind need only to be stated to be condemned by everybody. According to the Senator from Michigan and these other Senators, here is a commission partly made up of five supreme judges, as such, in their official judicial character, but having new jurisdiction cast upon them. Then here are ten Senators and members of the House, as such, but they have new powers cast upon them. As members of the House they each have one vote, as members of the Senate they simply have one vote; but in this capacity they are enabled to make in conjunction with five supreme judges a finding which will stand as a law which we can only reverse by the judgment of both Houses. It is a mongrel institution. It is, as I said before, a contrivance, patchwork. that these supreme judges are acting as judges in their official capacity before, a contrivance, patchwork.

I come now to the question, is it a court? Undoubtedly it is. That has been denied here to-night. It is a tribunal in which the members are sworn to do their duty, in which they are clothed with extraordinary powers. The members of this tribunal hold an office and it is a new office, entirely different from that which they hold as members of the Supreme Court and as members of Congress, and they are appointed in violation of the Constitution. The Constitution requires every officer to be appointed by the President of the United States except those the appointment of which may be vested in the several Departments. Here is to be a body of officers who are appointed not by the President. They were not appointed by him at all as members of this body, but they are to compose a judicial tribunal, strictly judicial, and thus the obligation of the Constitution is entirely evaded, that all officers shall be appointed by the President of the United

I come to another question, in regard to the jurisdiction of this tribunal. Here I must be excused if I partly repeat what I said day before yesterday. I certainly could not improve it. The Senator from Ohio admits that if this bill provides that the commission shall not go behind the returning boards of the several States no democratic member of either House will vote for it. He admits that frankly. member of either House will vote for it. He admits that trankly. He says it will not get a vote. Then they vote for the bill with the understanding that this commission can go behind the returns made from the several States. But, says the Senator from Ohio, the bill does not give them leave to go behind the returns, but leaves them at liberty to do so if the general principles of law will allow them to do it. O, no, Mr. President, that is the fatal mistake about this bill. It does not leave it free to decide whether Congress as a returning board has a right to go behind the returns from a State; but it requires them has a right to go behind the returns from a State; but it requires them to do certain things which will compel them to go behind these returns and to find the fact, and that is a position which I assume has not been met by any Senator upon this floor. This bill requires them to find the fact whether electors have been duly appointed, that is, duly elected, and not whether they have been duly certified by the officers of a State; not whether they have been duly returned by the officers of the State, but to find the fact that they have been duly elected. What I maintain is that this commission cannot carry out this part of the bill without going behind the returns from a State, and that is what our democratic friends understand by it. It is and that is what our democratic friends understand by it. It is sprinkled with very white, pretty meal, but I think the democratic cat is reposing beneath it. They are required to find what are the constitutional votes from a State. How? Whether the elector was eligible or not, whether he voted by ballot or not, whether in all respects they have complied with the law. Here are questions to be submitted to this commission that were never intended by the fathers of the Constitution to be relied at the time the vertex was expected. of the Constitution to be raised at the time the vote was counted. It was to be a simple process to open the certificate and count the votes contained in that certificate. I used the phrase the other day, good, bad, and indifferent, and so I say now; but the count is to be made in the presence of the two Houses; it is not to be made in the Senate Chamber and in the House of Representatives. We are not to separate and to make the count in these two chambers apart. We cannot separate under the Constitution and do that, but the count is to be made in the presence of the two Houses when the two Houses are together; and all that goes to make a count, all in which a count consists, is to take place and transpire in the presence of the two Houses. The votes are to be counted in the presence of the two Houses.

Then this bill, as I believe, violates the Constitution. First, it requires these commissioners to do a thing which neither the President of the Senate nor the two Houses have a right to do.

of the Senate nor the two Houses have a right to do.

In the next place, if this is a judicial power and belongs to the two Houses, it must be exercised by the two Houses, and cannot be delegated to an outside tribunal. In the next place, if this tribunal is a court, and these men are officers, they must be appointed by the President of the United States; they must be appointed as other judicial officers are. I remember that Justice Nelson, from New York, was placed on the commission to reget that a treaty with Careat Brit. was placed on the commission to negotiate a treaty with Great Britain; but he was confirmed by the Senate just like the other members were; and after they had been appointed by the law that authorized their appointment, and confirmed by the Senate, their treaty still was not binding until it was ratified by two-thirds of the members of the Senate.

Something has been said about Colorado. There is a very good illustration of this doctrine and of the difficulties in the way. sible that, when the vote comes, the question as to whether Colorado is a State in the Union can be raised at the desk, and is then to be decided; that the votes shall stop until the whole question whether Colorado is a State or not has been decided? If so, it ceases to be the short and simple process that was contemplated by the fathers. That Colorado is a State in the Union, I am required to take notice. The President of the Senate is required to take notice of that as much as he is that Vermont is a State in the Union; and I do not believe that the question can be made when it comes to the count of the vote whether Colorado is a State in the Union. Something must be received as settled, something must be accepted as having been consummated, and it is only in harmony with the theory of our Government to say that Colorado is a State and that everybody must take notice of it, and that no question can be made when we come to count that vote.

I know, Mr. President, that because of the position that I have taken I am charged with being a partisan. I do not believe that I am any more a partisan than the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Delaware. I admit that I am a republican and that I desire the success of that party, if it has honestly and lawfully succeeded. I believe that it has. I believe that if this vote is counted as it was for the first seventy-five years, Rutherford B. Hayes must be counted in and inaugurated, and that by the adoption of this plan his opponent would have chances that he has not now. A tribunal is to be created, a technical tribunal, and every question is to be submitted to that tribunal. If it decides against us upon one out of forty questions it is tribunal. If it decides against us upon one out of forty questions it is the same as deciding against us upon all.

The Senator from Ohio says the democratic party is the legitimate descendant of the republicans of 1800. I do not think that the democratic party as we have it now is the legitimate descendant of anybody. I think it has "growed" up, like Topsy. We are members of parties and we will be. I have my conviction as to what is right, as to what is proper. I believe that the best interests of this country, the what is proper. I believe that the best interests of this country, the best interests of all parties and of all men, are bound up in the success of the republican party; and believing that as I do I am not willing now, when the case is made up and when we have what is called a sure thing, to adopt a plan to throw away one-half of our chances or more. That is the whole of it.

Why is this extraordinary exertion made at this time? Why is this great effort to argue that, legislation or no legislation, the President of the Senate cannot count the vote? Why are we to have two-story speeches day after day put in to prove the proposition that the President of the Senate cannot count the vote? Suppose that is established. That is a victory over somebody, and I imagine at this time it is a victory over the republican party. For several years I have tried to bring this matter to the attention of the Senate of the United States in my feeble way. I may have been right or I may have been wrong. I may remark right here that the Senator from New York did not give the proper construction to the bill that passed the Senate. I am not going into a defense of that bill nor the reasons for its introduction in the particular form that it was introduced, but it is enough for me to say that he did not give to it the construction that I give to it, because it did not recognize as double that return which came from outsiders, which was a bogus return, and did not come from a State. According to my construction this second bogus return from Louisiana and from Florida could not come in, even if that bill were now a law.

Mr. President, enough upon that point. That I may have been inconsistent in the views that I have taken upon this question from time to time is entirely possible. I do not think there are any popes in this body. The doctrine of infallibility has never been proclaimed in regard to any Senator here. If it were necessary to open these volumes I think I could show that every member of that committee has expressed different sentiments from those expressed in this bill. As my friend the Senator from New York did me the honor to read from an address of mine in regard to this matter, I want to read from a resolution which he introduced in the Senate, I think as long ago as 1873, in which he advanced sentiments which are entirely hostile to the doctrine of this bill. I only do this because the Senator referred to my language to-day. It was the question of receiving the vote in to my language to-day. It 1873. The resolution was:

Resolved, That the electoral votes for Georgia cast for Horace Greeley be counted.

The Senator from New York moved to amend it as follows:

The function of the joint convention being ministerial merely, and this question being independent of the question of the effect of the votes or of the count.

He brought it forward several times, and finally in this form:

The function of the two Houses in counting the votes being ministerial merely, and this question being independent of the effect of the votes or of the count.

If that doctrine was applied to this bill it would be entirely useless. The Senator, in the course of his speech in this body a year or two ago, speaking of the amendment and the bill, said:

Either House or both Houses may do whatever is committed to it or to them; but Congress cannot delegate to anybody else legislative power or any other power which is reposed in Congress, and located there and nowhere else. So we may make a rule which shall commit to the presiding officers of the two Houses the duty of scribes and chirographers, to set down and count up and state these figures; but when you come to the last act, to the act accomplished of making the count, in all senses which the Constitution imports, that is the act of the two Houses. "The votes shall then be counted," the two Houses being there.

That is the doctrine which I have stated here to-night, not half so well, but in my feeble way.

Mr. President, there is very much more that I should like to say on this question, but I have not the strength nor does the time admit of it. I can only say that in the position which I have taken I have been doing what I believe simply to be my duty. I accord to every other Senator conscientious purposes and motives. I agree that all are doing what they think is right. I claim for myself simply the same consideration. If I am called a partisan or if it is said that I am advocating the interests of my party, I am willing to admit it, within the limits of what I have stated here to-night. I believe that the republican party has saved this nation; I believe that it has saved the republican party has saved this nation; I believe that it has saved this Constitution, and I believe that the greatest considerations of humanity and of public and private interest now demand that it should be continued in power. If that demand can be complied with, keeping within the law and keeping within the facts, it ought to be complied with. What I say now at this particular juncture is that it is not our duty, it is not our interest to depart from that method pursued for seventy-five years simply to give to our political oppo-ments advantages and chances that they now have not.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I have, I trust, as profound an appreciation as any Senator on this floor of the gravity of the situation. I would not if I could, underrate it, and no public good can result from overstating it. I have felt anxious from the first day of the session to join in any wise measure that would tend to allay public uneasiness and to restore, or at least maintain, public confidence. In this spirit I followed the lead of the honorable chairman of the Juthis spirit I followed the lead of the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. EDMUNDS] in December in an effort to secure a constitutional amendment which would empower the Supreme Court of the United States to peacefully and promptly settle all the troubles growing out of the disputed electoral votes. I knew there were weighty objections to any measure connecting the judiciary with the political affairs of the country; but I nevertheless thought, and I still think, that under the impressive sanction of a constitutional amendment the angry differences growing out of a presidential contest might with safety and satisfaction, he adjusted by that tial contest might with safety and satisfaction be adjusted by that supreme tribunal which, combining dignity, honor, learning, and presumed impartiality, would be regarded by men of all parties as a

It was in that spirit and with those views that I voted for the constitutional amendment, which I regret to say failed to commend itself to the Senate. It was defeated, and I refer to it now only to show that I have not been reluctant to make any proper and constitutional adjustment of pending difficulties. I am not wedded to any particular plan except that of the Constitution, nor have I any pet theories outside of the Constitution, and, unlike a good many gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber with whom I am newly associated here, I have no embarrassing record on this question of "counting the votes.

But, Mr. President, looking at the measure under consideration and looking at it with every desire to co-operate with those who are so warmly advocating it, I am compelled to withhold the support of my vote. I am not prepared to vest any body of men with the tremendous power which this bill gives to fourteen gentleman, four of whom are to complete their number by selecting a fifteenth, and selecting a fifteenth under such circumstances as throughout the length and breadth of the land impart a peculiar interest, I might say an absorbing interest to what Mr. Benton termed in the Texas indemnity bill, "that coy and bashful blank." I do not believe that Congress bill, "that coy and bashill blank." I do not believe that Congress itself has the power which it proposes to confer on these fifteen gentlemen. I do not profess to be what is termed, in the current phrase of the day, a "constitutional lawyer," but every Senator voting under the obligations of his oath and his conscience must ultimately be his own constitutional lawyer. And I deliberately say that I do not believe that Congress possesses the power itself and still less the power to transfer to any body of fourteen or fifteen or fifty gentlemen that with which it is now proposed to invest five Senators, five Representatives, and five judges of the Supreme Court. I did not at this late hour of the night rise to make an argument, but merely to state the ground, the constitutional and conscientious ground, on which I feel compelled to vote against the pending bill. I have had a great desire to co-operate with my political friends who are advocating it, but every possible inclination of that kind has been removed and dispelled by the very arguments brought in support of the bill, able and exhaustive as they have been on that side of the question.

I beg to make one additional remark through you, Mr. President, to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and through him to his able associates who serve on that committee, that while this subject s now in the public mind as it never has been before from the foundation of the Government, when the leading jurists of the country have been investigating it as never before, that they will not allow this session of Congress to close without carefully maturing and submitting to the States a constitutional amendment which will remove so far as possible all embarrassment in the future. The people of this country, without regard to party, desire in our Government due and orderly procedure under the sanction of law, and that I am sure is what is desired by every Senator on this floor and by none more ardently than by myself. Let us then if possible guard against all rouble in the future by some wise and timely measure that will be ust to all parties and all sections, and, above all, just to our obligations under the Constitution.

tions under the Constitution.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I had a fervent hope that I should get through this debate and get to a vote upon this bill without opening my head in the course of the discussion, and I believe I should have been that victorious over myself if it had not been for some remarks, some very able and very forcible, some remarkably ingenious remarks; but some, I must be allowed to add, in my opinion, not entirely just remarks just now submitted to the Senate by the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

I was far distant from this city when I first read the bill we are now considering. I am free to confess that I hailed it with great gratification and pride. I was afraid it would not meet with the unanimous cation and pride. I was alraid it would not meet with the unanimous support of the two Houses, and yet I had a sort of hope that that support would come near to unanimity. If I had not been compelled to read at the same time that I read the bill that the Senator from Indiana was not able himself to give to it his assent, I should have supposed that the bill would have received the unanimous vote of the two Houses of Congress. But I was utterly unprepared to hear any Senator say that this bill was addressed to the magnanimity of any political party. If that be so, and if a vote for the bill is to be recorded as an evidence of the magnanimity of the republican party, I do not know that for that single fact I as an individual should shrink from voting for it. I have not been open to such accusations perhaps any more than is good for me; and if in these closing days of my public career I should be overtaken by some such novel grace, I should stand up under it as well as I am able, but I do not yield my assent to the bill upon any such consideration. I am bound as a truthful man to oni upon any such consideration. I am bound as a truthful man to confess that; and I did not expect to hear from any republican Senator that this bill was framed in the interest of the democratic party. I have not been conspicuous for my services in the interest of that party heretofore and do not propose to embark, with my eyes open, in its service now, and if I had supposed the bill was so framed, I am very much afraid that I should have shrunk from it even with loathing. but I did not so expect.

very much afraid that I should have shrunk from it even with loathing; but I did not so suspect.

After all I have heard (and I have been a very patient and attentive listener to this debate, one of the most remarkable, by the way, which has illustrated the annals of our Congress) I am not able to see how or wherein this bill is of itself to promote the interests of the democratic party. Why? What interest has the democratic party staked upon this bill? I suppose none will be suggested in the world except that of the success of that ticket which it supported during the late presidential election. But is any republican Senator or citizen prepared to say that this bill promotes the success of that ticket? Why so, I beg to know. Nothing can be done under this bill to promote the success of those candidates unless in the execution of the law you shall secure an opinion from five picked men of the Senate and from five picked men of the House and from five picked judges from the highest court in the land that that ticket did succeed; and where is the republican in or ourside of this Chamber who cares to advertise to the country that such a tribunal as I have who cares to advertise to the country that such a tribunal as I have just called over is bound to adjudge that that ticket did succeed at the late election? I have not seen any evidence upon that point which has led me to believe that fifteen such men would be bound to come to any such conclusion and therefore I did not feel called upon to distrust such a tribunal. I know of no human interest which, if it must be adjudged by human beings, I would not be willing to submit to the arbitrament of fifteen such men as the bill provides for.

Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana says we do not need any legislation now, we have got a sure thing, and we had better not give away any part of it that if we fail to legislate, still all pending controversies will be adjudicated as like controversies have been adjudicated in all the prior years of our national existence. Mr. President, was that a fair statement of the case with which we have to deal? Unless our previous history has been misread in my hearing during this debate, unless I have misread it myself, we have had no occasion like this which now confronts us in all our previous history. Sir, if the result of the late presidential contest is not left in doubt, which I will not affirm, I do think I am authorized to say that it is left in dispute. While I was on my way to the Gulf not long since I read in dispute. While I was on my way to the Guir not long since I read a pronunciamiento over the signature of Mr. Abram S. Hewitt, the chairman of the national democratic committee—if that is the office he fills—in which he advertised to all the people of this Republic that Tilden and Hendricks were elected President and Vice-President of the United States, hurrah! It was but a day or two after that that I read a similar advertisement over the signature, well kown to you and myself, of Z. Chandler, chairman of another committee, representing another party, advertising to the very same people that not Tilden and Hendricks, but that Hayes and Wheeler were elected President and Vice-President of the United States; pretty high authority you would think on both sides of this question. Is it not enough to authorize me to say that the result of the late election is at least a matter

How stand the people of the United States on this dispute? Will the forty-five millions regard this pronunciamiento of Mr. Hewitt as mere bluster and bravado and see as with one eye how absolutely truthful and accurate was the advertisement of Mr. Chandler; or will they on the other hand see that Chandler was bragging, and Hewirr was dealing in plain unadulterated truth? For my single self I doubt if those millions, all of them, will agree to accept either of these pronunciamientos. I have seen a great many things in the newspapers nunciamientos. I have seen a great many things in the newspapers and elsewhere which lead me to the conclusion that the people themselves do not all regard this thing alike; but some of the people actually believe that Tilden and Hendricks were elected. Some of them, on y utter surprise, thought that they ought to be elected, and voted for them; and I think, inasmuch as there was a difference of opinion as to who ought to have been elected, which of these tickets ought to have succeeded, there is still a difference of opinion among the people as to which has succeeded. But before this time has any such dispute ever existed in the United States? I think the Senator from Indiana and other Senators would have us understand that heretofore, in some occult way, legitimately or illegitimately, the Vice-President of the United States or the President dent of the Senate has taken upon himself the duty of ascertaining what was the result of an election, and making it known to all the people. I do not understand that that has ever been the case. I do understand that the President of the Senate has ever counted the votes given for President and Vice-President in any other sense than every member of the Senate and every member of the House has counted them, each man counting for himself; and I do not understand that any one of them, or all of them together, have counted the votes in any one instance in any other sense than the votes have been counted by every citizen; and more than that, I do understand it to be a historical fact that the people of the United States have really canvassed and decided every previous election for President and Vice-President before the President of the Senate ever opened a certificate from a State; and therefore what the President of the Senate has done heretofore has been merely to spread before the two Houses in joint meeting the verification, the papers, which authenticated the count which the people had made before, and which the press had made known not only to all the people of the Republic but to the people of the world. Hitherto there has been no such dispute. Now there is such a dispute, and somebody must decide that dispute.

Now there is such a dispute, and somebody must decide that dispute.

Mr. President, I think the Senator from Indiana or some one else during this debate and during this day read some remarks from Mr.
Clay, in which he termed this power that we are now talking about, this power to decide disputes as to a presidential vote, a power not provided for in the Constitution, an omitted case in the Constitution.
I myself think that remark was entirely just. I think so for three reasons at least, which I can readily state. One is that I do not find in the text of the Constitution any adequate term for it to clothe any known tibunal under this Government with that power of decision. known tribunal under this Government with that power of decision. Secondly, I do not think it ever entered into the head of a single one of those men who made your Constitution that such a case as confronts us would ever arise in our history, that it would happen in the history of our Government that a State authorized to give a certain number of votes in the choice of a President and Vice-President and authorized to appoint them just as her Legislature pleased would ever permit two certificates declaring two different choices or selecever permit two certificates declaring two different choices or selec-tions to come to the National Government. Unless I had seen it done myself several times, I would not have believed that any such inci-dent could have transpired. And I would say in passing that if for thirty days I could have concentrated in myself the prerogatives of the Government in any one of these States which have permitted two such certificates to go out from its midst I would give good guarantee that it would be the last time such certificates should go from that State. Here, sir, a man slanders the title by which you hold the house you live in; you treat him as a criminal and punish him as such, and justly so. But here a set of miscreants is allowed to slander the title to the first magistrate of the first republic on the earth, and you treat it rather as a joke, as a little difficulty that is to be got along with in some way as well as possible and exposed as completely and as effectually as possible. A man utters a counterfeit ten-dollar bill, and you send him to the penitentiary for a term of years; but they forge a certificate purporting to utter the voice of a State in the great matter of choosing a President and Vice-President, and what do you the Government in any one of these States which have permitted two an about that? Octoby the time of contended to the conten framers of the Constitution is this: You know, sir, that that convention met with a great many difficult problems to solve. Among others was the great question whether in the new government they proposed to institute each of the States should have the same quantity of power, or whether the power of the several States should be in proportion to the number of their people. You know how that was—compromised, I believe is the term; how that was settled in reference to the legislative department of the Government. Then came the question about the constitution of the executive branch of the Government. It was deemed generally to be necessary to have an executive, generally necessary to have a single executive. The question was how to constitute that executive. The most natural suggestion, and that which occupied the attention of the convention the gestion, and that which occupied the attention of the convention the longest, was that he should be elected by the Congress; but the grave objection to that was that he would be the creature of Congress, and so instead of being independent of the legislative branch of the Government would be absolutely dependent upon the legislative branch. It was suggested that he should be elected by the governors of the States; it was suggested that he should be elected by the people of the States. To this last suggestion it was answered first that the great body of the people would not be sufficiently acquainted with the nublic men to know which were the fittest for the office; and see the public men to know which were the fittest for the office; and secondly to make him elective by the people would make him represent the States precisely in proportion to the number of people in the States. It was suggested that he should be elected by the governors. That was open to this last objection But finally when the plan of the Constitution was referred to the committee on style, the plan said that the President should be elected by Congress and should not be re-eligible. In that shape it was reported back to the convention by that committee. Still the convention were dissatisfied with the plan. The problem still confronted them, how shall we contrive to elect a President in some way so that he shall fairly represent the large and President in some way so that he shall fairly represent the large and the small States and still not be dependent upon the legislative branch of the Government. That problem was finally, and but a short time before the adjournment of the session of the convention, referred to the committee of eleven, and that committee contrived this plan of the electoral college. They were so intent upon avoiding these two difficulties which had confronted them all through the convention, that they were in an executive to the convention, that they were in an executive to the convention. that they were in an exceedingly unfortunate frame of mind to anticipate any such obstacles as we have found in our path.

So then I do not find in the Constitution any very express authority to any existing tribunal to decide these disputes; but the disputes are here. There is nothing more certain than that; and these disputes must be settled by somebody. I have formerly said in this Chamber, and I still hold of my individual self, that the only tribunal which can finally settle this dispute is the judicial branch of the Government; but before the judicial tribunals can get hold of it, Government; but before the judicial tribunals can get hold of it, there must be a prima facie case made, somebody must be inducted into the office and somebody must question his right to the office being in. Until that happens no case can arise under the Constitution or laws of the United States which can set the judicial tribunals in motion. In all the States that I know of, there is some tribunal which makes what you call a prima facie case of title to offices, not conclusive upon anybody, a title which can be reviewed by the courts, and often is reviewed by the courts and upset. But where is the tribunal which can make this prima facie title, which can settle pro forma for the time being the disputes which confront us?

Mr. President, I shall not attempt to add one word, and I could not if I were ever so well prepared for it add one word, to the argument if I were ever so well prepared for it add one word to the argument by which the right of the President of this body has been denied-the right of the President of this body to decide these disputes. shall not attempt to add one word to the argument by which the right of the two Houses, whether acting separately or acting together, to decide the same disputes has been denied here. I say the debate has proved, and I think almost the united testimony of your statesmen and your lawyers from the foundation of the Government to this time ought to be sufficient, that no such tribunal is provided for in the Constitution; and yet these questions stand here and must be settled, settled by somebody.

Now it is proposed by this bill—and this is all that I understand to be proposed by this bill which is seriously objectionable to anybody—to take the opinion of this commission, this high joint commission—I like that expression for it was introduced into our vocabulary on a very important occasion, and I think performed a very admirable work for the country—to take the opinion of this commission. It seems to me a fair commission. If it does not legally and authoritatively close out the whole question and put it beyond dispute, it will at least have great weight both with these two Houses and with that at least have great weight both with these two Houses and with that great constituency which these two Houses represent. I was not only willing to take the opinion of such a tribunal upon this very existing question; I was not only not afraid to take that opinion, but for myself I was absolutely afraid to refuse to take the opinion of such a tribunal. When a question is to be settled, must be decided, I know of no fairer way to do it than to leave it to the judgment of henest, able, intelligent men. I should hate to shrink from subcatting to such a reference any interest which concerned me.

Mr. President, I rose mainly to disclaim any purpose to serve the interests of the democratic party in the support I give this bill. I will not sit down, however, without saying one thing more in reference to this bill. I notice, and have noticed all through this debate, that it is not only opposed vigorously by many very able and very eminent men, but that many of those who support it support it tamely if not impotently. I do not give it any such support. I really believe—and that is about the last thing I wish to say on this bill—that the bill is the proudest tribute to the Congress of our country, the proudest monument to our statesmanship which has been produced since that convention adjourned which framed the Constitution of the United States. They met graver difficulties than this, and they provided for the settlement of them. I admit this is a very grave question which confronts us; but in point of gravity it does not begin to weigh with many of the questions of infinite moment which pressed upon the attention of that convention. This is a grave one. Two parties, numbering in the aggregate forty-five millions of people, are concerned in the questions which are to be solved under this bill if it becomes a law, and a committee representing those two parties evenly did so far come together as, with one exception, to approve of this plan which compromises the honor, the rights of no man, and no party, and no cause; did, with one exception, agree to this plan. I hold it to be a great triumph, even if the bill finally fails. If it could have met the united approval of that committee, I should have been still more rejoiced. If it could have met, as I think it deserves to meet, the unanimous approval of the two Houses, I should almost feel, I think, as one much better than I did feel when he first looked upon the infant Saviour of mankind—feel as if I had seen the salvation, not of my kind, but the salvation of my country.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I feel that I ought to offer an excuse at this early hour of the morning for presuming to occupy even a few minutes of the time of the Senate. I find that I am pretty nearly alone on this side of the House and I regret that my friends do not view the matter as I do. I regret that my colleague does not view it as I do. I deeply regret that the senate of my State last Saturday by a unanimous vote requested me to vote for this bill; but they were wise enough to get together yesterday and reconsider that vote. What is to be the end of it I do not know. It is not very pleasant to be in a minority of one or two in your own party in a body like this. But, sir, I have learned to stand on my ewn convictions.

What is to be the end of it I do not know. It is not very pleasant to be in a minority of one or two in your own party in a body like this. But, sir, I have learned to stand on my own convictions.

I ought to say here that I have the utmost confidence in the integrity, in the honor, in the character of the committee who have had this bill in charge, every one of them, without regard to party. I have no doubt that they have produced a bill to the Senate that in their judgment will act for the best interests of the country. I only regret that I cannot vote for the bill.

Under the Constitution the electoral vote of the country has been counted once in four years since 1789, nearly a century. Then, sir, there must have been somewhere a well-defined power. Where is that power? Either, first, in the President of the Senate or, second, in the House of Representatives or, third, in the two Houses, acting either interly or concurrently.

A great deal has been said here—I am not going to read books tonight—to show that the President of the Senate has not the power, under the Constitution, to scrutinize, investigate, and determine the electoral votes. One Senator has said that he had no greater power than the Sergeant-at-Arms. I shall not be led into a lengthy argument on that subject. I simply want to state my view. I read from article 12 of the amendments to the Constitution:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

I will read a little further:

The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President.

I want to comment on this for a moment; a mere statement of the case will save elaboration. It is utterly impossible that the framers of that instrument could have intended that the President of the Senate should be the conscience-keeper of the House of Representatives. It is an absurdity. Under a certain contingency the House of Representatives are then and there "immediately" to elect a President of the United States. Upon the count of the President of the Senate? Not so, sir; but upon their own scrutiny, their own investigation; not anybody else's; neither that of the Senate nor that of the President of the Senate. How will they exercise that great duty which is devolved upon them under this contingency, except by making the scrutiny themselves then and there? And that, let me tell the honorable Senator from Ohio and the honorable Senator from Delaware, is the reason why this contrivance of their's ought to sink into the earth. I shall allude to that in another connection

Great reliance has been placed here by my honorable friend from Great reliance has been placed here by my honorable friend from Indiana upon a certain, not opinion—it is not to be called an opinion—but a certain remark made by Chancellor Kent in one of his lectures. It is not an opinion. It lacks everything that goes to make up an opinion. I read from Kent, volume 1:

The President of the Senate, on the second Wednesday of February succeeding every meeting of the electors, in the presence of the members of both Houses of Congress, opens all the certificates and the votes are then to be counted. The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes and a closely contested election, this power may be all important; and I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two Houses are present only as spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction and to act only if no choice be made by the electors.

No lawyer of the eminence of Chancellor Kent could, with thought and reflection, give an opinion of that character. If by the Constitution of the United States the power is placed in the President of the Senate, then it is to be exercised by him, no matter what is the character of the certificates which he has opened or of the votes which are there. Therefore this presumption of Chancellor Kent is not worthy of the opinion of a lawyer of his character. Then I think, as I had the honor of saying here a year ago—and I have not found it necessary to change my opinion—that the scrutinizing, the counting, and the determining of votes is not a part of the duties of the presiding officer of the Senate.

Now I come to the second point: is it lodged in the House of Representatives ‡. A very strong argument can be made and has been

Now I come to the second point: is it lodged in the House of Representatives? A very strong argument can be made, and has been made, that the very fact that, under a certain contingency, the House of Representatives is immediately called upon to elect a President of the United States is sufficient evidence that they are to determine whether a President has been elected. In my judgment, that does not follow. They are to be satisfied by the examination which they make as one of the Houses that there has been no President elected; and then and there, immediately after they have satisfied themselves of that fact, the duty is devolved upon them by the Constitution of the United States to elect a President of the United States. Perhaps I ought to say here, not to take up much time, that it seems to me absolutely necessary, by the very terms of the instrument, that they must have the power to determine for their own satisfaction the existence of the fact.

Then I say I differ with very eminent lawyers, now residents of this city, who have placed that position before the public mind, while I agree that the House by its own action must be satisfied that no candidate for President has a majority of appointed electors. If such be the opinion of the House, obtained by a scrutiny of the votes after you, sir, have opened the certificates, it is their duty to proceed then and there to elect, and they and they only can determine. What does the Constitution of the United States mean when it says that, unless a President is elected, then "immediately" the House of Representatives shall proceed to elect? It means that the House must take action; that the House must determine whether a President has been elected, and, if not, then to perform the duty which the Constitution devolves upon it.

I am not of the opinion that the House of Representatives has the sole power to count and determine the votes. That power does not rest with the House of Representatives in its single capacity. Now, it is somewhere. If this power is lodged anywhere by the Constitution, where is it? It is somewhere. My honorable friend from Ohio, my honorable friend from New York, with whom by and by I propose to take, with Professor Henry, a little expedition—but I shall not permit the professor to take me anywhere in the neighborhood of Venus when my distinguished and handsome friend from New York is with me, because, however much admiration I might have for Venus, Venus would have none for me, [laughter]—I say that my friend from Ohio, my friend from Delaware, and my friend from New York agree with me that this power is vested by the Constitution in the two Houses of Congress. My distinguished friend from New York spoke yesterday hours, strongly, ably, eloquently. Two hours did he labor in order to establish to his own satisfaction and the satisfaction of all that you, sir, had not the power to count, but that that power was vested in the two Houses. If there, it is not anywhere else. If there, it cannot legally, constitutionally, and lawfully be placed anywhere else. Is it there? My friend from Ohio says yes; my friend from Delaware says yes; my friend from New York says yes.

When? Let us see whether you can contrive a commission to get this business into the hands of. "The votes shall then be counted." When? "Then." Then it goes on further to say that, if a President is not elected by the electoral colleges, the House of Representatives shall choose "immediately," and "immediately" does not mean unext week; "immediately" does not mean until after it has had this matter in hand. It means then instantly, when the House and Senate have determined on the subject, not the Supreme Court, not a committee, but the House and the Senate. When they have determined the count, if there be no election, then the House is to proceed at once to elect the President of the United States.

Now, I say that in my judgment this power to count and determine is by the Constitution conferred upon the two Houses, to be executed by joint or concurrent action. I think Mr. Jefferson said—I have it not at hand before me—that it should have been done by joint action. I think that was his view. However, the practice of eighty years would govern in that matter. Whether it should or should not, there is one pregnant fact that I desire every Senator to take into his mind, and that is this: the number of Representatives and Senators is just exactly the number of your electoral yote.

Mr. BAYARD. May I state to the honorable Senator that I think he will find in the debates of the convention that there were two votes taken upon that very proposition whether the Senators and Representatives should vot per capita in this decision as a joint assembly, and it was decided in both cases in the negative. I have been therefore surprised to find that the notion should still prevail that there was, in any discussion of the Constitution or of the history from which the Constitution came, the idea that there could be a commingled vote of the two Houses en masse to determine questions.

Mr. EATON. I was not about to suggest that. I said Mr. Jefferson thought so.

Mr. BAYARD. I only state to the honorable Senator that that question was raised in the convention and decided. There were two and the series of the theorem and decided. There were two absolute votes on that question.

Mr. EATON. I understand it so, and it was voted and decided six times that the word "national" should not be applied to the Government of the United States; that it was "Federal," and not "national." We have forgotten that fact; and yet it was so under the vote of Oliver Ellsworth and Roger Sherman of Connecticut. I said that Mr. Jefferson thought that that would have been the better way, and I simply wanted to say that it is a striking and pregnant fact that the exact number of Senators and members of the House of Representatives, when you come into convention, is the precise number of the electoral votes of the whole country; and therefore if it was so determined it would not be a very bad way of determining it.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me—

Mr. EATON. Certainly. I want my friend to remember that I am not suggesting that that is the way in which we should count.

Mr. THURMAN. No. The Senator is entirely right in saying that Mr. Jefferson declared in a letter which he wrote that a proposition to that effect probably would receive the support of the republicans of that day; but the fact is that the proposition which did receive their support was quite another proposition, and that was that it should require the concurrent vote of both Houses to reject the vote of a State.

Mr. EATON. I and mr. I want my triend that was that it should require the concurrent vote of both Houses to reject the vote of a State.

support was quite another proposition, and that was that it should require the concurrent vote of both Houses to reject the vote of a State.

Mr. EATON. I understand that concurrent action has been required. I was about to observe merely, passing by that as a matter of history, that I thought it would have been very well if they had carried out the power in that way. There is now, as I remember, but one State in the United States where, when the two houses of the Legislature come together, they do not form a joint convention either by statute or by rule under the chairmanship of the president of the senate or the lieutenant-governor of the State; and that State is, I think, Ohio. There may be others, but in all the New England States, New York, New Jersey, Virginia, North Carolina, and, so far as I know, in all the States except Ohio, when the two houses meet in convention they are in joint convention.

Mr. THURMAN. What would become of the smaller States?

Mr. EATON. I do not know what becomes of the large ones now.

[Laughter.]

[Laughter.]
But, Mr. President, let me hasten on. Concurrent action has been But, Mr. President, let me hasten on. Concurrent action has been the rule and precedent for nearly a hundred years; but I now desire to assert—and I have not yet heard it denied by any Senator who favors this bill—that the power to count, scrutinize, and determine the electoral vote is conferred by the Constitution upon the two Houses and must be by them exercised until the instrument is amended. I know that my honorable friend from Ohio sought to take shelter under the eighth section of the first article, which confers on Congress power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Now, permit me to say right here that that section does not refer to a conferred power which can be executed by the officer or the body on whom it is conferred, any more than you can legislate upon an

to a conferred power which can be executed by the officer or the body on whom it is conferred, any more than you can legislate upon an absolute power conferred by the Constitution upon the President of the United States to be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. You cannot make him lieutenant-general or rear-admiral. No sort of legislation can do it. If this power is absolutely conferred, either directly or by implication, it does not come under that section of the Constitution at all. It executes itself as the ballot executes itself.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator mean to say that Congress cannot courted the power of the President as Commander in Chief of the not control the power of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the not control the power of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy?

Mr. EATON. No, I did not say so. I meant to say that you cannot take from him that position; and I meant to say that if you and I have the authority to count and scrutinize and determine these votes, no power on earth can take it from us and we cannot divest ourselves of that power. That is just what I mean to say if it be so, and it is my opinion that it is so; I believe it is so. On my constitu tional oath I believe that I have that power, and therefore I cannot vote with you for this bill. I should sacrifice my honor as a man and a gentleman in doing it. The men who believe differently will vote differently. I cannot. I believe this power is vested in the Senate and House of Representatives, and it is for us to exercise it, not dodge nor shirk nor avoid it, but do our duty under it. I shall so far as I am able. am able

Mr. THURMAN. Those are hard words "dodge" and "shirk."

What does the Senator mean?

Mr. EATON. I beg the Senator to understand that I meant this: I cannot dodge or shirk a power that I believe is vested in me by the Constitution. I had before that said I should be dishonored to do it. God forbid that I should say that my honorable friend here or my honorable friend there should be dishonored in carrying out what they believe to be their constitutional power. I speak for myself, for nobody else.

I say, then, in my judgment it is a duty to be performed, and let us perform our duty. So far as I know I mean to do it. I vote against this bill, not for the reason that governs my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] or California [Mr. Sargent] or Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] not because I believe that it will injure one party and benefit worther. another. I cannot well say that I have any belief on that subject. Somebody did say as I came up to the Capitol this morning that he rather thought that both parties would get cheated in some way.

[Langhter.] I do not say so.

Again, will any member of the committee who reported this bill assert on the floor of the Senate that by the Constitution the two Houses have not this power? Is there anybody who will so assert on that committee? Will either of the members of that committee? I think they will not assert that for eighty years the two Houses have not exercised the power. I know the honorable Senator from Indiana said they had not. I am astonished that he should say so. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate in going through the book which has been referred to so often; it has been done very thoroughly by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. Conkling] and more or less so by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] but there has never been but one instance where the count, so far as I am able to discover, has been by the President of the Senate and that by an express order of the Senate. I think I am not mistaken in asserting that that was by an express order of both Houses, cer-

in asserting that that was by an express order of the state, tainly of the Senate, Now I hold in my hand something—I think it was alluded to by the honorable Senator from New York—but it is striking that I desire to read it. A joint resolution was passed in 1865 with regard to the electoral votes of certain of the States of the South, Virginia, Carolina North Carolina &c. This resolution was sent to South Carolina, North Carolina, &c. This resolution was sent to Mr. Lincoln, and as I have taken it out, although the Senator from New York read it, I desire to read again his message upon it:

New York read it, I desire to read again his message upon it:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives:

The joint resolution entitled "joint resolution declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the electoral college." has been signed by the Executive in deference to the view of Congress implied in its passage and presentation to him. In his own view, however, the two Houses of Congress, convened under the twe-fit article of the Constitution, have complete power to exclude from counting all electoral votes deemed by them to be illegal; and it is not competent for the Executive to defeat or obstruct that power by a veto, as would be the case if his action were at all essential in the matter. He disclaims all right of the Executive to interfere in any way in the matter of canvassing or counting electoral votes; and he also disclaims that by signing said resolution he has expressed any opinion on the recitals of the preamble, or any judgment of his own upon the subject of the resolution.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 8, 1865.

Here we see that the opinion of Mr. Lincoln was precisely the opinion of the gentlemen of the committee, that under the twelfth article of amendments to the Constitution the two Houses had entire power over this matter. Did anybody doubt the correctness of that opinion at that time that the two Houses had entire and complete opinion at that time that the two Houses had entire and complete power over this question?

Mr. President, I am giving my reasons why I cannot vote for this bill. I do not suppose anybody will conceive that they are of the slightest value, but they are to me. Two new factors are introduced by this bill entirely unknown before. First, outsiders, five men not known; the very committee who say (not perhaps all of them, but many of them) that the House and Senate have absolute power over this matter bring in a new factor in the shape of five judges of the Supreme Court. The next factor they bring in is the President of the United States. What business has he in this matter? You cannot make a bill; you cannot pass a law; you cannot legislate upon this make a bill; you cannot pass a law; you cannot legislate upon this subject, unless the President of the United States agree with you, without having two-thirds of the House and two-thirds of the ate; and it will take two-thirds of both Houses under this bill in order to count an electoral vote, unless the gentleman at the other end of the Avenue agrees to it. It is an absolutely new factor. Here-tofore a majority of each House has had the power to count and de-termine; but the committee say under this bill that they must have two-thirds, unless they can get another factor with them—the President of the United States.

Mr. THURMAN. The same objection would lie to the bill of 1824.

Mr. EATON. I did not say, far be it from me to say, that some gentlemen had not gotten up bills that have never passed and become

Mr. THURMAN. This bill has not passed yet.

Mr. EATON. No, and it never will pass with my vote. I know that in 1824 a certain bill was gotten up by which this new factor was introduced, but it did not become a law. Neither of them became

Mr. THURMAN. Twenty-four years before that a bill was proposed.

Mr. EATON. Isay once in 1800 and once in 1824 there were bills, but they did not meet the approval of such men as Macon and very many other democrats, or republicans, as they were called then Van Buren was in favor of it; Webster, who was not a republican, was in favor of it, but neither of those bills became laws.

Under this bill the power of the House is taken from it which is conferred by the Constitution. The House, as I said before, under certain contingencies, is to elect the President of the United States. By this bill the House cannot determine whether that contingency arises; it is to be determined by somebody else, not the House.

I do not care to elaborate on this matter. The measure, in my judgment, is in violation of the Constitution; in violation of that power which is vested in the two Houses, and cannot by them be delegated to any other body or class of men. Therefore I cannot vote for this Much has been said by gentlemen, by the honorable Senator from New York, and the honorable Senator from Ohio, and others, in vindi-cating this bill, that it did not cripple the powers of the two Houses. I think the language used in the debate was that it left them as they were. Why pass it then, if it leaves them as they were? They have got all power now. With this bill will any man undertake to say to Senators that they have all power? I do not undertake now to say what the power is; but it is complete, full, comprehensive. Under this bill, in a certain contingency, there must be a union of the two this bill, in a certain contingency, there must be a union of the two Why pass it then, if it leaves them as they were? They have this bill, in a certain contingency, there must be a union of the two Houses in order to effect any action against the bill. No, no, Mr. President, it is not so; there is a very great change made.

There are many things that I have on my memoranda that I will not detain the Senate by referring to. I suppose this bill is to pass. I regret that I cannot vote for it. All I can say is that I hope to God it may prove as beneficial as it authors can desire. I hope it may be a panacea to all our evils for the time being. There is not anybody that wants this creature to live over thirty days. It was not a thing that its authors desired to make permanent. That I rejoice at. But many of my friends, gentlemen in whom I have boundless confidence. many of my friends, gentlemen in whom I have boundless confidence, who have my personal as well as political regard, believe that this will save the country from carnage perhaps, from bloodshed perhaps; at all events, that it will revive trade and bring a better feeling back to the people. I pray that it may. I have not given one moment of factious opposition to the bill. I would have been willing to let it pass yesterday, if you could have done so. I would have been willing to sit it out last night if my honorable friend from New York had ing to sit it out last night if my honorable friend from New York had been able to go on, because I well see and appreciate the fact that, if this bill is to become a law, the sooner the better. While I do not believe in it, while the principles of the bill do not commend themselves to my view of the doctrine of the Constitution, otherwise I have not one word to say against the bill. I do not think it will hurt the honor of the judges of the Supreme Court to fulfill the duties of an office of this character, and God forbid that I should think it would injure them any more than it did Judge Nelson when he crossed the ocean for the number of performing adults to his country. There are many for the purpose of performing a duty to his country. There are many things about the bill which I like; but there is one thing which I believe is wrong; and therefore, hoping that if it passes it will be a universal panacea for all our political ills, I shall be compelled to record my vote against it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have but a word to say, and that is only in answer to a remark made by the Senator from Connecticut which imported that this bill was only for this particular occasion. I would be willing that it should be a bill for every occasion if I did not believe, and most sincerely believe, that this country cannot stand the strain of quadrennial elections for President under the present system, and it is because I believe that before four years shall elapse the people of the United States will become sensible of that fact and remove by constitutional amendment all such questions as now embarrass us that I am willing to limit this bill to the present election.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, before proceeding to make a few remarks upon the bill now under consideration, I ask unanimous consent to present the memorial of A. Moffit, Henry Hardy, R. W. Hooe, Robert Howard, and other citizens of Uniontown, Washington County, District of Columbia, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to District of Columbia, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to provide a mode for counting the electoral vote. I move that this memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, the reasons which impel me to the support of this measure are probably widely variant from those which may actuate other Senators in their adhesion to its provisions.

Whatever others may say, I have doubts of its constitutionality, and if it were a measure to be permanent in its character I should certainly vote against it. The Senate may possibly remember that last session I took occasion to give utterance to what I deemed a true interpretation of the clause of the Constitution relating to the count of the electoral votes. The registron assumed was that the of the electoral votes. The position assumed was, that the appointment of electors was placed solely under the direction of the State Legislatures, and that the votes given in accordance with State laws were to be certified to the President of the Senate and in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives were to be opened and counted by him, and that he discharged merely the ministerial duty of ascertaining the number of votes cast for the several candidates, while the two Houses examined the certificates and verified the count and in the case of the failure of the electors to choose, then the House were to proceed immediately to elect the officers specially designated were to proceed immediately to elect the officers specially designated as to be chosen by the respective Honses.

The ministerial duty of counting or canvassing the returns is one thing; the power to judge of a contested election upon testimony regularly taken under law is another and quite a different thing. They are as distinctly and sharply defined as the ministerial duty of the clerk of a court and the judicial duty of the court itself.

I believe that the greening and counting of the votes in the present.

I believe that the opening and counting of the votes in the presence of the two Houses was for the purpose of enabling each House, before entering upon the discharge of the contingent duty imposed upon them respectively by the Constitution, to verify the count made by the presiding officer, and that it was only for their inspection that these certificates were laid before them. I believe that that was the intention of the framers of the Constitution. Mr. Hamilton, who was one of the strongest advocates for the system of electoral colleges, advocated that provision most strenuously, and he afterward in the Federalist spoke with complacency and with pleasure of the acceptance that this portion of the Constitution met with from the people. He proposed, however, in the draft of the Constitution which he handed to Madison toward the close of the deliberation of the convention, that instead of lodging the power to elect a President on the failure of the electors with the House of Representatives and on the failure to elect a Vice-President with the Senate, there should be a second college of electors; and in that proposition be laid upon the second college of electors precisely the same duties that are now laid in the Constitution upon the House of Representatives and upon the Senate in the event of the failure on the part of the electoral colleges to choose the President and Vice-President. To show what was his understanding of laying these lists before the Houses, the Senate will perceive upon an examination of this draft of a constitution prepared by him that he used these clear and explicit words: after describing the first electors, providing for their casting their ballots almost in the same words as provided in the Constitution itself, he goes on to say:

A copy of the same list, signed and certified in like manner, shall be transmitted by the first electors to the seat of the Government of the United States, under a sealed cover directed to the president of the Assembly; which, after the meeting of the second electors, shall be opened for the inspection of the two Houses of the Legislature.

Then when he provides for the second college of electors, he says:

Then when he provides for the second college of electors, he says:

The second electors shall meet precisely on the day appointed, and not on another day, at one place. The Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court, or, if there be no ChiefJustice, the judge senior in office in such court, or, if there be no one judge senior in office, some other judge of that court, by the choice of the rest of the judges, or of a majority of them, shall attend at the same place and shall preside at the meeting, but shall have no vote. Two-thirds of the whole number of the electors shall constitute a sufficient meeting for the execution of their trust.

Now how is the second college of the state in the second of their trust.

Now here is the second college of electors in the presence of a President, just as the House of Representatives and the Senate are called together in this Chamber in the presence of the President of the Senate, only that the Chief-Justice presided over the second college of electors instead of the President of the Senate over our combined assembly. Now what was to be done?

At this meeting the lists delivered to the respective electors shall be produced and inspected; and if there be any person who has a majority of the whole number of votes given by the first electors, he shall be the President of the United States; but if there be no such person, the second electors so met shall proceed to vote by ballot for one of the persons named in the lists, who shall have the three highest numbers of the votes of the first electors.—The Madison Papers, volume 5; Elliot's Debates, page 586.

Going on, therefore, to provide precisely as is provided in the case of the House of Representatives or of the Senate in regard to their choice of President or Vice-President as the case may be. So that these votes cast by the electoral colleges were to be produced before the second electors to be inspected; and so, Mr. President, they are sent to you and you are made the custodian of them; you are to produce them, to count them here in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, and then "immediately," in the language of the Constitution, coinstanti, the House of Representatives proceeds to elect if the electoral colleges have not chosen a candidate when they cast their votes for President. It was my opinion that neither House nor both Houses had the right to reject the vote of a State, (properly entitled to be considered as a State,) reject the vote of a State, (properly entitled to be considered as a State,) and duly authenticated under the act of Congress of 1792. They were to be opened in the presence of these two Houses for their inspection, for their verification of the certificates, those delivered by the messenger, those that came through the mail, all delivered, all subjected to the inspection of the two Houses and the votes declared by the President of the Senate. Why, Mr. President, the governor of my State performs the duty that you perform under the Constitution the same ministerial function, in examining the returns made by the clerks of the courts and he issues a commission to the man having the highest the courts and he issues a commission to the man having the highest number of votes; and if the election is to be contested, if there is a provision of law to contest an election, then you go into the forum provided by the Constitution or by the law to carry out the contest. Only last year in my State the court of appeals by a mandamus com-pelled the governor to issue a commission to the returned attorney-general because there was no power lodged in him by which he could take testimony and inquire into the rightfulness of the election of the take testimony and inquire into the rightfulness of the election of the attorney-general, although the constitution said he should be the judge of the election and qualifications of the attorney-general.

Mr. President, I concur with Chancellor Kent in the opinion expressed by him in the letter which Mr. Washburne read in the other House as emanating from that jurist. That was not, as I have heard some learned gentlemen say in these latter days, the opinion "of the poor old chancellor." No, Mr. President, it was the opinion of the clear-sighted chancellor, whose book to-day is in the hands of students all through this country as a text-book by which they shall learn to understand the Constitution of their country. I agree with him and with Heavy Clay and with Senator Barbour, of Virginia, who in 1821, when the difficulty arose about Missouri, said that there was a casus omissus in the Constitution; and I have always, since I have been a member of the Senate, been ready to vote for a proper amendment to the Constitution to provide for the case of a contested election of President and Vice-President of the United States.

That it was the understanding of those who framed that instru-ment, that there should be no contest, that the President of the Sen-ate was to perform a mere ministerial office, that the whole power was lodged with the States to control the appointment, to control the qualification of electors, I thought was sufficiently indicated in the resolution of the framers of the Constitution and in the proceeding of the first Congress which put the machinery of the Government in mo-tion. The certificate given by the President of the Senate was under tion. The certificate given by the President of the Senate was under the direction of that body; some Senator seemed to think that because the Senate directed him to give the certificate, the Senate had laid violent hands upon the power and, therefore, had from the beginning exerted it. No, Mr. President, that will not do. No Senate ever directed, by an order, the President of the Senate to certify to what was not true. No Senate would have told John Langdon to certify that he had opened and counted the votes if John Langdon had not opened the certificates and counted the votes. No Senate would have dared to tell Thomas Lefferson to give to himself in 1801 a certificate that to tell Thomas Jefferson to give to himself in 1801 a certificate that he, Thomas Jefferson, had opened all the certificates and counted all the votes if Thomas Jefferson had not opened all the certificates and counted all the votes.

No, Mr. President, I do not believe it. I believe that power, such as it is, is merely ministerial, a power which governors all over the country exercise, a power which clerks of courts somewhere exercise, a power which boards of canvassers exercise everywhere. I do not see why such power as that cannot be lodged in the gentleman called to preside over the highest legislative body in our land. Our fathers only meant to make him "a porter opening a bale of goods," suggests some one! Why did they not make the Sergeant-at-Arms; why did they not make the clerk of the court at Washington; why did they not make some other subordinate officer the man to receive the returns?
Why select the highest officer next to the President of the United States to be the custodian of the electoral votes of the States? They meant that you should exercise the purely ministerial power of counting the vote, and left it to the House of Representatives, if you counted falsely and pronounced a man elected who had not a majority of the votes cast, immediately to proceed and exercise their jurisdiction in choosing a President over the man that you had falsely

Am I to be told that when our fathers resorted to every means to prevent Congress electing a President, they did their work so bunglingly as to allow Congress to defeat a President elected by the people? It never was expected by the framers of the Constitution people? It never was expected by the framers of the Constitution that there could be dual State governments within the borders of a State. It never was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution that any man could act in a State as governor while a rival governor claiming to be elected by the people also exercised executive power within the limits of the same State. They never intended to make either or both Houses or the President of the Senate judge of the election of President of the United States. They never dreamed of lodging with either of them any such power. They meant only to give power when the people in the electoral colleges failed to meet the requirements of the Constitution by casting a majority of the electoral votes for some candidate. The whole subject was to be under the control of State Legislatures where provision was to be made to meet all such cases. If the early legislators after this Constitution was put in operation, when they were passing the act of 1792, when they put in operation, when they were passing the act of 1792, when they knew the requirements of the Constitution in regard to the votes to be cast by the electors in the several States, had dreamed of giving power to judge of the election to the President of the Senate or to the House or to the Senate, will any man tell me that they would not have used apt words to express so great and tremendous a power as that Did they leave the House of Representatives, did they leave the Senate to grope amidst parliamentary decisions as to their powers in regard to their own members? No. Each House of Congress, says the Constitution, 'shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members." But giving them their power, what was it worth without legislation. In the absence of laws giving to the Senate and House respectively the direct power of examining witnesses in such cases upon oath, neither body would have such power. The legislation of Congress proves conclusively that it is the universal judgment in this country that no legislative body can, unless there be an express power given to it in the organic law, or by some statutory provision, examine witnesses upon oath.

Such power was, therefore, given to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the chairman of a Committee of the Whole, or of any committee of either House of Congress by the act of Congress of May 3, 1798. A further provision for enforcing the attendance of witnesses and compelling them to answer interrogatories was made by the acts of Congress of January 24, 1857, and of January 24, 1862.

Congress, therefore, understanding in the beginning of our national history that the power given by the Constitution to each House to judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members carried with it no implied power to examine witnesses upon oath in Did they leave the House of Representatives, did they leave the relation to such questions, made, as it ought to have done, express provision by law for taking evidence in cases of contested elections, by an act passed as early as January 23, 1798, and has since made further provision upon the same subject by the acts of February 19, 1851, and January 10, 1873, incorporated in our Revised Statutes.

If power is lodged in Congress to decide disputed elections of President, why has not Congress in the last eighty years passed some law regulating the mode of taking testimony and making such contests? You cannot unseat the humblest member of the Lower House of Congress except upon testimony taken in pursuage of law and re-You cannot unseat the humblest member of the Lower House of Congress except upon testimony taken in pursuance of law, and under notice; and shall it be contended that you can deny the presidential office to a candidate who has been chosen by the people, who comes to you certified from the electoral colleges and authenticated by the executive authority of the State? Can you turn him off and deny him the high office to which he is chosen, upon unsworn petitions and upon testimony of which he had no knowledge when it was taken and no notice to cross-examine the witnesses? No. Mr. President taken and no notice to cross-examine the witnesses? dent, under the rulings of the past, under my understanding of law, under my view of this case, Samuel J. Tilden has one hundred and eighty-five electoral votes properly authenticated for President, and Thomas A. Hendricks the same for Vice-President.

Thomas A. Hendricks the same for Vice-President.

I do not agree with the Senator from Indiana when he tells me that this is a republican surrender. It requires all my patriotism to surrender what I think belongs of right to the democratic party. The bill of 1800, as we have seen from this discussion, greatly similar to this bill, and intended as a permanent measure, met with the most determined opposition of the old republicans of that day "whose lineal descendants we are." It passed the Senate by a vote of 16 to 12. It was supported in that body by nine or ten of those very Federalists who had passed the alien and sedition laws in 1798. I walk with faltering hesitation in such footsteps as those. Langdon, and Pinckney, and Baldwin, who had been brave men, carnest advocates of State rights in the constitutional convention, gave this bill the most severe throttling when it came before the Senate. The debate seems to have been confined almost to them. Quietly, steadily, as I used to see in this body a few years ago when the republican party marched on, the Federalists went on, paying no attention to the minority until they had done their projected work. Mr. Baldwin called the attention of the Senate to the dangers of that bill. He said:

Gentlemen appeared to him, from their observations, to forget that the Constitutions of the second of t

Gentlemen appeared to him, from their observations, to forget that the Constitution in directing electors to be appointed throughout the United States equal to the whole number of the Senators and Representatives in Congress for the express purpose of intrusting this constitutional branch of power to them, had provided for the existence of as respectable a body as Congress, and in whom the Constitution on this business has more confidence than in Congress.

And then, as he concluded his remarks, he said:

And then, as he concluded his remarks, he said:

His own opinion, however, was what he had before stated, that the provisions on this subject were already sufficient; that all the difficult questions which had been suggested were as safely left to the decision of the assemblies of electors as of any body of men that could be devised; and that the members of the Senato and House of Representatives, when met together in one room, should receive the act of the electors as they would the act of any other constitutional branch of the Government, to judge only of its authentication, and then to proceed to count the votes, as directed in the second article of the Constitution.

That refers to the ministerial power of ascertaining whether the person who certifies to a return is the proper certifying authority, but the idea never entered into their brains of what is known as a contested-election case. Mr. Pinckney, whose speech has been read in a great measure, also discussed it very fully and I will only read one or two passages not before referred to:

Knowing that it was the intention of the Constitution to make the President ompletely independent of the Federal Legislature, I well remember—

Stating it, not as we interpret it at this late day, but as an intelligent action, who had part and lot in the formation of this very in-

Knowing that it was the intention of the Constitution to make the President completely independent of the Federal Legislature, I well remember it was the object, as it is at present not only the spirit but the letter of that instrument, to give to Congress no interference in or control over the election of President. It is made their duty to count over the votes in a convention of both Houses, and for the President of the Senate to declare who has the majority of the votes of the electors so transmitted

That is the language used in the resolution of the House of Representatives and the language on the Journal of the House of Representatives of 1789. They had counted the votes as they were declared by the President of the Senate.

Said he again, in another place-

To show the extreme impropriety of adopting this bill, I will, for argument's sake, suppose that there might be some irregularities in the votes of electors, or even in the conduct of the executive of a State on this subject; and ask whether, even under these circumstances, it would not be safer and less injurious to the interest of the people that these few irregular votes, if transmitted and certified by an executive, shall be received and counted, than that a new and unknown power like this should be created, under whose control not a few, but every vote that is given, must be reviewed, and received or rejected, as they decree.

My distinguished friend the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVEN-SON] has read to the Senate a letter from Mr. Madison, the importance and aptness of which justify me in presenting it again:

[To Thomas Jefferson.]

DEAR SIR: Since my last I have been favored with the following inclosures: The bill relating to electors, Ramsey's oration, the report on ways and means, a motion by Brigham, and the resolution for excluding the judges from other offices.

It is not to be denied that the Constitution might have been more properly full in prescribing the election of President and Vice-President; but the remedy is an amendment to the Constitution, and not a legislative interference. It is evident that this interference ought to be, and was meant to be, as little permitted as possible, it being a principle of the Constitution that the two departments should be independent of each other and dependent on their constinents only. Should the spirit of the bill be followed up it is impossible to say how far the choice of the executive may be drawn out of the constitutional hands and subjected to the management of the legislative. The danger is the greater as the Chief Magistrate for the time being may be bribed into the usurpations by so shaping them as to favor his re-election. If this licentiousness in constructive perversions of the Constitution continue to increase we shall soon have to look into our code of laws, and not the charter of the people, for the form as well as the powers of our Government.

Indeed, such an unbridled spirit of construction as has gone forth in sundry instances would bid defiance to any possible parchment securities against usurpation.

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. President, I well remember that I cited to the Senate last spring an umber of opinions of gentlemen high in the councils of the nation in the past, Mr. Toucey, Mr. Collamer, Mr. Stuart, and a number of distinguished Senators, in regard to this very subject, and Mr. Benjamin, who proposed only that a law should be passed instructing the President of the Senate in a certain mode and manner of counting the votes, recognizing the President of the Senate as the officer to do the ministerial counting. the votes, recognizing the President of the Senate as the officer to do the ministerial counting. I remember when the veto message of Andrew Johnson came into this Chamber, a seat in which I was then a humble occupant of. On the 28th of July, 1868, President Johnson returned to the Senate his veto of joint resolution No. 139, "excluding from the electoral college votes of States lately in rebellion, which shall not have been organized," &c., and among his objections was the following: the following:

The mode and manner of receiving and counting the electoral vote for President and Vice-President of the United States are in plain and simple terms prescribed by the Constitution. That instrument imperatively requires that the President of the Senate "shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." Congress has therefore no power under the Constitution to receive the electoral votes or reject them.

The whole power is exhausted when in the presence of the two Houses the votes are counted and the result declared. In this respect the power and duty of the President of the Senate are, under the Constitution, purely ministerial.

That was the opinion of Andrew Johnson, who had made the Constitution his life study and who risked all in doing what he thought the Constitution required him to do.

"Suppose there are two returns?" asked several Senators.

There cannot be two returns authenticated by the governor of a State. Therefore, I say you cannot go behind the certificate of the governor of Oregon. The governor of Oregon had lawful authority to certify the vote, and that governor ought to have as much consideration as the governor of any other State in the Federal Union. You are bound to obey the statutes of the United States as much as its Constitution, and the law was passed by the men who made the Constitution, and you have lived under it since 1792.

What took place then? On the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] the joint resolution was taken up. Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, said that the reasoning of the message was perfectly conclusive. Said he:

I think that the message is one of a great deal of logical power and of truth

I think that the message is one of a great deal of logical power and of truth in its interpretation of the Constitution. I do not doubt the time will come when most of the gentlemen who will vote on the present occasion to overrule the President's veto and to pass this joint resolution against his veto will themselves subscribe to the truth of the message.

The joint resolution was passed, notwithstanding the President's objections, and the democratic Senators present voted to sustain the veto as follows:

NAYS—Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Hendricks, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, Vickers, and Whyte.

Sir, I have lived to see the day when some at least of the gentle-men who voted to pass that bill over the President's veto have subscribed to the doctrine that the President of the Senate shall count the votes. That is not all. I find that the Senator from Indiana made a report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with-made a report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections without objection May 28, 1874. What did he say?

The Constitution provides that the President of the Senate shall be the depositary of the electoral votes of the States, and that he "shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." It has been generally conceded that this means that the two Houses shall be present in their separate characters, and not as a joint convention; that they cannot act and vote as one body; that the two bodies cannot deliberate and act as separate bodies in each other's presence; that they are simply brought together to witness the result of the opening and counting of the vote as reported by the President of the Senate. The fact that tellers have been generally appointed by the two Houses in no wise affects the question, for they are mer facilities to actually count and make record of such votes as the Vice-President hands to them for that purpose.

Then he goes into a statement of what took place in regard to the Wisconsin vote in 1857, too long for me to read, but here is the way in which he concludes:

It seemed to be a necessary conclusion from these d scussions that it was a casus omissus in the Constitution, and the power of the President of the Senate to count the voic resulted exnecessitate rei, from the fallure of the Constitution to give to the two Houses any jurisdiction over it; but they were to be present at the counting as solemn witnesses of its accuracy and result.

I do not care who chooses to take back anything. I am standing upon my record of the past, and I am going to show before I conclude that I lay down upon the altar of my country every constitutional doubt that I may have and submit it to the five judges of the Supreme Court, before whose decision I shall bow with the utmost respect. I do not change with the weathercocks upon the vanes on the public buildings.

Gentlemen of intelligence talk of Mr. Clay's inquiring what are rotes, and they speak of that, as if Mr. Clay meant, for a moment, to inquire as to which set of electors were chosen, when everybody knows that he was talking about the votes of States, what States were entitled to vote. He knew that Congress under another clause of the Constitution had power to admit States into the Union, and Congress had power to determine when States had complied with the laws for their creation, and had clothed themselves in the habiliments of States. Long before the count the inquiry was set in motion, and he warned them not to wait for the count, but to determine in advance States. what States were entitled to votes; and to provide for a contingency which might occur on the count. What did they do? They did what my friend from Vermont did in regard to Georgia. They provided that if it did not change the result you could count it in or count it So much for Missouri.

That report came from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That report came from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I have searched the archives of the Senate to find the minority report "from the lineal descendents of the old republican party." Who objected to it? Who said it was not true? Let us see who were on the committee. I guess there were some very able men at that time on the committee. Mr. MORTON, Mr. Carpenter, Mr. LOGAN, Mr. ALCORN, Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. Sumner, Mr. Hamilton of Maryland, (my predecessor,) and my young friend from Delaware, Mr. SAULS-

Mr. THURMAN. Was it not the former Senator from Delaware, Mr. Saulsbury ?

Mr. WHYTE. If it was not my young friend who is here now, it was his brother, who was an uncommonly able man, and to whom we listened with great pleasure, but certainly I think he went out in

Mr. ALCORN. It was the present Senator from Delaware.
Mr. WHYTE. Yes, the present Senator. The former Mr. Saulsbury went out in 1869 or 1871. I know there was one first-rate "descendant of the old republican party" on that committee at that time. Let us see what he said about it. I refer to my predecessor, Mr. Hamilton. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] proposed an amendment to the bill then under discussion, which I think was the bill reported by the Senator from Indiana, and Mr. Hamilton, of Maryland said:

amendment to the bill then under discussion, which I think was the bill reported by the Senator from Indiana, and Mr. Hamilton, of Maryland, said:

What does the amendment of the Senator from Vermont propose to do? To appoint a joint committee, and they are to inquire into something and then report? What is to be the reach of their power? Are they to inquire simply as to what arises on the face of the certificate only? How far is the inquiry to extend, whether it be made by a joint committee, or by the tellers, or by the two Houses separated? Is it merely and purely to look at the certificates, to see whether they are properly executed and have been duly attested? Is that the limit of the power, I ask, or can other questions, as to the appointment of electors, or in the case of the return of two or more votes of electors to ascertain the rightful set, and then considering this to go back and behind all for that purpose? There is no such authority given. There is nothing provided if there should be a contest as to electors. There is not all usion to a case of the kind. The duty of the President of the Senato and of the two Houses is as simple as words can make it. And can we upon these words ingraft a whole system for contest and ascertainment?

The framers of the Constitution evidently never contemplated any such things as have transpired within the last eight or ten years. They took it for granted that the States would appoint electors, and in whatever manner it suited each State; that they would cast their votes, and that that was the end of their functions and of the action of the State, and that as they were sovereign bodies in this respect they would see to it that this important act should not be left in doubt or in any manner wanting in legal validity, and that, each State see speaking, the only simple electors. The States were given the power to appoint the electors in any way the pleased, and it was supposed that the power would be so exercised and so conclusively exercised that all that in any way cou

But I will not quote passages from other speeches, as it will take up the time of the Senate. I have only been making quotations for the purpose of showing that down to 1873 what was supposed to be the power of the President of the Senate and the two Houses of Congress when present at the counting of the electoral vote. Therefore when I express doubts of the constitutionality of this bill, I may be, as one of the distinguished members of the lower House (outside of the House) said, "in a hopeless minority;" but if I am overcome by the paucity of numbers supporting me, I can at least hide behind the shadow of names as illustrious among men of wisdom and learning as any that now adorn the rolls of any department of the Federal Government.

A few moments more, and I shall cease to weary the patience of the Senate. The Constitution was made for peaceful times and for honest men, for States governed by law and peopled by law-abiding citizens. Its intricate machinery was wisely contrived for smooth and easy working as long as the States remained in the normal condition of but during the throes of the civil war the Constitution was strained to its utmost tension, and we cannot expect that, like an India-rubber strap, it will go back to its original place as soon as the strain is removed from it. After years of peace we find ourselves confronted by new difficulties, the result of extraneous interference in the local governments of some of the restored Southern States. We find there cunningly devised contrivances to nullify and thwart the will there cunningly devised contrivances to nullify and thwart the will of the people; anti-republican combinations to destroy the elective principle in the States an oligarchy of irresponsible men, to perpetuate the power of one political party. Therefore we feel to-day the agonies and struggles which bad men can bring upon our country. In the midst of this peril we turn to the Constitution to find a refuge from disaster; but do we find it there? The discoverers of that saving power in the sacred instrument are as discordant and clamorous for their widely differing theories as were the tongues at Babel. Above the din and the confusion we have presented to us this bill as the less path out of this labyrinth of constitutional conthis bill as the best path out of this labyrinth of constitutional construction. In such a crisis it is the supreme duty of every patriotic citizen who has a voice in the settlement of this momentous subject to subordinate his own views upon doubtful constitutional questions and to unite in the support of the best measure which he can get that will harmonize conflicting opinions; bring peace and quiet to the dis-turbed and distracted interests of our country, and avert, what is turbed and distracted interests of our country, and avert, what is worse than all, the possible chance of turbulence and bloodshed. I come, then, Mr. President, with my constitutional doubts; I come with my views acquired after long years of study of the principles of the party in which, from my earliest years I was reared, and I lay them upon the altar of my country. I vote for the bill in the interest of peace. I find that in its first section it is a vast improvement upon the twenty-second joint rule in requiring the concurring vote of both Houses to reject the vote of a State where there is but one return. I doubt your power, I confess it, to confide to the justices of the Supreme Court the decision of the questions arising on double returns. If you have any power at all over them, it is judicial, and I find no warrant in the Constitution for your judicial power. If it is judicial you have no authority to depute it to another. My lessons of the law, even from that first book, Bacon's Abridgment, have taught me that no person endowed with judicial power can deputize another to exercise it.

But I vote for the bill for another reason. There is no Vice-President occupying that chair; it is occupied, and I am glad that it is occupied, by the Senator from Michigan, whose fairness, whose impartiality, whose strict adherence to duty not a member of the Senate on this side of the Chamber will gainsay. I am glad it is occupied by you, sir, who I know and believe would not walk one inch beyond the you, sir, who I know and believe would not walk one inch beyond the boundary which is set to your authority; but you are only, speaking in parliamentary language, the creation of a majority of this body. You are there to vote or not to vote, bound to vote now, unless you are excused, by the very rule you helped to force upon us in the minority the other day. A Senator from Michigan, we take from you no power that cannot be confided to another in your place. We do not by this bill strip the Vice-President of his power; and I do not think we could take it away from him. You are here participating as a Senator in our deliberations. You will obey, I know, the commands of the majority of the two Houses of Congress and of the President when he puts his executive approval to the bill. That is an agreement with every member of the Senate. The majority holds the power here to make it. It is an agreement with the House if it passes the bill. So that, no matter where the power is lodged, it shall passes the bill. So that, no matter where the power is lodged, it shall be exercised in this form, for this occasion only. Therefore, I shall vote for the bill upon that consideration.

Mr. President, thanking the members of the Senate for their kind Mr. President, thanking the members of the Senate for their kind patience at this, I was going to say, late hour, but early hour of the morning, I assure you that, while I shall vote for the bill with many scruples, it is not because I am not willing to trust to the justices of the Supreme Court the determination of this question. I hope, even as that august tribunal in the early days of the Republic, in Marbury vs. Madison, although they had not the constitutional power to dispose of the case, yet to prevent litigation and to quiet title to office went outside to determine to whom the office rightfully belonged, that these indges will, as the highest indicial officers of our country that these judges will, as the highest indicial officers of our country give us the benefit of their opinion and their judgment upon this contested question. When they do, I shall hail that decision as a heavenly message, giving us peace in the land and quietude, until we shall provide by some constitutional amendment to prevent the recurrence of this unfortunate trouble in regard to our election of President and Vice-President. The Supreme Court has ever been held up to my admiration. I inherited a love, a veneration, a reverence tribunal which my ancestor described as a more than amphietyonic council. I have been ever taught, from my love for the departed Taney, to look with respect upon the decisions of that tribunal and never, never to deride them or to bring public scorn among the people upon them, whether they were favorable to my views of legal questions or unfavorable, but to teach the great body of the people that this was a country of law; that we were bound to abide by the decisions of our high tribunals and bow to them as the supreme majesty that should govern us now and while we last as a Republic.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I have very serious doubts as to whether so much of this bill as provides for a commission harmonizes with the Constitution or its spirit. The bill is the handiwork of a very able committee of this branch of Congress and the other. They very able committee of this branch of Congress and the other. They have devoted a month's anxious labor to it, and they have come to a conclusion upon this provision of the Constitution about which I have some doubt. However, some of the framers of the Constitution, including the late Chief-Justice Marshall, gave the sanction of their names to the principles involved in this bill so far as the commission goes. In view of the existing emergency I feel constrained to yield my doubts in favor of this bill. It may have the effect of preserving the life of the Republic. I trust in God it will. I trust that it will save this country from civil strife, the people of every section from armed conflict. Although I have doubts, I surrender them in favor of peace and a satisfactory settlement of the difficulties involved in the result of the late presidential election. I will not detain the Senate result of the late presidential election. I will not detain the Senate

In the late that to make this word of explanation.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, in the discussion of important questions like this it becomes a Senator young in the service, and particularly one unskilled in law and debate, to listen attentively to the arguments presented by eminent members of the Senate, and then to apply to the arguments and precedents his common sense, patriotism, and sense of justice, with a view of casting a correct vote. In that view, I had not intended to detain the Senate for a moment with any word from me upon the subject until the remarks of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton] the other day with reference to the intimidation or rather fear of the Senators on this side of the House. I will refer more particularly to his remarks. The honorable Senator said:

I do not believe there are half a dozen republicans on this floor who would want this bill if their judgments were to be consulted and if they were not under the influence of apprehension.

The words of my friend from Indiana are of great import and are read with great interest by all political parties in all sections of the country. I will briefly ask the honorable Senator from Indiana to turn to the debate of the Senate last year upon the bill introduced by him for counting the electoral vote, where he will find himself recorded in almost exact variance with the principles which he and nounced yesterday, that under the Constitution the President of the Senate absolutely holds the right to count the electoral votes. I well remember that during that debate I presented an amendment to his bill and accompanied it with some remarks which looked to devolving the duty of counting the electoral vote upon the Supreme Court, as a board of arbitration. This was long ago; we were in the absence of any immediate trouble; but the exact trouble has arisen which I predicted in my remarks. I will detain the Senate but a moment in order to read that amendment and from the remarks which I made upon it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I now offer my amendment. There is a misprint; the amendment is intended to take the place of the second section of the bill, instead of the third, as printed.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment; which is to strike out all of section 2 and

The Chief Clerk read the amendment; which is to surace our and insert in lieu thereof—
"That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Viee-President in such State, he shall immediately make a report thereof to the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, who shall at once cause the said Supreme Court to proceed to examine as to who are the legal electors of said State, and shall have power to send for persons and papers; and the said Chief-Justice shall, on or before the last Tuesday in January next succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, report to the President of the Senate which of the said electors were legally elected; and the returns sent by the electors so designated shall, if in all other respects they are legal, be counted before the two Houses."

On that amendment I made this remark in connection with others:

I am aware that there may be a supposed constitutional objection to this, but I think in an emergency like this, if it is possible for Congress to give the Constitution a liberal construction which will enable us to avoid the discord that may arise from double sets of returns from any single State at the next election, we ought to do it. Take, for instance, the case of Louisiana. If the electoral votes should be so equally divided as to make the return from that State decide the election, it is clear to me, and must be clear to every Senator here, that the two Houses would disagree upon that subject.

I also said on a subsequent occasion:

The more I hear this discussion the more I am convinced that the amendment which I submitted to the committee's bill suggests the proper course to be pursued in order to meet the case in all its points. It is clear to me that Congress has a right to delegate to a court the power to decide as to the electoral returns where there is a dispute in regard to them.

I will further add that it is my belief now that, in the absence of any concurrent action on the part of the two Houses of Congress, the President of the Senate has the right not only to open but to count the votes and it becomes his absolute duty to count the votes, because the Constitution says they shall be counted. If Congress gives him no direction upon that subject at all it becomes his clear and plain duty to open and count the votes in the presence of the two House

Now, Mr. President, I will beg the honorable Senator from Indiana to excuse me from occupying a position on the list of Senators who support this bill under the influence of apprehension. I do not mean by this remark to imply that I believe such a list of Senators exists, nor can I believe that the honorable Senator from Indiana meant to cast that reflection upon any of the Senators on this side of the cast that reflection upon any of the Senators on this side of the Chamber, who have fought under his leadership so many gallant political battles. I do not think he meant that they were influenced by intimidation or by anything but a high sense of duty and patriotism, as men interested in the welfare of their constituents and the good of the whole country. I have faith in the tribunal or commission to be appointed under this bill. I believe it will be actuated by great wisdom and a pure patriotism. I thank the Senate for their attention attention.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (at four o'clock and fifty minutes a.m.) Mr. President, I think I shall finish what I have to say in a few minutes. It is quite obvious that the time has gone by now for debate. If there were time, I should be glad to take up in detail the very strange and anomalous objections that have been made to this bill touching its constitutionality, touching also its justice and fairness. It has been denounced as a sham, a mere trick, when it appeals to the solemn judgment of five Senators and five members of the House of Representatives and five members of the Supreme Court. If that be a sham, then we must suppose that the real truth would be to appeal to the men who denounce it as a sham and that they, and they alone, possess the pure faculties of upright justice. If they do, we had better change it and appeal to them.

possess the pure faculties of upright justice. If they do, we had better change it and appeal to them.

I have just a word to say after the somewhat excited speeches of Senators of my party to them. I have not anything to say to the democrats. I have not before had anything to say either to democrats or to republicans; but now I have something to say to republicans. I beg my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. Sherman,] primus inter pares in this body, if not primus inter illustres, to look at the history of our own attitude, and to tell me some day, if not now, whether stultification and dishonor, in order that we may gain a temperary advantage, is a good thing. I know he will tell me it is not. When the republican party is called upon to stultify its own record and to go back, as the phrase is, upon the mission it has performed in this very respect in every time of question and dispute, and because we can gain the beggarly prize of a temporary victory, to dishonor ourselves, I ask whether the prize is worth the cost. I know my honorable friend will say it is not. Where have we stood? I will not go back over all our history, where in every dispute, as nobody denies, not the President of the Senate, but somebody else, rightfully or wrongfully has always decided, but I will take republican action alone. When in 1865, the first time in the republican career that a question as to what was the constitutional vote of a State arose, a republican majority in both Houses, almost complete in its unanimity, having all the power of the two Houses, declared by a joint rule that no vote from a State, whether it were a single vote or a double vote or a paper purporting to be either, should have any effect upon the election of a President of the Senate, not anybody under law even, but unless both Houses of Congress, in their constitutional character and witha President of the United States unless both Houses of Congress, not the President of the Senate, not anybody under law even, but unless both Houses of Congress, in their constitutional character and without law, should admit it. That was the twenty-second joint rule. Everybody knows it; and yet, by some strange obliquity of vision, our great party leaders, from that great valley of the Mississippi to which the Senator has referred, sound the cry of treachery and treason to party because others are not willing to stultify themselves.

We had three elections under that joint rule, and then at last, when it was apparent to some and believed by many that for the time being the stress of emergencies might change the composition of the lower

it was apparent to some and believed by many that for the time being the stress of emergencies might change the composition of the lower House of Congress, it was thought desirable to abolish the joint rule, to regulate this matter by law. When that law came, after careful and matured deliberation, to be brought forward by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which the honorable Senator from Indiana was the chairman, the facile princeps in all points of constitutional law and consideration, what did they do? They proposed a bill which provided in its first section what is in the bill which your committee has recommended to your consideration. I need not dwell upon it for a moment, for they are identical. It provided in its second section this, and I shall beg leave to read it, although it may take a moment's time:

That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count

"When assembled to count the votes." Mark that. Not when assembled to see you count the votes, but when they are assembled to count the votes themselves—and that return from each State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Where was your constitutional prerogative then, sir? Where was that most august duty pregnant with the fate of the Republic then? On the solemn report of this committee, by the honorable Senator from Indiana himself, to whom we lesser lights looked for counsel and guidance, we were told upon the authoritative and I believe the unanimous report of that committee, that it was competent for Congress to provide that thing, either as reposing a power under the law-making authority of Congress in that body, or as regulating the exercise of it where the Constitution had reposed it. For that bill, only ten months ago, on the 27th of March, 1876, there voted the following Senators:

All republicans save three.

The poor minority of republicans, now supposed to be false then to their party faith, who then did not see their way clear to provide that thing which would effectually have placed the present dispute in the hands of the House of Representatives alone, and destroyed every hope of victory, were only three:

Conkling, Edmunds, and Howe.

Undoubtedly, Mr. President, we may have been wrong; but I cannot help feeling a little chagrin that only after ten months of time we should be again reproached, justly perhaps, I do not say, with a want of party faith, with treachery and dishonor, as the honorable Senator from Indiana put it, because we do not now agree with him in his great and patriotic and constitutional aspirations. To what lights shall we turn if the great luminaries of the heavens darken themselves shall we turn if the great luminaries of the heavens darken themselves in such clouds and go backward against the course of nature?

That was the republican attitude ten months ago; and in that attitude, with a joint rule that had been good enough for us when we had both Houses of Congress, and with a law which it was supposed was good enough for us then, which did not stand upon the prerogative of one man who might, as has been so often stated by the honorable Senator from Indiana himself, be a judge in his own cause; and with the memory before us, so familiar to my honorable friends who have reproached some of us, of that most famous or rather infamous of all indees whose name has come down to us blozoped with disof all judges whose name has come down to us blazoned with dis-honor through twenty centuries, who was the judge in his own cause—I believe it was Appius Claudius; if I am mistaken the hon-orable Senators will correct me—we now are addressed in terms of orable Senators will correct me—we now are addressed in terms of reproach because we do not go backward with them and restore the decemvir to his place; and because we strive by fair and lawful means to withdraw our great cause from the brink of fate, to which the twenty-second joint rule, and the bill of the Senator from Indiana and the vote of the Senator from Ohio had carried it.

Let us look a little further. It is not merely the attitude of events; it is the great reasons that great men give in times when thoughts are calm and passions are still, when neither the selfishness of personal ambition nor the pride or warmth of party feeling shall stir the paright soul but when only reson and law beging its count sway.

sonal amoution nor the pride or warmtn or party feeling shall stir the upright soul, but when only reason and law bearing its equal sway are to have effect that we look for what the Romans called the responsa prudentum. Now, I turn, Mr. President, to read briefly to you but fairly these responsa prudentum. On this same bill the honorable Senator from Indiana, who, I am sorry not now to see in his seat.

Mr. CONKLING. He is sitting right behind you.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O; he said this:

Mr. MORTON. I will ask to have the amendment which I suggested printed also.

His own amendment to this same bill to which I have called at-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The suggested amendment will be read. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"That the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States shall be assembled in the chamber of the Supreme Court at the same time that the two Houses of Congress are counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President; and in case the two Houses shall fail to agree as to which is the true and valid return as provided for in this section, the returns shall be immediately submitted to the said judges, who shall summarily decide which is the true and valid return, which return shall be counted."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Page 569. Where were the constitutional objections then to importing into the decision of such great questions the judgment of these eminent men, not by a new commission as officers, but by the imposition of a new duty for a particular case? If it be lawful in the constitutional sense to remit such a question to nine, will somebody tell me why it is not lawful to remit it to five? Then I turn on. On page 587 the honorable Senator from Indiana said:

The twenty-second joint rule has been abolished. We have no rule. Suppose we fail to pass any law, and when we count the presidential vote less than a year hence there are from the State of Louisiana, if you please, two packages of electoral each purporting to be certified to by a governor of that State and each bearing the fac-simile of the seal of the State, so that you cannot tell by inspection which is the genuine and which is the false. I ask myfriend, if we do not pass this bill and we have no rule, who is to determine the question between those two sets of votes? How is the question to be settled? Are you to cast aside both or are you to count one? And, if you are to count one, who is to select the one to be counted?

Then again, on page 603, in the same debate of March last past, with this very election of which we now speak, and with which we now wish to deal, before us, the Senator from Indiana said:

Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the fact that if this matter is to be left entirely to the President of the Senate, it includes the power to disfranchise a State where there is only one return because of an imperfection in the return? He may say that the return does not show that the electors voted by ballot, and in his judgment that should reject the return from a State; but that return would not be rejected under this bill unless both Houses concurred in saying that it should be rejected; or, where there were two returns, he might decide which was the proper one.

And in the same debate, and in the same March last, on page 613, on an amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. Maxey] to leave this question to the presiding officer in case of dispute and disagreement, Mr. Maxey said:

That umpire is a part of our own body.

Speaking of the President of the Senate.

He is not an outside body, but is a part of Congress.

What next?

Mr. Morrox. That may be true. He is a member of this body, either as Vice-President or as a Senator; but the power conferred upon him is not given by the Constitution; it is a new power which we are conferring upon him. Our right to confer it does not depend upon the fact that he is a member of this body. If we have the power to confer this extraordinary function upon anybody, that power does not depend upon the fact that the person upon whom we confer it belongs to this body. We may confer it as well upon the Supreme Court as upon the President of the Senate.

And again in the same debate and in the same March, page 651, he

The Senator from North Carolina, in his proposed amendment, strikes out that part of the second section which requires the joint action of the two Houses, and the leaves the same question to be decided by his amendment. He requires that return to be counted which "shall be duly authenticated by the State authorities recognized by and in harmony with the United States."

A very sound rule when properly applied, I will submit as I go along, and one in which I believe the honorable Senator from Indiana and myself, perhaps, agree.

ana and myself, perhaps, agree.

There is the question still to be decided which of these two pretended governments is recognized by and which one is in harmony with the United States. There being two returns and two pretended governments, somebody must decide that question. We say the President of the Senate cannot decide it; the House cannot decide it alone; the Senate cannot decide it alone. Therefore that government must be selected by both Houses; and the amendment of the Senator still leaves the main question open to be decided which is the government acting in harmony with the United States; in other words, which is the lawful government of the State. I submit to my friend that that question can only be determined by both Houses, and, where the two Houses disagree about that the question is left open just as it was before.

And again on the next page, and on the same point, he says:

submit that is to be decided by both Houses, and my friend in his amendment strikes out that part which requires the concurrence of both Houses.

Then again in the same debate, on page 667, he says:

It was suggested by the Senator from Delaware a while ago that, in case an officer shall make a wrong decision, the moral reprobation of the world would fall upon him, and he said perhaps physical punishment; that is, he might fall like Casar—

Stabbed in the Senate house by the Senators in the exercise, as I suppose, of their constitutional duty ex necessitate rei, as my honorable friend from New York suggests.

We can understand when such vast consequences are to depend upon the exercise of a power that may be a clear usurpation—

A hard word, Mr. President, "usurpation." It is that word against which the spirit of liberty always and rightly rebels and would be in the opinion of a majority of the people of this country, that that usurpation could not pass with impunity. How, then, can we decide that it shall be done by a joint convention in the passion and excitement of the hour and with such vast consequences depending upon it?

That, Mr. President, is the very question that your committee has produced to the Senate, whether you shall leave this question where my honorable friend from Ohio and my honorable friend from Indiana chose to leave it ten months ago to be decided by the passion and the prejudice of this joint convention or of either branch of it; or whether we shall place it on more secure foundations?

How, then, can we decide that it shall be done by the two Houses, acting separately? It might be understood that, if the two Houses were to act separately, the question might be decided one way; if by a joint convention, another way; and if by the President of the Senate, possibly another way; and the immediate result of the adoption of one or the other of these methods would come in largely to influence the judgment and increase the confusion and the danger of the hour.

Ah, Mr. President, that unhappy word "danger!" "Danger" is a word, I have been recently told, that is thought of only by cowards. Danger! What noble soul should shrink from that? Danger! and when it was ten months off, too!

Therefore-Said he-

Therefore, I exhort Senators to avoid this danger by agreeing upon some method. It is not so important what that method is as that there shall be some plan agreed upon that will avoid these dangers which are right before us.

And again, as the prophet spake to a reluctant people, from day to day, he speaks again; and I certainly shall endeavor to read so much as not to put it out of its connection and place:

So that you can hardly imagine a tribunal that might be created, even if we had the power, where this contingency would not happen; but if the second section of the bill were stricken out altogether the first is of inestimable importance. If there be a contingency in the second section that is not quite provided for, still it does not take away the importance of passing the first section, or the second section either, because that contingency is exceedingly remote. We can understand in view of what took place three years ago last month the necessity of providing some method for counting these votes. We cannot as common lovers of our country and patriots, sworn to stand by this Government, pass over the duty of providing against such dangers as lie right at the door.

And again in the same debate and on the 16th of March, 1876, the honorable Senator from Indiana for his committee and speaking as the Senator in charge of this bill, of which I have read the second section

Then the question comes, which is the more reasonable, which is the better, which is the safer of the two: to adopt that construction which gives this great power to one man, the President of the Senate, who may be counting the votes for himself, as it has turned out six times in our history; or would it be safer to leave it to the determination of the two Houses of Congress, representing the States and the people? If we are open to adopt either one of these constructions, I say the latter is the safer, it is the more reasonable, it is in conformity with the spirit of our Government and of popular institutions. I then adopt the latter construction.

Mr. President, I have not read these extracts to put any Senator in the wrong; but I have read them as those safe lights and beacons that the wise ruler before the tempest comes places on the headlands of his stormy shores. And if, when the clouds darken and the tem-pest seems to threaten, that wise ruler becomes so blind that he cannot pest seems to threaten, that wise ruler becomes so blind that he cannot see his own light, shall we cast the ship of state ashore because he will not be guided by the calm, clear light of the beacon he himself has provided? It appears to me not.

I shall say nothing (because time presses and for another and a better reason) respecting the personal allusions of the honorable Senators who have spoken on this bill. I shall leave them in that best of all custodies, that of the gentlemen who utter them. They belong nowhere else. But as I look at this measure, spanned by the adjustments of previous attempts at legislation by the same eminent gentlemen who now condemn this, I find that in every principle they are on all-fours with it and that the only essential difference in the measures is that the measure of 1876 dismissed republican hopes from the calendar of even possibilities and this measure saves them, if by the calendar of even possibilities and this measure saves them, if by the calendar of even possibilities and this measure saves them, if by a just and upright judgment under the law they are entitled to be saved. Let republicans choose which of these paths they would choose to follow. The way is open to every man and there is no disguising the plainness of those two ways; and we are to decide here and row whether we shall go to sea without a compass and without a rudder, and shall trust to the inexorable Fates for a victory that we believe we ought to attain, or whether we shall resort to the agencies that the Constitution and justice and the previous teachings of those who now revile us have taught us to pursue. I believe—and if I am wrong my learned friends will correct me—that there is an old Roman legend that when the Fates had destroyed Laocoon in the embrace of serpents, because he had tried to save his country that the gods had determined to destroy, Ensas, with the old Anchises and with his household gods, sought a happier home in a western land, where he founded a republic. And if this be the western land where in later days freedom secured by law has found a resting-place from oppress days freedom secured by law has found a resting-place from oppression, is it not fit that we may at some time and in some way, without meeting with large reproach from those who think that we are still to defy the gods, embrace the opportunities to secure the peace and happiness of the people of our fair Republic?

When you look over that long history, spanning a period of more than twenty centuries, of buried hopes in government and find, whether under republics or under kings, that advances in human liberty and human happiness have always been thwarted by just this decisive ordeal of the Chief Magistracy of the government, and when erty and numan nappiness nave always been thwarted by just his decisive ordeal of the Chief Magistracy of the government, and when you look, in our own better days and on this western continent and near to our beneficent Government, and see the sad examples of such disputes in republics around us, is it not wise that we should risk something in order that the great experiment of a Republic of peace and of law among men may not utterly fail? It appears to me, sir, that it is; and I am somewhat disinclined therefore to feel that I am that it is; and I am somewhat disincined therefore to feel that I am greatly a coward or little a republican for seeking these ends and for following the guidance of the principles so recently laid down by my honorable friend from Indiana, as he warned us of the dangers of the times and urged us to find measures of security by law.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am very much surprised at the feeling evinced by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to withdraw my amend-

Mr. MORTON. I desire to offer an amendment.
Mr. SHERMAN. It is not necessary that I should yield for that.
Mr. MORTON. Very well.
Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am surprised very much at the feeling manifested by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] at remarks which he seems to impute to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and myself, as if we had pursued in our opposition to this bill an unkind or ungenerous or unusual course.

bill an unkind or ungenerous or unusual course.

Now, as he has made a joint indictment against my friend from Indiana and myself, I beg leave to ask the common privilege of a defendant of a separate trial. My friend from Indiana is perfectly able to defend his own record, his own speeches, and his own course; and now since the Senator commenced by singling me out, I should like to ask him to specify what I have said in the whole progress of this debate that is unkind to him or any member of the committee, anything but a just and moderate criticism of this measure? Where have I alluded in any word I said to treachery to party? I never thought of charging my friend from Vermont with being treacherous to the republican party. Never; he will not find it in anything I have ever uttered. Where have I uttered terms of reproach? Never in this whole debate. I commenced the speech I made on this bill by what might be called a little overcharged compliment to the committee; but it expressed no more than I feel now, my consciousness that they undertook a great task and that they endeavored to fulfill it with the highest motives for the greatest good of the country. I closed my remarks by regretting that I had occasion to criticise their work for I had the highest respect for their persons, their characters, and their motives. Now why should the Senator show so much feeling when I had dealt with this measure with a degree of kindness that is proper enough but which is not usual with my honorable friend when he assails and arraigns a measure? Indeed I think if you will compare my language in opposing this bill, with the course my friend ordinarily pursues in opposing a bill, the contrast on the score of courtesy will be in my favor. Therefore, I must beg to disclaim having used any terms of repreach or as justly subject to criticism.

It is true that I voted for the joint rule in 1865. I presume I did, for I believe it was passed without a yea or ray vote, reported by Judge Trumbull and as I supposed from the Judiciary Committee.

other committee.

Mr. CONKLING. A special committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was reported and agreed to nem. con. I voted for it; and to that extent I am responsible like every other member of the Senate. When the subject was thoroughly discussed and the for it; and to that extent I am responsible like every other member of the Senate. When the subject was thoroughly discussed and the provisions of that joint rule were brought to my attention, I was the first to move its repeal; and it was on my motion, if I remember aright, that it was abrogated. If in this there was a change of opinion, I am willing to acknowledge it.

Now in regard to the bill introduced by the honorable Senator from Indiana I generally supported that and voted for it because it was the work of a committee of the body carefully considered. Now when I come to study it carefully Learning wantly not the second.

I come to study it carefully I certainly would not vote for the second section of the bill. Perhaps there may be other clauses of the bill that I would not vote for; but with the exception of the second section of the bill there is no such radical objection as I have pointed tion of the bill there is no such radical objection as I have pointed out in regard to the bill before us. In treating that bill and discussing it I may have said some things that are inconsistent with what I said here on the day before yesterday. I have not stopped to inquire how that may be. I very rarely place a Senator in a position where he would feel bound to explain why he happened to have entertained one opinion three or four years ago under different circumstances from what he entertained one applied to the contraction of the cont tertained one opinion three or four years ago under different circumstances from what he entertains now. I do not think this kind of an argument ought to move the Senate very much. If my friend from Vermont should be able to prove that I have been guilty of holding some opinion a few years ago that I do not entertain now, I should not consider myself worthy of the penitentiary for that reason. If I would be, then all the Senators ought to be put on trial, and my honorable friend from Vermont would himself be in that category.

Mr. President, I referred to that clause with regard to the Supreme Court in the bill proposed by the Senator from Indiana. That is infinitely better than the provisions of this bill. If this case now could be transferred to the Supreme Court of the United States in its organized capacity as a court, with all its surroundings as a court.

could be transferred to the Supreme Court of the United States in its organized capacity as a court, with all its surroundings as a court, my great objection to this bill would be removed. The principal objection I made to this bill was that it picked out, singled out, of the Supreme Court five judges and transferred them to a political tribunal to decide a great case. The provisions of the section in the bill of last session I should be very glad indeed to see embodied in this bill; and although it would not meet other constitutional objections, it would go far to induce me to vote for it as I desired to vote for any report made by this committee. It is quite a different thing to transfer a case to the Supreme Court of the United States organized with the nine judges and to pick out for political reasons two republicans and two democrats and then make the fifth depend upon a lot or chance or draw by the four selected associates. That is quite a different tribunal. Therefore the bill proposed by the Senator from Indiana in that respect was far better than this bill.

Now let me briefly and very briefly, for I know it is no time now to discuss matters, state the objections I made to this bill, that remain yet unanswered. If by the use of a single word hastily uttered main yet unanswered. If by the use of a single word hastily uttered by me any Senator feels hurt, let him point it out here now and I will withdraw it. I do not wish to wound the feelings of any gentleman, but I must state in my own way my strong conviction that tleman, but I must state in my own way my strong conviction that this bill ought not to pass.

I objected to this bill that it took judges from the Supreme Court and created for them a new office, and therefore they must be appointed to the new office by the President and confirmed by the Senate. In support of that I cited at least two precedents, one the case of Chief-Justice Jay in 1794 and the other the case of Justice Nelson appointed on the Geneva award commission. I have inquired if there were any exceptions to this rule, and I find one, and that is where the Chief-Justice is by a law ex officio one of the regerts of the Smithsonian Institution. Members of Congress are very often designated by law to be members of boards of trustees of charitable institutions, and in that one case the Chief-Justice is made regent of the Smithsonian Institution. That is not a public agency, but it is practically a private corporation administering a private trust aided somewhat by public appropriations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I suggest to my friend, as it is probably out of his mind at this moment, that by the act of 1823—I think was the date—Congress imposed on the district judge of Florida the duty of settling claims under the Spanish treaty and reporting to the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. SHERMAN I depost think even in that case, if that is a case

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think even in that case, if that is a case where there was no confirmation—

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; the law said the judge should do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Probably there was the exercise of semi-judicial

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Supreme Court said that he did not per-form judicial functions and therefore refused to review his decisions. Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator might be able to point out here and there where a judge was called upon to perform duties outside of the ordinary jurisdiction of the tribunal over which he presided; but in ordinary jurisdiction of the tribunal over which he presided; but in the striking cases that are given the two great cases confirmation was refused. The case of John Jay was a remarkable one in our history. The case of Judge Nelson we all remember. In these cases the names were sent to the Senate and they were confirmed. It will not do to say that, because a man is confirmed as a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, therefore upon the faith of that confirmation he may be charged with all kind and manner of duties. If so, the President might take a judge of the Supreme Court and make him the head of the Department of War, or Secretary of the Treasury, or the like. Because he has been confirmed as a Chief-Justice or associate justice, ergo he can act as Secretary of War or Secretary of the Treasury or the like! That will not do at all. A man who is appointed to a particular office, confirmed for that office, can exercise the duties of that office upon the confirmation; but if he is appointed to another office, to perform a different class of duties, he appointed to another office, to perform a different class of duties, he exercise the duties of that office upon the confirmation; but if he is appointed to another office, to perform a different class of duties, he ought to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. I ventured to make that objection. Now, has it been answered?

Again, I objected that this bill delegates legislative powers. It is clear that it does so. I read the maxim of law that legislative powers cannot be delegated, nor can judicial powers be delegated. Has that been answered? I do not think it has been. I do not think that any of the Senators who have spoken upon it have answered that point. This bill does delegate legislative powers. This bill is based upon the idea that Congress may pass a law to carry into execution a power in the Senate and House only, if at all, by implication from their presence at the counting of the electoral vote. It is not to carry into execution an express power, because there is no express power granted. Not a single Senator, not my colleague, not the honorable Senator from Delaware, not the honorable Senator from New York, has pretended to say that there was any express power given to the Senate and House to do the counting. They are present, and from their presence is implied a power. If we have got that power, either express or implied, it is a power that belongs to the Senate and House, and cannot be delegated by them; nor can it be transferred from the Senate and House to the Supreme Court or any part of it, or to anybody else. That power cannot be delegated; and in my judgment, if this power does exist in the Senate and House, the Senate and House themselves, by their own members or by their own committees, must exercise the power. They cannot call upon other persons and give to those other persons the powers that they possess.

But it has been said in the argument, and by the honorable Senator from New York very strongly, that these judges are but the instruments, the agents, the convenient means by which the Senate and House exercise their power to count. But judges and these members of Congress do not merely exercise this power of inquiry and examining the papers and reading them, but they decide. They decide so that neither House can revoke that decision. The power is transferred to them to decide, and all that the Houses reserve to themselves is the right by a concurring vote to avoid the judgment of the tribunal they have created. I may be all wrong about this; but it seems to me that it is unconstitutional to confer on persons outside of the Senate and House some power which the Senate and House alone can exercise.

Senate and House alone can exercise.

I submit that objection has not been answered. I repeat it now. Again, the powers of Congress are purely legislative. They have no others. Here is section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution defining their powers. My colleague endeavored to evade the force of an argument which I drew from the clause of the Constitution. The previous sections give to each House certain defined powers to make rules and to perform various duties necessary to their legislative powers; and these are all the powers that Congress or either House has. By the sixth section of the same article which I read and which powers; and these are all the powers that Congress or either House has. By the sixth section of the same article which I read, and which my colleague commented upon, every vote, order, or resolution requiring the concurrence of these two Houses, every one which they have the power to pass, except a resolution of adjournment, must be submitted to the President. Did I say that the two Houses in counting the vote must send their resolution up to the President and wait ten days to see whether it would not be vetoed? Not at all; but it was to show that the power implied from the words "and the votes shall then be counted" could not be held to convey the right to take votes and pass resolutions. I used the argument ad absurdum, to show that the power to pass a joint vote, to take up and consider, reject, change, or alter the electoral vote cannot be drawn from this clause of the Constitution, because by the express provisions of the Constitution, by its plain words, every order, vote, or resolution requiring the concurrence of both Houses must be submitted to the President. And as no one could suppose that the powers of the Constitution would require a resolution in regard to counting the vote for President to be submitted to the President himself, who might be a candidate for re-election or the rival of the candidate, such a power could not have been intended to be conferred on the Senate and House; but their presence was simply to witness a ministerial act.

Now I know very well that the Senate and House have in the counts heretofore made exercised some control over the count, especially where the question arose as to whether a vote was by a State entitled to vote. That was the question in 1865. So where the question was whether a State had been admitted into the Union, as in the cases of Missouri and Indiana, it was some question which affected the existence of a State or its right to vote. In such a case the Senate and House by common consent have acted upon the question. I did not in my argument undertake to define a boundary line between the power of the President of the Senate and the power of the Senate and House. I did not go into that argument. It had been discussed much more ably and with far better information than I had by the much more ably and with far better information than I had by the Senator from Indiana and by other Senators. I simply showed that all this implied power, upon which they base the superstructure of this bill, was derived from the simple "presence" of the Senate and House when the count goes on, and is not a power in the Houses to pass concurrent resolutions, reject the votes of electors or States, or make or unmake Presidents. That is purely the business of the States.

These are about the chief points I made. I also endeavored to show that the powers conferred on this commission were undefined. The Constitution has taken great care to define the powers of the differ.

Constitution has taken great care to define the powers of the different departments of the Government; we in passing laws take great care to define the power of an officer charged with the execution of law; for instance, we require certain proof to be made and with great care define the limits of every power of an officer. One objection to this bill was that the powers conferred on this commission were unthis bill was that the powers conferred on this commission were unlimited, and that the commission was left to judge of their powers; they were left to decide how far they should go back of returns and what faith they would give to executive certificates. The law did not seek to define or limit as was usually done in ordinary acts of legislation. I objected to the bill on that account. I thought there ought to be some rule prescribed, as that this commission should not go behind the returns from the legal officers of the State government or the like. I mentioned that as an objection. That has not been answered answered.

But, Mr. President, I now repeat that my chief objection to this bill is that the tribunal was not constituted properly. My friend from Michigan, [Mr. Christiancy,] whom I have learned to respect from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY,] whom I have learned to respect for his legal ability, says that a judge does not act in regard to these matters as a Senator would, or a politician would. He asks me why I object to this tribunal? My friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] who has been a good judge and a good lawyer, says "Why distrust such a tribunal; are they not all good men, supreme judges?" Yes; but the reason why I distrust this tribunal is because it is a packed tribunal selected out—I use the word not in an offensive sense—the judges are pointed out and selected, four of them, and the fifth is left to chance. If the bill had taken the Supreme Court for the tribunal If the bill had taken the Supreme Court for the tribunal to chance. If the bill had taken the Supreme Court for the tribunal I could not have objected to it, and no one could. If they had taken the five first judges in the order of seniority, including the Chief-Justice, it would have been natural; but the very mode and manner in which this tribunal has been selected creates distrust. I confess that when I heard this bill first read by the Clerk (for I was ignorant of its contents, except the vague impressions we had from the news-papers) that was the thing that struck me; there was a tribunal packed to try a case already made up and existing. I did not like it, and I expressed my opinion. The common sense of every Senator present will see that just criticism will be made by the public to the organization of this tribunal, which will greatly affect its usefulness if that bill passe

I have heard some words said about partisans. They say parti-I have heard some words said about partisans. They say partisans denounce this proceeding. I do not know that I am any more partisan than a good many other Senators about me. My friend from Vermont when he got up said he was a partisan. I do not think I am quite so much a partisan as he is; but we are both partisans to some extent, as we are both republicans; and I beg him not to entertain the idea that I said anything at all that would question his sincere and earnest devotion to the republican party. That party has, as I firmly believe, duly and legally elected a President of the United States, and I am both partisan and patriot enough to demand that he States, and I am both partisan and patriot enough to demand that he be inaugurated, that his vote should be counted in the usual way, and that his right to his office should not depend upon the judgment of a that his right to his office should not depend upon the judgment of a packed and unconstitutional tribunal, organized by chance and with unlimited powers. Are we partisans because we do not want the Supreme Court sorted, shuffled, in order to make a tribunal to try a great cause in which every citizen of the United States is interested? Not at all. Indeed, the part of a partisan seems to me the devising of such a tribunal. It is very natural that any man who honestly believes Governor Hayes is elected should look with disfavor upon a proposition that sorts a court to try a cause rather than takes a court now fully organized and which commands the respect of the whole people. people.

They have taken into consideration the political tendencies of the selected judges all the way through; and vet they charge us who deselected judges all the way through; and vet they charge us who demand the whole court with being partisans. They have balanced two judges against two for their known political opinions, affinities, and tendencies, and call us partisans because we object to it; supreme judges may have their political opinions; but, when selected for that reason to try a cause, it is the act of a partisan. When a jury is thus selected it is called packing a jury. When we object to this process we are called partisans. And the contrivance to select the fifth or controlling judge, that his bias or political tendency may not be known or may be uncertain, admits the purpose of this scheme to leave the result of this great election to chance rather than to the legal returns in your custody.

Those are the criticisms I made upon the bill. Now, sir, this bill will pass. The votes of the Senate already indicate that. It is the end of it. I have stated reasons which appeared to me to be clear will pass. The votes of the Senate already indicate that. It is the end of it. I have stated reasons which appeared to me to be clear against it, and the more clear as we have discussed it. Indeed the arguments that we have heard to-night in my judgment are against the bill, but the bill will pass. I never arraign or suspect any man's motives. Republicans will vote for this bill, as earnest and sincere friends of the republican cause as I or the Senator from Indiana or anybody who votes against it. I never have suspected anything else. Differences of opinion will naturally be developed among men, epecially among men engaged in political life as we are all here. The natural tendency of debate always is to create irritation and feeling; but there is no ground for any arraignment of motives. I have made none, though I do not conceal my profound apprehension of the injustice of this bill, its evil effects, and its dangerous exercise of unconstitutional power.

Yet, sir, I can enter upon the future processes of this counting whenever it shall occur, with only the same partisan feeling that anybody else will have; I can attend and witness this count, and do whatever it is necessary for me to do without any more partisan bias than the gentlemen who vote for the bill. I do not consider myself a better gentlemen who vote for the bill. I do not consider myself a better republican for voting against it than those who vote for it. I vote as my convictions lead me, and so far as I know with the general assent of the republicans of Ohio. Although I have not counseled with them, yet, from the information I derive from telegrams, letters, papers, and personal intercourse, I think my course has the general and hearty approval of the great body of the republicans of the State of Ohio. They believe that Governor Hayes is elected and that this bill will deprive him of the plain and simple count of the electoral vote prescribed by the Constitution. My hope is now, though we have struggled over this bill, that from our struggles good may come. I have apprehensions of the result of the passage of this bill. I will have apprehensions of the result of the passage of this bill. I will not even state them, nor did I in my opening remarks; but I have honest, serious apprehensions that what I regard as the verdict of the people in a great popular election will be diverted and thwarted and overthrown, not so much by the desire of this committee as by the unusual and unconstitutional mode by which it proposes to ascertain the result. I fear such will be the end of their work; and in discharging my duty as a Senator from the State of Ohio, I cannot help but express that opinion with all the earnestness of conviction and with the sadness of disappointed hope with which I regarded the appoint-ment of this committee. Senators will bear witness that I have shown perfect respect for my colleague although I differ from him in political opinion. I do not believe he wants to trick any party out of a fair majority if they had it. I have no doubt he has entered into this arrangement not for the purpose of promoting the interests of the democratic party or injuring the rights of the republican party, but because he thinks this work will contribute to the peace and but because he thinks this work will contribute to the peace and honor of our common country, and I believe he will give me credit for the same motive in opposing it. I fear it will not bring about the results that he hopes for. I fear that the working of this cumbersome machinery will create the very friction that is sought to be avoided, and will plant a sense of wrong and injustice. I believe that a count by the President of the Senate in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, in the same way in which the count has been made for years in this country, would be peacefully acquiesced in and would more likely bring peace and quiet to our people than in and would more likely bring peace and quiet to our people than the decision of this grand commission, packed and organized out of incongruous elements, and using unconstitutional powers which may hereafter endanger the right of the States and the people to elect a President without subjecting their returns to the party heats of an

President without subjecting their returns to the party heats of an expiring Congress.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont, with a voice tremulous with emotion, which indeed affected me almost to tears, arraigned me for inconsistency and read certain extracts from speeches which I had made. I can only say that upon this subject within the last three or four years I have spoken often. I brought the subject to the attention of the Senate first, I think, in 1871; afterward in 1872 1874 1875 and 1876. I thought I have recorded. the subject to the attention of the Senate first, I think, in 18/1; afterward in 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876. I thought I saw years ago the necessity for some action upon the subject, and especially to get clear of the twenty-second joint rule. I prepared a speech upon that subject as early as February, 1873, setting forth what I considered the dangers of the rule and its very gross unconstitutionality. Afterward I brought forward a bill which was reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and which has been before the Senate a number of times for consideration. The bill at that time was a speculative bill. There was no case before the country, and I became some tive bill. There was no case before the country, and I became somewhat interested in the passage of the bill, and I spoke of it ardently At that time, if I remember correctly, the Senator from Vermont did not take much interest in this subject. His interest consisted principally I tbink, as the record will show, in the nature of objections to the bill. Of course I have no right to complain of that, but it was a very proper time then to consider such a bill when there was no ease on hand. The subject came to be regarded as a sort of bore, but still on hand. The subject came to be regarded as a sort of bore, but still so impressed was I with the importance of it that I did not give it up. When the question first came here of proposing a tribunal in the case of two returns from a State, various propositions were made. I remember distinctly of saying to the Senate that I doubted the power to go outside for a tribunal, and I saw to-day an extract from the debate in which I uttered that sentiment; but upon one occasion I said that if we did go out I thought the Supreme Court was the best outside tribunal, and I offered such an amendment. I accompanied it with the statement, uttered I think on various occasions, that I doubted or denied the power to go outside and fix a tribunal; but if one was to be adopted I believed that the Supreme Court taken as the Supreme Court was the best one that could be resorted to.

Now, as I remarked this afternoon, there are no popes here, no infallible boutiffs. The committee which reported this bill is not much more intallible than I am. I would not taunt any member of that committee with a change of his opinion. I know very well it is one thing to consider a subject in a general way when there is no case on hand, and it is another thing to consider it under feelings of excitement and when the public is taking a deep interest in it and there is a case on hand. As I had occasion to say two or three days ago, there has been more light thrown on this subject in the last thirty or sixty days than for years previously and many things have been brought to my attention of which I had no knowledge before.

The Senator from Vermont is hardly in a condition to tax me with inconsistency. I have found a passage in a speech of his made a year or two ago which I will read, in which he took stronger ground I think in favor of the President of the Senate counting this vote than I have ever taken. I believe I have insisted on the right of legislation to control it from the first, and also on the condition and with the understanding that in the absence of legislation the President of the Senate must count the vote, and that is what I have said in this debate and that is the vital point now in this controversy. But the Senator from Vermont went a little further than I did, and I want to read what he said. Speaking of the twenty-second joint rule that Senator said:

rule that Senator said:

It is plain enough, I think, that Congress cannot by a law declare that the Vice-President of the United States, or rather the President of the Senate, whoever he may be, should not open and count the returns made from the various States; but the manner of such a count, what should be regarded as in law a vote of a State, the means of ascertaining whether it is the legal vote of the State, it appears to me must be the subject of legislative provision. And so also I think it safe to say—perhaps safer than what I have already said—that Congress may provide by law a tribunal which, in case of a dispute after the function named in the Constitution has exhausted itself of this opening and counting of the votes, shall have the power to decide who is legally elected President of the United States; not to review the action which the Constitution declares the presiding officer of the Senate shall take in the presence of the two Houses, but to ascertain in a method pointed out by law what are the votes that the States have given, and who therefore is the person who has received, in the language of the Constitution, the greatest number of votes

I think this is the strongest recognition of the absolute right of the President of the Senate to count the vote that I know of. In fact so President of the Senate to count the vote that I know of. In fact so strong is the right that he says it cannot be taken away by law. But he says after the function has been exercised by the President of the Senate, after he has opened and has counted the votes, there may be some method provided for trying what votes are legal and what votes are not. It is a distinct and strong recognition that he is the man to open and count the votes; and if that position is entirely consistent with the provisions of this bill, then I am under a mistake. I say this in perfect good nature without any inclination to tears.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly I am glad you have got over your tears. Mr. MORTON. Now, Mr. President, I have no doubt if I took the interest to go through the Senator's speeches, and I ought to do so because they are always very interesting reading, I could find many other things to the same effect. But there are other members of this committee and as I simply desire to show that I am not the only fallible creature in the world, I might refer to what the Senator from New creature in the world, I might refer to what the Senator from New York has said—but I believe I did that to-day—when he pointed out the ground on which he stood.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish the Senator would refer to that. I did not feel at liberty to do it. I wish the Senator would read it.

Mr. MORTON. I think the Senator will remember it.

Mr. CONKLING. I do, and I indorse it now and affirm it now.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator wants me to refer to it again I will do so. I have it right here. The Senator said:

Either House or both Houses may do whatever is committed to it or to them: but Congress cannot delegate to anybody else legislative power or any other power which is reposed in Congress and located there and nowhere else. So we may make a rule wh ch shall commit to the presiding officers of the two Houses the duty of scribes and chirographers, to set down and count up and state these figures; but when you come to the last act, to the act accomplished of making the count, in all senses which the Constitution imports, that is the act of the two Houses. "The vote shall then be counted," the two Houses being there.

It looks to me very strongly against the right to delegate any power as provided for in this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I deny that this bill delegates power.

Mr. MORTON. I do not think the doctrine is stated more strongly than it is stated there. Now I come to another distinguished Senator who is on this committee, and there is some comfort in knowing that he is not entirely infallible. I now read from the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Thurman,] because if the Senator from Ohio is fallible almost anybody else may be expected to be. He said in speaking about this

I know it was suggested, and I think a proposition to that effect was offered at a previous session, that the votes should be counted in case of a disagreement between the two Houses by the Supreme Court. I for one must say that I hardly see how that could be done. The Supreme Court is a part of the judicial system of the United States. It is a dissinct department, clothed with judicial power and no other powers; and I for one am not able to see how Congress can devolve on the Supreme Court any powers that are not judicial. It has certain original jurisdiction conferred upon it by the Constitution.

It will be remembered that the Senator argued to-night with great ability that this power in the two Houses to count the vote was a Judicial power.

It is no part of that original jurisdiction to count the votes for President and Vice-President, or to decide any question relative to the election of President or Vice-President. Then what other jurisdiction has it? All the rest of its jurisdiction is appellate jurisdiction, such appellate jurisdiction as shall be conferred upon it by Congress. And now, what is meant by the appellate jurisdiction of the Sn. preme Court? It is the jurisdiction by appeal from the decisions of inferior courts. It is not meant appeals from the decisions of the executive department; much less is it meant appeals from the decisions of the executive department or from the two Houses of Congress when they are assembled together to count the votes for President and Vice-President. I do not see, therefore, that you can confer this power upon the supreme judges as judges, sitting as a Supreme Court, to decide this question, because it is not a judicial question within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. And to say that you could confer it upon them as nice individuals is to say that you can confer it upon any other nine individuals in the United States.

I might refer to other remarks made by the Senator from Ohio. I

I might refer to other remarks made by the Senator from Ohio. I have seen them. I have here some remarks made by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] another distinguished member of this committee. On the 25th of February, 1875, the Senator from Delaware

And nowhere is power given to either House of Congress to pass upon the election, either the manner or the fact, of electors for President and Vice-President; and if the Congress of the United States, either one or both Houses, shall assume, under the guise or pretext of telling or counting a vote, to decide the fact of the election of electors who are to form the college by whom the President and Vice-President are to be chosen, then they will have taken upon themselves an authority for which I, for one, can find no warrant in this charter of limited powers. This was the belief, and the action of the country has been in accordance with this belief from its foundation until February 6, 1865; and then, for the first time, did the Congress of the United States assume the authority by the vote of either House to put a veto upon the count of a State's vote. That such a rule was without constitutional warrant, I cannot doubt; and I do not think I am going too far when I say that the unconstitutionality of that rule is generally admitted.

Further on he said after quoting the Constitution.

Further on he said, after quoting the Constitution:

Further on he said, after quoting the Constitution:

There is nothing in this language that authorizes either House of Congress or both Houses of Congress to interfere with the decision which has been made by the electors themselves and certified by them and sent to the President of the Senate. There is no pretext that for any cause whatever Congress has any power, or all the other departments of the Government have any power to refuse to receive and count the result of the action of the voters in the States in that election as certified by the electors whom they have chosen. That questions may arise whether that choice was made, that questions may arise whether that election was properly held or whether it was a free and fair election, is undoubtedly true; but there is no machinery provided for contest and no contest seems to have been anticipated on this subject. It is casus omissus, intentionally or otherwise, upon the part of those who framed this Government, and we must take it as it is, and if there be necessity for its amendment, for its supplement, that must be the action of the American people in accordance with the Constitution itself; and I am free to say that some amendment on this subject should he had. But because there is no machinery provided, no tribunal appointed by which this most important issue and contest may be decided as to who was chosen an elector for President and Vice-President in any State, that certainly does not justify Congress in assuming either by direct formal claim of the power in the enactment of a law, or by adopting rules which shall give them such power as will be equivalent to the control of the subject; that is to say, a power of veto, which, under the present twenty-second joint rule, is given to either House, or under the present bill is to be assumed by both Houses acting together. I have been able to find, and I believe there exists, no such power either for one House or for both.

I might refer to other passages even more striking, but I simply House or for both.

I might refer to other passages even more striking, but I simply refer to these to show the attitude of members of the Senate upon this question. And now I desire to say, Mr. President, that in all I have said I have had no other feeling than that of kindness. I have dono full credit to the motives of every Senator with whom I have differed. I have said so and I say so now. I simply claim for myself the same honesty of purpose that I accord to others. I did say that I thought it somewhat strange that now when there was a case on hand that was made up, the doctrine was so strongly pushed that the President of the Senate cannot in the absence of legislation count the vote. I had supposed until very recently that that power would be accorded; that if there was no legislation the President of the Senate must count the vote. That is what I insist upon here and I have thought that this was the time for him to do it; that as the thing had run along so many years without any legislative action, this was not the along so many years without any legislative action, this was not the along so many years without any legislative action, this was not the time to push that action in the face of a case made up.

Last year and the year before when the bill I reported was up the body of the democratic party upon this floor opposed it and made very little attempt to perfect the bill. They were willing that no action should be taken. I could refer here to the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Whyte.] I do not know what he has said to-night; but I do know that he declared in the most resistive terms a very contract that the research the restate. positive terms a year or two ago that the power to count the vote belonged absolutely to the President of the Senate. I suppose that he holds the same opinion still. So of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Stevenson.] I remember that he denied in the strongest terms a year or two ago the power of Congress to make any law on this subject, and that he voted against the bill both times upon the ground that Conthat he voted against the bill both times upon the ground that congress had no power to legislate upon the subject at all. I suppose he has changed his ground; I have no doubt honestly. For one I do not complain of it; but I might go on and enlarge the list and show how many Senators have changed their ground upon this subject. I think I have changed my ground quite as little as any of the rest of them. I do not claim to be infallible, and whenever I am wrong I am always decimate admits it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, in order to extricate my alleged inconsistency from the interlarded remarks of the Senator from Indiand as he went on—it was very proper he should make his comments as he went on; I do not complain of that at all—I wish without a single word of comment to read exactly what I said, and all that I said, and then the intelligent people of this country, if they take any interest in the subject and in Senators, can measure me and weigh me in the balance:

me in the balance:

Mr. Edmund. There is great force in what the Senator from New York has said touching the doubts that may arise respecting the twenty-second joint rule. I think myself that there is constitutional power in the legislative branches of the Government to regulate the exercise of the power conferred in the Constitution respecting the election of President and Vice-President, just as in all other powers granted in the Constitution Congress has always exercised and must always exercise the authority to regulate the methods and manners through which the ends looked to in the Constitution are to be reached. We have always done that as to the courts, in many respects as to elections, and in fact respecting the exercise of almost every one of the powers granted in the Constitution. But whether it is competent for the two Houses, not acting in a legislative capacity, but each acting for itself, to provide a rule by which it is in the power of either House to prevent the counting of every vote that may be returned from a State is open to very grave question indeed.

It is plain enough, I think, that Congress cannot by a law declare that the Vice-for itself, to provide a rule by which it is in the power of either House to prevent the counting of every vote that may be returned from a State is open to very grave question indeed.

It is plain enough, I think, that Congress cannot by a law declare that the Vice-President of the United States, or rather the President of the Senate, whoever be may be, should not open and count the returns made from the various States; but the manner of such a count, what should be regarded as in law a vote of a State, the means of ascertaining whether it is the legal vote of the State, it appears to me must be the subject of legislative provision. And so also I think it safe to say—perhaps safer than what I have already said—that Congress may provide by law a tribunal which, in case of a dispute after the function named in the Constitution has exhausted itself of this opening and counting of the votes, shall have the power to decide who is legally elected President of the United States; not to review the action which the Constitution declares the presiding officer of the Senate shall take in the presence of the two Houses, but to ascertain in a method pointed out by law what are the votes that the States have given, and who the refore is the person who has received, in the language of the Constitution, the greatest number of votes. If I am not mistaken in my recellection, I at one time prepared and presented a bill on that subject, and I have given considerable attention to it, because no man, no matter what party he belongs to, (after the experience we have had, when the candidates of a certain party received a large majority of the votes, of the disorder, the excitement, the difficulties, the disputes that arose in respect of what were called the votes of States, which, if counted or not counted, would produce no difference in the result,) can fall to see that when the counting of the vote of a particular State, or of a paper that is presented as the vote of a particular State, or of a paper that is presented as the vote o

I do not wish to make a word of comment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is withdrawn.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the close of the second section of the bill:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize the said commission to go behind the finding and determination of the canvassing or returning officers of a State, authorized by the laws of the State to find and determine the result of an election for electors.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the possible effect of that amendment, if rejected, as I hope it will be, might be to raise in the mind of some doubtful Senator or judge an implication that by refusing to adopt such an amendment we had intended to confer the power to do what such an amendment we had intended to confer the power to do what is there negated, I move to amend the amendment by striking out after the word "provided" the negative words, so that it will read "provided, that this tribunal shall be authorized to go behind the returns." I shall vote against that amendment to the amendment, as a matter of course, for the object of the committee, I believe successfully and undeniably attained, was to have this great cause tried upon the law as it is now, and not to declare that it should be tried upon some new principle of law, whichever way we might think we would be glad to have a new principle of law. In order, therefore, to guard against the slant which the rejection of this amendment might in some minds produce in respect of the opinions of the passers of this bill, I move to amend the amendment so that it will read conof this bill, I move to amend the amendment so that it will read conferring authority to do the thing that my friend does not wish to have them do and which I do not wish to have them do. I shall vote against my own amendment, and I shall ask everybody else to do it, and then I shall vote against the amendment itself, and that, being rejected, will leave it without any implication.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is moved to strike out of the amendment the words "nothing herein contained shall authorize" and insert after the word "commission" the words "shall have authority;" so as to read:

That the said commission shall have authority to go behind the finding and de-ermination of the canvassing or returning officers, &c.

Mr. THURMAN. Whatever may be my opinion on the subject of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont or the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, I shall vote against them I have a very strong and decided opinion, I may say, that to a both. I have a very strong and decided opinion, I may say, that to a certain extent the decision of a canvassing or returning board may be inquired into, gone behind, in the language here used; but whatever may be my opinion upon those subjects, I shall not vote for either of these propositions, because to attempt to decide either of them is to kill the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Senator from

Mr. CONKLING and Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SARGENT. I think nothing can be more evident than the fact made to appear by the remarks respectively of the Senators from Vermont and Ohio, that if this bill honestly and fairly expressed just what it meant in reference to going behind the action of returning boards, the bill would have no chance. On the one side expressing honestly what it means, the Senator from Vermont would vote against the bill; on the other side, the Senator from Ohio. There can be no higher evidence that this bill is shuffling and evasive, that one side or the other is being cheated upon it, and it confirms my judgment that the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall be obliged to ask the indulgence of the Senate to say a word or two. If this bill were framed upon the principle that the cause that is to be submitted to the commission is to that the cause that is to be stomitted to the commission is to be decided at the same moment that it is submitted, by the very law that submits it, then the Senator would be perfectly correct, and it ought to say either that the vote of Louisiana should be counted or should not be, or that the vote of Oregon should be counted or should not be, and leave nothing for the commission to do except that which in the clerical sense perhaps everybody would admit that you were to do. Now if my honorable friend from California wishes to have the bill submit a dispute in that way, then it would be better to put it right in the bill plainly that they shall not make any inquiry as to Loui-siana, but they shall take the certificate of the governor, and they shall not make any inquiry as to Oregon, but shall take the certificate of the governor. If you put both in we might agree to have it that way. It is very likely our democratic friends on the other side would say yes. That is all I have got to say. All the committee desired to do was not shuffle anything and not to cheat justice out of her fair do was not shall anything and not to cheat justice out of her fair and impartial dues by undertaking by a change in the existing law to decide a dispute beforehand.

Mr. MORTON. This amendment does not say anything about the certificate of the governor; it speaks about the certificate of returning officers of a State created by State laws and authorized by State laws to decide the result of an election. There is in this bill a direction that this commission shall find out who have been duly appointed tion that this commission shall find out who have been duly appointed electors, and for that purpose they are authorized to take into consideration reports, petitions, depositions, and other papers. We know the vital part of this bill is this very question of going behind the returns. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] avows that he believes they can go behind to a certain extent, and he undoubtedly believes that this bill will permit them to go behind. Nay, more, I fear that this bill requires them to go behind. It requires them to find a fact independent of State certification, and that fact is who have been elected as electors. Six months ago perhaps you could hardly have found a lawyer in this whole country who would say that Congress or anybody had a right to go behind the return from a State in a matter of this kind; and now in fact we find a great party that stands upon that doctrine; and here is an equivocating, a shuffling bill, a juggle of words, a tangle of phraseology, under which the democratic party expect to be able to go behind the returns from a State, and they would not vote for this bill unless they expected to be able to do it. As the Senator from California has said, somebody is to be cheated. They do not expect to be cheated. They are not going into this thing with a blindfold on; they understand what they are about; and in taking this bill they expect to be allowed to do just that which is absolutely vital to democratic success, to go behind the returns.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not going to take time in debate; but inasmuch as I have seen, in some decisions of the Supreme Court, references to debates to find out what the law meant, I cannot let what the Senator from Indiana has just said go ex parte as the opinion of the Senate. I wish to say that I disagree with him entirely with respect to the construction he puts on this bill. It does not confer power to go behind or to stay before returns, but it imposes the duty of taking the law as it is and applying it to the question that they are to electors, and for that purpose they are authorized to take into con-of taking the law as it is and applying it to the question that they are to determine; and if one of the questions that somebody is to determine is not what is the electoral vote of the States and who are the electors of the State, then I do not know what is the use (to use an Irish phrase) of having these double returns at all to give us so much trouble. But, as I say, I do not rise to debate at all, but only to remark that I disagree entirely with the construction the Senator from Indiana has put on it. That saves my distance if the debate should ever be referred to as to what this law means.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, this bill gives to this commission Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, this bill gives to this commission the same powers that the Houses of Congress separately or together have, whatever those powers are. If constitutionally they may go behind the decision of a returning board, this commission can go behind it; if constitutionally they cannot go behind that decision, this commission cannot go behind it; and therefore it is a mere license of speech to call this a shuffling bill. You might as well call any bill such as we so often pass authorizing the Court of Claims to decide on a claim against the United States, or authorizing any other court to decide a claim, a shuffling bill, because in the act we pass we do not decide the case itself, but submit it to the indicial determination not decide the case itself, but submit it to the judicial determination

I have as strong convictions on this subject perhaps and as lawyer-like convictions as any other member on this floor. I say to the Sen-ator from Indiana that not sixty days ago, but six centuries ago, it was the law that the acts of everybody who acted without jurisdic-tion were utterly void. I hope that this tribunal that will be estab-lished will decide in the same way and follow the precedents of six centuries; but I do not know, and I will not restrain them by any act

Mr. SARGENT. I certainly do not wish to prolong the session of the Senate. I am myself, as every other Senator is, nearly worn out. I think, however, it is only just that I should make one remark, show-ing the distinction that I think should be drawn by the Senator from Vermont. It certainly is very clearly drawn in my own mind. This debate all through, upon both sides of it, has proceeded upon the assumption that something is necessary in order to determine which is the true return. The picture has been presented of the Senate and House being in the presence of the presiding officer of the Senate, and House being in the presence of the presiding officer of the Senate, and he picking up a return, selecting one out of several that might have reached him, and passing it over to the tellers, suppressing perhaps illegally, as might be contended, other returns, and not submitting them for consideration, or submitting two or more returns to the Senate; and, there being no more power then and there to decide which was the true return, it was held that there must be some tribunal. Do the advocates of this bill say that to decide which is the true re-Do the advocates of this bill say that to decide which is the true return is a function that might well be exercised by some appropriate tribunal, if there is one? When it shall have been decided whether the true return is that sent up by the McEnery electors from Louisiana or that sent up by the Kellogg electors, then I ask if anyone contends that you can go behind that true return in order to search the poll itself and go to its bottom? That is the point on which I wish this bill to speak definitively, and it does not. When the Senator from Vermont says that this power may or may not be conferred, and, if it were conferred, that he might not vote for it, and the Senator and, if it were conferred, that he might not vote for it, and the Senator from Ohio says exactly the reverse of it, and both of them are obscure and doubtful in their declarations whether it is contained obscure and doubtful in their declarations whether it is contained herein or not, then I say I am justified, and there is no license of language in saying that the bill is shuffling. If the bill simply by its terms provides that the true return shall be ascertained, which has been held to be the high necessity in this debate, then why not say that this tribunal shall be confined to determining what is the true return and that it shall respect it then as the act of the State, which the Constitution provides may determine the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not any more time for debate for me, sir; but a word again to guard against the false inference that from such a commentary from a learned lawyer on this bill might be raised by some astute casnist. I wish to say that in my respectful judgment the Senator from California has totally misconceived the plain language of this bill. When these people have found the true return, by constitutional processes, their mission is ended. The question is by what means and upon what evidence and upon what principles of law it is that the true return is to be found.

Mr. SARGENT. The true certificate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Or the true certificate or the true elector. It is all a mere variation of phrase. But, as I say, I do not wish to spend a moment of time except to guard against the danger that sometimes arises from comments.

Mr. THURMAN. I only want to add that I shall vote against both these amendments, because either one of them kills the bill, and that without any reference to their intrinsic merits at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. ator from Indiana.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted-yea 1, nays 61; as follows:

YEA.—Mr. Cooper—1.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Barnum, Bayard, Blaine, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Bruee, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chaffee, Christianey, Clayton, Cockrell, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton. Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston. Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Price, Randolph, Ran-om, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Stevenson, Teller, Thurman, West, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—61.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Ferry, Harvey, Hitchcock, Logan, Norwood, Oglesby, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Wadieigh, and Wallace—12.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. THURMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I have an opinion and a clear opinion about this amendment, if I understand what it means. In the vote I shall give, I do not design to express that opinion or any opinion. I vote against this amendment because I believe that the bill as it stands is not calculated to cheat somebody, but to cheat nobody. I believe that it fairly submits to this tribunal, without any balance cast upon either side, the true question of the Constitution and the laws.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays

47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin. Claytor, Dawes, Dorsey, Hamilton, Hamiln, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Sherman, Teller, and West—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Barnum, Bayard, Blaine, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Chaffee, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill, Price, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sanlsbury, Sharon, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—47.

ABSENT—Messrs. Authony, Ferry, Harvey, Hitchcock, Logan, Norwood, Oglesby, Spencer, and Wadleigh—9.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following amendment: After the word "therein," in line 89, page 6, to insert:

And said commission shall sit with open doors, except when in consultation on questions pending before it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. If you cannot trust to these people, like any other committee or commission, to determine what the fitness of things is about such a matter, you had better not have it.

Mr. SARGENT. I sincerely trust the amendment will be adopted, provided it is intended that the people of the United States shall know what is said before this commission. The Supreme Court of the United States would not think of sitting in secret. No committee of Congres passing upon this matter and hearing the arguments of counsel and suggestions made by those who are sent before it would think of sitting in secret. In order that this commission may have any moral sitting in secret. In order that this commission may have any moral force with the people of the United States at all, that the people of the United States when it shall make its decision shall be assured that everything has been done in perfect good faith, it is necessary that they shall sit with open doors, that suggestions of counsel, that briefs, that arguments shall be made, so that, to the very last word, they can be understood by the reporters of the press who circulate intelligence and by the people themselves day by day as this matter progresses; that they may have this news at their breakfast tables; that they may understand what this commission is doing; that the light of day may be poured upon their impost acts, except in those acts of day may be poured upon their inmost acts, except in those acts, which I reserve, where they retire for consultation; and there, in analogy to the Supreme Court, no one can invade their chamber. I hold that this proceeding should be with the full blaze of noonday upon it. Let the people understand just what is done. If it is to be done It. Let the people understand just what is done. If it is to be done fairly, there can be no objection to its being done as our open sessions are, in the full light of day. There is nothing compromising the opinions of the judges themselves because their consultations are kept in secret; it is only that which others may say before them that we desire may be known; that every suggestion tending to influence their minds made outside of their own body shall be known to the public. Do this, and there is some chance that your tribunal may be respected, that its decision may be acquiesced in by the people of the United States. Refuse this now, and it is because you propose that this may that its decision may be acquiesced in by the people of the United States. Refuse this now, and it is because you propose that this may be, shall be a secret tribunal burying its acts in that obscurity which is the badge of trick and wrong, keeping the United States out of the presence of this tribunal, which is to decide its destiny. I say that is the very touch and test of this whole matter. Let us understand whether it is intended that this shall be a secret star-chamber investigation, or whether the people of the United States shall be invited to look on as they have a right to do where such momentous interests to them are being determined. interests to them are being determined.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am sorry that the fate of the Republic at last depends upon this particular amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. No; not the fate of the Republic, nor does that depend on whether the bill is carried or lost.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps not. Fate is one of those things that depends on nothing; everything depends on fate. Those who believe a bill to be unconstitutional and otherwise improper are not those to whom we look with the greatest confidence for amendments. If I a oil to be inconstitutional and otherwise improper are not those to whom we look with the greatest confidence for amendments. If I were that celebrated Kentuckian, if he is a Kentuckian, who was coming with his hundred thousand men to witness the performance, I should want this amendment adopted, in order that I with my hundred thousand men might have a right by law, at every step of the examination of a witness if under any conceivable circumstances a witness could be examined, at everything except the consultations, to be present and delay by the presence of a great crowd and the noise and confusion, to say nothing worse that takes place in such a case, the operations of these judges. The last section of the bill provides that these fifteen persons may make their own rules and regulations, just as the statutes of the United States authorize the Supreme Court to make its own rules and regulations; just as the two Houses of Congress in respect of their committees as a general rule authorize the same thing for convenience to decide whether a mob shall attend as I have seen in the Judgiary Committee room once though attend as I have seen in the Judiciary Committee room once, though that was a very nice mob of well-dressed ladies once on the subject of the sixteenth amendment, but it interrupted the proceedings to a very considerable degree and delayed them. Now, whether in a particular day or case it is best that you should have what is called open doors by statute or not is a pretty doubtful thing. Why not leave it to this tribunal to determine whether it is convenient to-day to let the hundred thousand citizens who are to attend, or even the five thousand or the five hundred or the fifty that may fill up the room where operations are going on † It is a matter that properly and justly ought to belong to the fifteen commissioners. If you go on the assumption that my honorable friend from California does, that the thing is a shuffling, miserable contrivance, designed, as he said, to cheet someholy. to cheat somebody-

Mr. SARGENT. I did not say that.
Mr. EDMUNDS. I so understood the Senator from California.
Mr. SARGENT. The Senator will excuse me. I have not spoken of motives, only of results. I honor the Senator's motives.
Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, that the nature of the bill is a delusion, which is to mislead somebody.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not believe the Senator himself designs to cheat the republican party.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood my friend—

Mr. SARGENT. But I do believe one party thinks it will cheat the other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think one party thinks it will cheat the other; I think that one party thinks it will beat the other fairly and honestly, for I think so myself; and there are other gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber equally sincere and equally learned, who think that the fair course of law will deliver their wishes in the right way. Very well; that is exactly the reason why we wish to have a fair and square trial about it. Now, I submit to my friend from California whether it is not better, if we have any respect left at all for these fifteen men, to leave them under their own rules and regulations to determine whether to-day or to-morrow or next day they will let to determine whether to-day or to-morrow or next day they will let everybody come in who behaves in an orderly and proper manner. If you get a great crowd of persons on an occasion of this kind you will you get a great crowd of persons on an occasion of this kind you will really stop proceedings; you cannot do anything. Why not leave them under their rules to regulate the number of admissions as they may prescribe, by ticket or in some other way? It is much safer for the orderly administration of justice than it is to command by statute that their doors shall be always open. That is all I have to say. Mr. DAVIS. I believe the Senator from California is chairman of a committee that recently visited Florida and I should like to ask him whether when investigating this subject there he let light in and had the doors open?

Mr. SARGENT. There was nothing depending; we were merely taking evidence, not making a decision there. The minority of the committee was ably and zealously represented in the person of my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. Cooper.] I admit that under the exigencies of the case; I admit that in the community where after it was decided that Drew, the democratic candidate for governor of the State had been elected by I believe an unwarrantable action of the supreme court of that State, white men came to us and said "We no longer dare testify; please excuse us, our lives are in danger," and when colored men were afraid to come forward and we found difficulty in getting witnesses, then in order to carry out the commission. culty in getting witnesses, then in order to carry out the commission confided to us by the Senate, anticipating that result, we sat with closed doors for the mere purpose of taking evidence. We should have been very glad to have welcomed the Senator there or any one who perhaps would not exercise a bull-dozing influence on the witnesses we were trying to get.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to have the yeas and nays

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs, Blaine, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Dorsey, Hamilton, Hamilin Mitchell, Morton, Patterson, Sargent, Sharon, Sherman, and West—13. NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Barnum, Bayard, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chaffee, Christianey, Cockrell, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Howe, Ingalla, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Morrill, Price, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Teller, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—47.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bogy, Bruce, Ferry, Harvey, Hitchcock, Logan, McMillan, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Spencer, and Wadleigh—14.

So the amendment was rejected. Mr. SARGENT. I have here another amendment which I intended Mr. SARGENT. I have here another amendment which I intended to propose, which I thought might improve the bill, but I see there is an imperious necessity in the judgment of the friends of the bill that everything shall be voted down. I shall therefore content myself with calling for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill and recording my vote against it. I regret that it is not to be provided by law that the people of the United States shall have full access to such proceedings of this comprision and a part particle of by law that the people of the United States shall have full access to such proceedings of this commission as do not partake of the nature of judicial deliberation; that the people of the United States cannot understand that everything is conducted fairly and in order; but that there is a dread of 100,000 men, which perhaps somebody has mentioned in jest, invading this Capitol, which so frightens Senators that they do not dare to provide that this commission shall be held openly, with their proceedings in full view.

I regret that, and I regret that an iron rule of necessity requires that everything in the shape of an amendment to the bill shall be voted down, no matter what may be its merit or demerit. As I said, I shall content myself with calling for the yeas and nays on the pas-

Mr. EDMUNDS. The only thing that I dare to do just now is to second the demand for the yeas and nays with all my heart.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill?

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas

47, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Barnum, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Chaffee, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Floride, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill, Price, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Stevenson, Teller, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—47. ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Ferry, Harvey, Hitchcock, Logan, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Spencer, and Wadleigh—10.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe that under the rules it is now in order to move that we adjourn until Friday at twelve o'clock without any to move that we adjourn until Friday at twelve o'clock without any preliminary motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.
Mr. EDMUNDS. I move then, considering that we have been up all night, that the Senate adjourn until Friday at twelve o'clock.
Mr. COOPER. Will the Senator from Vermont permit me to say a word in reply to a statement made by the Senator from California

Mr. SARGENT] in regard to the committee sent to Florida?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. COOPER. I have been told, although I did not notice the remark at the time, that the Senator from California gave as a reason for closing the doors of the committee in the senatorial investigation in Florida that there were witnesses who came to the committee and said that they would be in danger of their lives if they testified openly. I wish to say that no such communication was made to me as one of the members of the committee by anybody.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not say that witnesses came to the committee in that manner and made that statement; but they came to the chairman and made the statement to him, and the chairman of the committee, in conference with his republican associate, determined on account of those facts that the doors should be closed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I renew my motion to adjourn until Friday at

Mr. EDMUNDS. I renew my motion to adjourn until Friday at twelve o'clock

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.
Several SENATORS. O, no.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has priority.
Mr. SHERMAN. I thought we had agreed to adjourn to Friday.
If not, I move that the Senate adjourn until Friday at twelve o'clock.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the motion of the Senator from Vermont. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his motion to adjourn. Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate adjourn until Friday at twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at seven o'clock and ten minutes a.m. Thursday, January 25) the Senate adjourned till Friday, Jan-

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, presented a preamble and resolutions of the Merchants' Exchange of the city of Saint Louis in regard to the bill reported by the joint committee to provide a method for counting the electoral vote; which were read, as follows, and laid on the table:

SAINT LOUIS. MISSOURI. January 22, 1877.

Hon. William H. Stone,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of the Merchants' Exchange held this day the following preamble and resolutions were adopted with but one dissenting vote:

Whereas the Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, an organization for strictly commercial purposes, embracing a membership of nearly two thousand engaged in nearly all the commercial and financial pursuits of this trade center, have viewed with solicitude and alarm the recent political complications of the country and felt their disastrous effects on her commerce and on that of our city;

And whereas we rejoice at the results of the deliberations of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, and believe the plan reported by them to be the best available one for the solution of our presidential complications: Therefore,

Be it resolved. That we approve of the provisions of the bill reported to Congress by said joint committee, and urge upon our Senators and members of the House of Representatives a hearty support of the same.

Resolved. That a copy of this preamble and resolutions be sent to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress by the president and secretary of this exchange.

JOHN A. SCUDDER, President. GEO. H. MORGAN, Secretary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.
The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business coming over from yesterday, being the report of the select committee upon the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. On this question the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McDull] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. If there is not to be a morning hour, I trust there will be no objection to finishing up the Indian appropriation bill before we resume the consideration of the subject on which the gentleman from Iowa proposes to speak. It is very important that the Indian bill should go to the Senate at the earliest possible moment. I hope, therefore, the House will at once go into Committee of the Whole and finish that bill. I do not think it will take more than half an hour.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I shall insist on the morning hour, if the business before the House shall be postponed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from New York as making a motion that the unfinished business be

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The regular order, I believe, is that the unfinished business of yesterday shall be proceeded with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, in consequence of the call for the regular order, is now on the floor to proceed with the unfinished business. The Chair will, however, at the end of the hour recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I do not wish to take the gentleman from Iowa from the floor.

from Iowa from the floor.

Mr. COX. Will there be a morning hour to-day?

The SPEAKER. There will be if the House should determine by a majority vote to postpone the unfinished business until a fixed time; but the gentleman from Iowa cannot be taken off the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. If this debate is entered upon, it is very clear that it will continue through the day.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Not necessarily.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is inevitable.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that he can accomplish his purpose by permitting the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Bright] to make the remarks which they intend to make; then postponing this business until to-morrow in order to have the morning hour, and after that going into Committee of the Whole upon the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the House will agree that after these gentlemen are heard we shall go into Committee of the Whole on the Indian bill,

I have no objection.

I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that it is not competent in the present position of affairs, the gentleman from Iowa having been recognized, to take him off the floor; that, in the opinion of the Chair, is clear. But at the end of his hour it will be competent for the House to vote to postpone the unfinished business until a fixed time. The Chair would recognize the gentleman from New York for that motion, so that the disposition of the House may be determined.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall ask then at the end of an hour that the House or into the Committee of the Whole to dispose of the Indian.

House go into the Committee of the Whole to dispose of the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. At the end of the hour the gentleman will have the right to make that motion.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I hope that will not be done. The members of the committee at least ought to have an opportunity to speak on the pending question.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is what I expected. I supposed that if this debate was entered upon it would go on through the day.

The SPEAKER. That is entirely within the control of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. When the gentleman from Iowa gets through I shall make my motion. The House must see that the Indian appropriation bill ought to be passed to-day.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

The House resumed as the unfinished business the consideration of

The House resumed as the unfinished business the consideration of the report of the select committee upon the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. McDILL. Mr. Speaker, the committee charged with the duty of inquiring into the privileges, powers, and duties of the House in counting the electoral votes have made their report. I regret exceedingly that there is a minority view as well as a majority view with reference to this important question. It certainly would have been a spectacle worthy of admiration in these times if the gentlemen to whom were referred these important questions could have come together as lawyers, agreeing as to what gi'ts were in the hands of the House from the Constitution. But such has not been the case,

The majority have presented resolutions which I, for one, cannot indorse. Some of them I could probably approve; but others seem to me entirely subversive of the true doctrines that are to be found imme entirely subversive of the true doctrines that are to be found imbedded in the Constitution or which are to be derived from its reasonable and fair construction. For this reason, although in four years' service here I believe I have never before asked the indulgence of the House, yet being a member of the committee and being constrained to differ from the majority, I have felt it my duty to ask the House to indulge me in a statement of my reasons for differing from the majority of the committee upon so grave and important a question.

It is not necessary for me to make any remarks with reference to the gravity and importance of the situation. There is not an intelligent man or woman or child in this land who does not understand that we are face to face with grave and threatening facts, and that it is our duty as patriots and statesmen to endeavor to guide the ship

The first and second resolutions of the majority absolutely cut out the President of the Senate from any participation in the count. The third resolution declares that the power of the Senate and House of Representatives is given to them by the Constitution, and taken in connection with the first and second, which say that such power is not conferred upon the President of the Senate, we may fairly infer that according to the doctrines of the majority the power to make the count is exclusively and absolutely in the House and the Senate. The fourth resolution declares that "in the execution of their power in respect to the counting of the electoral votes the House of Representatives is at least equal with the Senate." The fifth resolution, which in my judgment is the most erroneous of all, declares that "in the counting of the electoral votes no vote can be counted against the in my judgment is the most erroneous of all, declares that "in the counting of the electoral votes no vote can be counted against the judgment and determination of the House of Representatives." If that be true, the House of Representatives has a practical veto on every election of the President of the United States by the electors chosen by the people of the States. If that be true, it seems to me that from the formation of the Government down to the present time, in common with our fathers, in common with the framers of the Constitution, in common with jurists and lawyers, we have totally misunderstood the Government under which we have lived and prospered so long.

The minority of the committee objected strenuously, as will be found by examination of their report, to any declaration with reference to the power of the President of the Senate. It seemed to us logical and proper we should not discuss the powers of outside bodies or parties, but that we should confine ourselves to a discussion which should lead us to determine exactly what powers and privileges the House itself possessed.

The SPEAKER. If better order is not preserved in the House the Chair will be compelled to revoke the privilege of the floor granted

Chair will be compelled to revoke the privilege of the floor granted to gentlemen by courtesy.

Mr. McDILL. Mr. Speaker, I was about saying it seemed to the minority of the committee illogical and improper to enter upon a declaration of the powers, duties, and privileges of the House by declaring negatively that some person, or body, or party, or officer not a member of the House and in no way connected with the House, was not entitled to any participation in the count. It did not seem to us that the House of Representatives had instructed us to inquire who were not to participate in the count: but the simple and sole inquire were not to participate in the count; but the simple and sole inquiry was, What are the powers, duties, and privileges of the House in reference to that count? And it would only become proper to determine that question, it seemed to us of the minority of the committee, if in the discussion of our powers, privileges, and duties we should meet the claim and declaration that the sole power vested in the President of the Senate. Now, I think I may say, so far as any report is concerned from the majority or minority, there is no declaration of that of the Senate. Now, I think I may say, so har as any report is concerned from the majority or minority, there is no declaration of that kind before us to-day.

I have observed those gentlemen who take the opposite view of the case, and who support the views of the majority, have been spending most of their time, most of their arguments, and most of their learning in maintaining the proposition that the President of the Senate has not the sole power to participate in the count. That seems to me an imaginary view which is not presented here by these reports, although it may be held by some individuals that the sole power, the exclusive power to participate in and make the count is vested in the President of the Senate. The resolutions of the minority do not bring that question before the House to-day. The resolutions of the minority, which they offer as a substitute for the resolutions of the majority, say first, that it is the power and duty of the House jointly with the Senate to provide by law, or other constitutional method or mode, for fairly and truly ascertaining and properly counting the vote of each State so as to give effect to the choice of each State in the election of President and Vice-President.

I may pause here to say I am glad to know that progress is being made in the direction indicated by this resolution. I am glad to know that a joint committee of distinguished and patriotic men, composed of both parties, have with almost unanimity agreed upon a plan which I hope to see adopted and made the law which shall govern the country in this case.

The other proposition of the minority is that in the absence of leg-the country in this case.

The other proposition of the minority is that in the absence of legislative provision, or in the absence of authoritative direction from the Senate and House of Representatives, the President of the Senate on opening the certificates declares and counts the votes for President and Vice-President. I think that proposition will bear the test of scrutiny. I think it will bear the test of the constructions which were put upon the Constitution by the acts of the framers thereof. Take the duty which is to be performed. What is it it I t seems to me, in order that we should come to a clear understanding of what are our duties and powers and privileges in reference to this matter, we must come to an understanding of the nature of the count to be

And I here make this proposition, which I believe can be maintained—that whoever counts, whether it be the President of the Senate, or whether it be the President of the Senate and the Senate and House of Representatives combined, or whether it be the Senate and House of Representatives combined, or whether it be the Senate and House of Representatives without any participation on the part of the President of the Senate—whoever counts, the duty devolved is purely ministerial. There are no judicial powers to be found in and about or in connection with this count. None can be granted to the Senate and House of Representatives. The Constitution excludes them from exercising judicial power. The Constitution only gives them judicial power in my judgment upon one occasion, and that with reference to the election and qualification of their own members and in ease of the Senate in impresement trials. And then gather. and in case of the Senate in impeachment trials. And then gathering up all the judicial power that is left, it has vested it in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time establish.

We may infer this count which is to be performed is purely ministerial from the word itself. Who ever heard of judicial powers intended or conveyed by the word "count?" Count means to reckon one tended or conveyed by the word "count?" Count means to reckon one by one. It means to number. It has not even as high a significance as the word "canvass," for the word "canvass" means to examine into. This body that counts, or these bodies that count, whoever they may be, are there to count, not to judge. There is an inferior kind of judgment involved in counting votes, and so the person counting or the body counting must have the power to distinguish between a false or feigned and a real vote; and that power is conferred upon canvassing boards generally. Although such a power is conferred upon canvassing and returning boards there is no rule better established than that canvassing boards and returning boards have only ministerial authority. In support of this proposition I shall read from McCrary on Elections, section 81: section 81:

SEC. 81. It is well settled that the duties of canvassing officers are purely ministerial, and extend only to the casting up of the votes and awarding the certificate to the person having the highest number; they have no judicial power. In State rs. Steers, 44 Mo., 223, which was a case in which the canvassing board had undertaken to throw out the returns from one voting-precinct for an alleged informality, the court said: "When a ministerial officer leaves his proper sphere and attempts to exercise judicial functions, he is exceeding the limits of the law, and guilty of usurpation." And again: "To permit a mere ministerial officer arbitrarily to reject returns, at his mere caprice or pleasure, is to infringe or destroy the rights of parties without notice or opportunity to be heard, a thing which the law abhors and prohibits."

In the next section, the eighty-second, the writer goes on to say:

SEC. 82. But of course it does not follow from this doctrine that canvassing and return judges must receive and count whatever purports to be a return, whether it bears upon its face sufficient proof that it is such or not. The true rule is this: They must receive and count the votes as shown by the returns, and they cannot go behind the returns for any purpose; and this necessarily implies that if a paper is presented as a return, and there is a question as to whether it is a return or not, they must decide that question from what appears upon the face of the paper itself.

I refer also to section 84 of the same work, where we find this declaration:

laration:

SEC. 84. The doctrine that canvassing boards and return judges are ministerial officers, possessing no discretionary or judicial power, is settled in nearly or quite all the States: Dishon vs. Smith, 10 Iowa, 212; State vs. Cavers, 22 Iowa, 343; Att'y General vs. Barstow, 4 Wisconsin, 749; People vs. Van Cleve, 1 Michigan, 362; Thompson, circuit iudge, 9 Alabama, 338; Mayo vs. Freeland, 10 Missouri, 293; State vs. Harrison, 38 Missouri, 540; State vs. Rodman, 43 Missouri, 266; State vs. Steers, 44 Missouri, 228-9; Bacon vs. York County, 26 Maine, 491; Taylor vs. Taylor, 10 Minnesota, 107; O'Farrall vs. Colby, 2 Minnesota, 180; Marshall vs. Kerns, 2 Swan, Tennessee, 66.

In Attorney-General vs. Barstow, supra, the supreme court of Wisconsin say that the canvassing officers "are to add up and certify by calculation the number of votes given for any office; they have no discretion to hear and take proof as to frauds, even if morally certain that monstrous frauds have been perpetrated."

Nor is it believed that statutes of the States which confer upon canvassing boards power to refuse the returns—that is, to take proofs and in their discretion to reject such votes as they deem illegal—are unconstitutional.

At the time this book was printed there was such a statute in the State of Texas. There was also such a statute in the State of Alabama. There was such a statute in the State of Louisiana. There was such a statute in the State of Florida. And the House of Reprewas such a statute in the State of Florida. And the House of Representatives, in the Forty-second Congress, passed upon the question, and decided, so far as they could do so, that the action of such a board, in pursuance of the power thus conferred, is prima facie correct and to be allowed to stand until shown by evidence to be illegal and unjust. In that case the House of Representatives had a right to consider the evidence, because the Constitution had given the House of Representatives the power to examine into and determine upon the election and qualification of its own members. But we shall make search in vain in the Constitution for the gift of such a power to the Congress of the United States with regard to this great national count. An examination of the provisions of the Constitution, it seems to me, will exclude from the mind of every candid man any suspicion that any such power was ever granted. As regards the legislative powers of Congress, they are all conferred by express grant. They are enumerated and limited in the Constitution by exact and fitting terms. They cannot be extended beyond the grant. By an amendment to the Constitution it is provided that—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

No doubt then exists where the residuum of power not reserved or granted stays. It stays and rests with the body of the people. Again, it seems as if our fathers were fearful that in later days schools of political constructionists might arise who would attempt to encroach upon the rights of the people, and as if to guard forever against such an encroachment, they embalmed, as it were, in the body of the Constitution a canon of construction which should ever be applied to all doubtful cases, in the words following:

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

No claim in consequence of a right granted shall ever in any way be construed to disparage or to deny the rights retained by the people. Now there is nothing clearer than that the Constitution provides that the mode of appointing electors for President and Vice-President shall be in the manner prescribed by the Legislatures of the several States. This power not only belongs to the people under the general language of the Constitution, but it is expressly reserved in the Constitution itself. Dictation by Congress with reference to such election is usurpation. Dictation by Congress with reference to such election carried to any great extent is revolution. It is an upturning of the institutions of our country. It is a subversion of the Constitution itself. It is forbidden by the written law and forbidden by our rules of construction.

When we pass on to examine the mode of choosing electors we will find that every care was taken to prevent dictation from any source whatever. So careful were the fathers that they segregated and sepwhatever. So careful were the fathers that they segregated and separated the electors, not allowing them to come together in convention, but compelling them to vote on the same day in their own States; requiring them further to vote by ballot; the spirit of this provision of the Constitution being that the result of their votes should be secret. These ballots were to be sealed up and to be sent to the President of the Senate, to be by him carefully kept until a day fixed. Then this custodian, this keeper of the ballots, was to open them all at one time and in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives and then it one they were to be counted. And then by the constitution, by the declaration of the Constitution, not by the declaration of a House of Representatives, nor by the declaration of a Senate, nor by the declaration of a Senate and House of Representatives combined, but by the facts developed, if it should be a fact, the persons having the greatest number of votes shall be President and Vice-President.

It seems to me that a careful study of these facts leads us to this, that the person or persons nominated in the bond to count, no matter who they may be, are nominated to do a purely ministerial duty and who they may be, are nominated to do a purely ministerial duty and to register a decree, the decree of the sovereign and independent people, a decree made up by the people in their own way, carefully guarding themselves from interference by the Congress of the United States. It is a decree that cannot be reversed. There may be questions sometimes whether the decree was made, but that decree when made can never be reversed by Congress, and any attempt to disparage or defeat this right of the people is, in my opinion, unconstitutional and expressly so declared by the Constitution of the United States. It is usurpation. It is an interference with and a pressing down of the right of the people, and, if persisted in and carried out, it is revolution.

This is no new doctrine, no modern doctrine, but it is the doctrine of those who framed the Constitution; of those who participated in framing it. I desire to read from a speech which has several times been quoted in this debate, but which, it seems to me, cannot be too often quoted, not because I subscribe to all the doctrines contained in it, but because it comes from one who had carefully studied the Constitution; from one who had helped to frame it, and because it seems to have been a thoughtful speech, one made after due consideration and deliberation on the questions involved. I read from Charles Pinckney's speech made in 1800:

Charles Pinckney's speech made in 1800:

Knowing that it was the intention of the Constitution to make the President completely independent of the Federal Legislature, I well remember it was the object, as it is at present, not only the spirit but the letter of that instrument, to give to Congress no interference in or control over the election of a President. It is made their duty to count over the votes in a convention of both Houses, and for the President of the Senate to declare who has the majority of the votes of the electors so transmitted; nor could it have been safe in the Constitution to have given to Congress thus assembled in convention the right to object to any vote, or even to question whether they were constitutionally or properly given. This right of determining on the manner in which the electors shall vote, the inquiry into the qualifications, and the guards that are necessary to prevent disqualified or improper men voting and to insure the votes being legally given, rests and is exclusively vested in the State Legislatures. If it is necessary to have guards against improper elections of electors and to institute tribunals to inquire into their qualifications, with the State Legislatures, and with them alone, rests the power to institute them, and they must exercise it. To give to Congress, even when assembled in convention, a right to reject or admit the votes of States, would have been so gross and dangerous an absurdity as the framers of the Constitution never could have been guilty of.

I wish to call special attention to what follows:

How could they expect that in deciding on the election of a President, particularly where such election was strongly contested, party spirit would not prevail and govern every decision? Did they not know how easy it was to raise objections against the votes of particular elections, and that in determining upon these it was more than probable the members would recollect their sides, their favorite candidate, and sometimes their own interests? Or must they not have supposed that in putting the ultimate and final decision of the electors in Congress, who were to decide irrevocably and without appeal, they would render the President their creature and prevent his assuming and exercising that independence in the performance of his duties upon which the safety and honor of the Government must forever rest?

It seems to me that those words and thoughts were almost prophetic. Are we fit custodians of that power? Does party spirit prevail here? In every decision and on all occasions do men recollect their sides? If we can throw out, pass upon the vote of a State and their sides? If we can throw out, pass upon the vote of a State and decide all these questions, who does not know that from this time forth the President of the United States would be our creature, our puppet to do our will, and not an independent executive as it was intended by the Constitution be should be.

Now, at the close of this grand speech a vote was taken on the measure under discussion, and among those voting with Mr. Pinckney, and it would seem to me, from the course of the discussion, co-inciding with him in the main on the question, were Mr. Baldwin, Mr. Langdon, Mr. Livermore, Mr. Marshall, Mr. Mason, and Mr. Nicholas. All these are worthy names, and the best versed in constitutional lore might be proud to be named as the peer of any one of them. Most of us might sit at their feet and learn wisdom for many years

The honorable chairman of the committee in speaking upon this subject the other day, and opening this debate, said there were some things which our fathers had not foreseen. He said our fathers had not foreseen or supposed that there would ever be military interference; that they had not foreseen or supposed that there would ever be many other things often spoken of on the other side of the House. That may be, but our fathers did foresee that Congress would be an unfit custodian of the power to throw out votes of States. did foresee that by our partisan organization, by our habits of voting politically, by our habit of ranging ourselves on sides, that it would be unsafe to trust the power with us. It seems to me then, if I am right from the review I have endeavored to make in a feeble way of what the Constitution teaches, if I am right as to the nature of the count and all could agree with me, there would not be much contest about a participation in that count.

The vexed question now comes, who counts the vote? On this the Constitution is absolutely silent. The majority of the committee assert that the President of the Senate has no part in that count. How they arrive at that conclusion is a mystery, it seems to me, for a logical mind.

Here are three parties named in and about the count, but no declaration made that any one of them shall count. The President of the Senate is named before in connection with the vote. He is named as the custodian of the votes. He is the one who is to produce these sa-cred votes, and who is to open them. And the House and the Senate, by the express terms of the Constitution, are only to be present. Yet the receiver, the keeper, the custodian of the vote, is by this construction of the Constitution excluded from any participation in the count, while those who are to be present only claim the power and all the power of counting.

I understood the argument of the honorable chairman of the committee to be this, that the President of the Senate could not have the power to count the vote unless it was necessarily implied from the express powers granted to him; and that the express powers granted to the President of the Senate were the powers to receive the votes, to keep them, and to open them in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives. That argument may be good for exclud-ing the President of the Senate from the count, but the same line argument would also exclude the Senate and House of Representthe state and House of Representatives. The only things declared with reference to the Senate and House of Representatives, the only express requirement that is made is that they shall be present. It is not necessarily to be implied from their being present that they must count the votes. They may be present without the power to count.

The argument of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Knorr] and the arguments of other gentlemen made on that side of the House seem to me to go too far. The arguments that would exclude the one would also exclude the others. It seems to me to be an honester way of looking at this question to say that the Constitution is silent about who shall count but we are to gather from all the acts performed in who shall count, but we are to gather from all the acts performed in putting the Constitution into operation what was the inference and the meaning of the Constitution as understood by those who framed it. There can be no objection in the mind of any man to that course of construction. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, says that is often the most satisfactory mode of ascertaining the meaning of an instrument. He says:

Contemporaneous construction may consist simply in the understanding with which the people received it at the time, or in the acts done in putting it in operation, and which necessarily assume that it is to be construed in a particular way. In the first case it can have but little force, because the evidence of the public understanding when nothing has been done under the provision in question must always necessarily be vague and indecisive. But when there has been a practical construction which has been acquiesced in for a considerable period, considerations in favor of adhering to this construction sometimes present themselves to the courts with a plausibility and force which it is not easy to resist. Indeed, where a particular construction has been generally accepted as correct, and especially when this has occurred contemporaneously with the adoption of the Constitution, and by those who had opportunity to understand the intention of the instrument, a strong presumption exists that the construction rightly interprets the intention.

Now, with such a rule before us let us see what our fathers did when they were about to put the Constitution into operation. Let us see what our fathers did when they were about to put the Constitution into operation. Let us see what acts of theirs there are to help us in determining this doubtful question as to who shall count these votes.

We find that the framers of the Constitution, after they had completed their labors, passed a resolution which gave the opinion of the convention as to how this Constitution should be set into operation. They gave their opinion as to what the instrument meant which they had just framed. Now let any gentleman take the rule of contemporaneous construction laid down by Judge Cooley and apply it to the consideration of this resolution of the members of the constitutional convention. The resolution I will read:

Resolved. That it is the opinion of this convention that, as soon as the conventions of nine States shall have ratified this Constitution, the United States in Congress assembled should fix a day on which electors should be appointed by the States which shall have ratified the same, and a day on which electors should assemble to vote for the President, and the time and place for commencing proceedings under this Constitution; that after such publication, the electors should assemble and the Senators and Representatives elected; that the electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of the President, and should transmit their votes, certified, signed, sealed, and directed, as the Constitution requires, to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled; that the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned; that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate, for the sole purpose of receiving, opining, and counting the votes for President; and that, after he shall be chosen, the Congress, together with the President, should, without delay, proceed to execute this Constitution.

Now I do not claim, and I do not think it could be justly claimed, that the use of the words "sole purpose" would indicate that it was the understanding of the fathers that the President of the Senate the understanding of the fathers that the President of the Senate alone was to do the counting. But it does indicate that he had some part in it, for he was appointed "for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President." Not that he was to usurp to himself all powers, but he was to participate in the count, he was necessary to the count. If they had understood the Constitution to mean simply that he was to open the certificates and that the House of Representatives and Senate together were to count the votes, then certainly our fathers with their exact use of language would have said "for the sele number of opening the certificates that would have said "for the sole purpose of opening the certificates that the Senate and House of Representatives may count the votes." But there is no such language. The President of the Senate is appointed for the purpose of opening and counting the votes.

It does seem to me that in the very beginning when this instrument was being put into operation there is an intimation that the fathers understood that in some way the President of the Senate was connected with and participated in the count.

The learned and able gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Tucker] yesterday seemed to see the force of this reasoning, and he adopted what I recarried and able gentleman from Virginia Lar. Torked what terday seemed to see the force of this reasoning, and he adopted what I must call an exceedingly ingenious argument to avoid the force of that reasoning. He called attention to the latter part of the resolution, in which it was declared that after the President was chosen tion, in which it was declared that after the President was chosen "the Congress, together with the President, should without delay proceed to execute this Constitution." He claimed that the performance of this act by the constitutional convention, as well as the act of Congress of 1789 in accordance with the opinions therein expressed, are, so to speak, ante-constitutional. The argument seemed to be that we had no living, vital Constitution until this act was performed; that it was the last act of high so to speak of a new potion, and that it it was the last act of birth, so to speak, of a new nation, and that it could not be considered as a construction of the Constitution.

Now, taking even that view of it, and applying the rule of contempo-Now, taking even that view of it, and applying the rule of contemporaneous construction, it was an act done by the framers of the Constitution in and about putting this instrument into operation. It think, however, the gentleman is mistaken in his views that that act was an ante-constitutional act. I think the decisions of the Supreme Court have informed us when the Constitution went into force and operation. It will be remembered that this action by the Federal Congress did not take place until the 6th of April, 1789. Congress attempted to meet on the 4th day of March, 1789, but wanting a quorum, which was a constitutional requirement, and acting under the Constitution they were unable to transact business until the 6th day of April. of April.

I read from Paschal's Annotated Constitution, page 52:

This Constitution went into operation on the first Wednesday, the 4th day of

The authority for that declaration is found in Owings vs. Speed, 5 Wheaton, 420, and in Kent's Commentaries, volume 1, page 219, show ing that the Constitution under the decisions of the courts was in effect and operation at the time of this count.

More than that, we have the action of Congress itself upon this very subject. I read from volume 4 of the Journals of Congress, page 866, by which it appears that on the 13th day of September, 1788, the following resolution was adopted: Resolved. That the first Wednesday in January next be the day for appointing electors in the several States which before the said day shall have ratified the said Constitution; that the first Wednesday in February next be the day for the electors to assemble in their respective States and vote for a President; and that the first Wednesday in March next be the time and the present seat of Congress the place for commencing proceedings under the said Constitution.

So that it seems to me there can be no doubt that the Constitution was put into operation, not on the 6th day of April, but on the first Wednesday in March. That is the decision of the courts; it is the Wednesday in March. That is the decision of the courts; it is the declaration of law-writers; it is the declaration of Congress itself; and it seems strange to me that any one should hold that the choice of electors by the States, their meeting to cast their votes, the solemn assembling to count, and the solemn declaration by which George Washington came to be the first and the unanimously chosen President of the United States were all ante-constitutional and informal. All this to escape the plain principle of contemporaneous construction which is planted firmly upon the idea of the fathers that the President of the Senate had something to do with the count.

I might, if I thought it profitable, detain the House longer in order to show that the construction which was put upon the Constitution by the members of the constitutional convention in the resolution to which I have just referred was followed and adopted and indorsed by both the Senate and House and the President of the Senate.

dorsed by both the Senate and House and the President of the Senate. dorsed by both the Senate and House and the President of the Senate. An examination of the matter will show that the Senate first took action; that it then sent to the House of Representatives a message in which it declared that it had taken action, that it had toosen John Langdon as President of the Senate for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes and that the House should be present at that count. It will also appear that the House resolved that they would attend to do what was set forth in the message of the Senate. It will appear that they united in declaring that the certificate and notification of election should be given by the President of the Senate; and it will appear that from that time until far down in the history of this nation certificates of election were in fact given by the President of nation certificates of election were in fact given by the President of the Senate, which in terms declared that the Vice-President did coun. Not that he counted the votes to the exclusion of the House and the Senate, but that he did count the vote. Far down in our history comes that form of certification.

Now apply the rule laid down by the gentleman from Virginia ves terday, that when there has been for a period of time a particular construction of a constitution or a law, and then the constitution or construction of a constitution or a law, and then the constitution or law is re-adopted, that re-adoption carries with it all the constructions which have been previously put upon the law. By way of illustration, when the laws of England were adopted in this country we adopted with them the constructions which had been put upon them up to the time of their adoption. Taking that rule of construction, it seems to me fixed beyond a doubt that the President of the Senate has power to participate in this count, the twelfth amendment to the Constitution being adopted totidem verbis as to the count, after this construction. And it is a fact which is established by an examination of all the precedents, which is established by the proceedings of every Congress that has participated in a count, that at all times the President of the Senate has been considered a part and parcel of the counting body. Whether or not he has power to vote is not determined by the Constitution, whether or not he acts independently of the Senate and as one of three distinct authorities is certainly not determined and not clear under the Constitution. But that he is there as a part and parcel, a factor in the count, seems to me to be evident.

So that I cannot for a moment give my assent to the propositions of the majority of the committee that the Constitution confers no of the majority of the committee that the Constitution confers no power on the President of the Senate except simply to receive the papers and to open them. That the Constitution does confer upon the Senate and House of Representatives the power to examine and ascertain the votes to be counted as the electoral votes, I would not be inclined to dispute, unless it is meant in this connection to exclude the President of the Senate from a participation in that count.

But it does seem to me that there is danger in the fourth resolution. That resolution, it seems to me, has been very skillfully worded. It declares that "in the execution of their power in respect to the counting of the electoral votes the House of Representatives is at least equal with the Senate." What assumptions of power on the part of the House of Representatives may lie behind those little words "at least!" The views of the minority are expressed when they state that the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in the matter of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-Presimatter of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President are no more and no less than those of the Senate." We are willing to assert absolute equality of power on the part of the House of Representatives. But behind these little words "at least" are lurking, in my judgment, many a heresy, many a danger to the liberties of the people, many a trouble which we may have seen already fore-shadowed; and we find it bursting forth in the next resolution, almost as a legitimate result of that declaration:

Fifth. That in the counting of the electoral votes no vote can be counted against ne judgment and determination of the House of Representatives.

Here we find that terrible power on the part of the House which lurked beneath and concealed itself behind those little words "at least," declaring for the House of Representatives a veto, an absolute veto, upon the votes of electors of States cast.

And there is an ingenious argument in support of this claim to which And there is an ingenious argument in support of this claim to which I desire to call attention, and which I am anxious to notice because it seems to me it is more ingenious than sound. I think the best statement of it I have found is in a little work entitled The Presidential Count, published by Appleton & Co., of New York. It is said to have distinguished authority, but of that I know nothing. The argument there is stated in these words:

The counting of the vote is an affirmative act. It involves the examination of the certificate, the reading of it in the presence and hearing of the two Houses, the entering of the votes upon the list, and the enumeration of the votes in the footing which states the result. All these steps are affirmative acts. In the case where two persons or two bodies are required to concur in the doing of an act and each has discretion to do it or not, if they cannot concur the act cannot be done. It is the familiar case of two judges who do not agree: the result is no judgment can be rendered.

I think no stronger statement of that position can be given than that which I have read. I have quoted it in the exact words of the unknown writer to whom I have referred.

Now there is a degree of plausibility about it as stated, but it is believed to be an unsound and untenable position.

The Constitution says "the votes shall then be counted." This command is imperative. It is the command of the Constitution; higher than all law, higher than all claim, all right in any body. An examination, on the part of those required to count, which develops the spurious character of the votes will alone excuse from the imthe spurious character of the votes will atone excuse from the imperative requirement to count. Suppose this examination leads to the conclusion that the vote is spurious; in other words, though claiming to be a vote, it is not in fact what it purports to be. Now, to reach this judgment in an affirmative act. Then, if they were restant to the power restant in the power restant in the spurious contraction of the power restant in the spurious contraction. ing to be a vote, it is not in fact what it purports to be. Now, to reach this judgment in an affirmative act. Then, if the power rests in the House and Senate to make this judgment, they must concur or there is no judgment. Applying the same argument to the real condition of affairs, remembering the imperative requirement of the Constitution that the votes must be counted; remembering what every man must admit to be true who has studied this subject with any degree of care, namely, that the regular vote has a prima facie standing, then I think it must clearly be admitted that there should be affirmative and concurrent action in order to reject a vote. So be affirmative and concurrent action in order to reject a vote. So that the argument itself is to me strong and convincing of the view that no vote can be rejected except by the concurrent action of the two Houses.

two Houses.

The proposition that the House alone can reject a vote has no sanction, it seems to me, unless it be from the celebrated twenty-second joint rule. I feel I can speak freely of that rule, as I was not a part or parcel of any party that framed it. I may have belonged to the political party which was in power when it was framed, but I am not bound, nor does any gentleman feel bound, to indorse an act if he feels it to be wrong or unconstitutional, even though enacted by members of his political party. Be that as it may, there is something to be said in any event on behalf of those who framed that rule. They were in perilous times. The question was, not whether they could go into the States and count votes and reject polls and precincts and let in parishes or turn out parishes, but the question was what was the true condition of the States which were then in rebellion. Had they such an actual and real relation to the Union that they might actually send up a vote, and while levying arms against the United they such an actual and real relation to the Union that they might actually send up a vote, and while levying arms against the United States compel the Congress of the United States to count their votes by virtue of their relation to the Union? And it was to meet such a case as this that this rule was made. And I admit it worked fearfully; and let me in this connection show how unfit these bodies are to act on such a question by referring to what is now a historical fact. A sovereign State of the Union in 1873 had its vote rejected simply because there was not a seal attached to the certificate; and after it was done, but too late to remedy the mischief, it was discovered by the very body which rejected it that the law of Arkansas did not require a seal. Yet it seems to me those who now seek under that joint-rule or in any other way to claim for any one body of Congress—the Senate or House of Representatives—the right to reject a vote on a simple objection must ever be meeting with such difficulties as this.

But it is claimed the House has the right to count and pass upon

But it is claimed the House has the right to count and pass upon the votes because in a certain contingency the House must choose the President. But that is the last dire resort in the Constitution. Every attempt has been made in the Constitution to keep the House of Representatives from electing a President. Every attempt has been made to give to the people, and the people alone, the right to choose a President; but if they fail—if they fail, being so divided in action that no one has the greatest number of votes, then comes the jurisdiction on the part of the House of Representatives to choose the President of the United States. It is a jurisdictional fact. And the argument, when it is stated plainly, of those who claim on this ground the right of the House to interfere is, because the House in a certain case has jurisdiction to elect a President, it has a power which will bring about the contingency which gives the jurisdiction. To state it in that way, it seems to me, is to show its fallacy; that because it has the power, in a certain unfortunate contingency, to elect, it may be allowed to bring about that unfortunate contingency. Why was it that the Constitution prohibited Senators and Members of Congress from acting as electors? Why is it that only in the last and direst resort the House of Representatives is allowed to choose a President by virtue of its State representation, not by virtue of its popular number? All these things tend to show that it was the intention of the Constitution to keep the House of Representatives free and clear from any dictation or interference with the election.

Now there can be no doubt that it is highly proper that the House and the Senate should be witnesses of the great count. For, perforce, the votes because in a certain contingency the House must choose they must know the result to enable them to perform the resulting duties. But it would have been an unwisdom on the part of our fathers that, for one, I am unwilling to charge them with, to suppose that they had intended in any manner to give to the body which was to have the jurisdiction the right to make the jurisdiction by making the fact. The very idea that it has jurisdiction in one contingency excludes in my mind the idea that it could for a moment interfere to make that fact exist.

Mr. Speaker, in lieu of these resolutions, which seem to me to be so full of error, so full of danger to the people, so full of danger to our institutions, the minority in its first resolution declares that it is our duty to agree upon a mode by which this electoral vote shall be fairly

That it is the power and duty of the House, conjointly with the Senate, to provide by law or other constitutional method a mode for fairly and truly ascertaining and properly counting the electoral vote for each State so as to give effect to the choice of each State in the election of President and Vice-President.

Chancellor Kent said many years ago:

If, however, the tranquillity of this Union is to be disturbed and its liberties endangered by a struggle, it will be upon the subject of choosing for President.

That danger is upon us now. That danger is great. The people are imploring us to provide relief. Business, we are told, is at a standstill in consequence of the uncertainty which surrounds our transactions. Fear is in every heart; care upon every brow. The situation calls for action. An almost unbroken line of precedents calls upon calls for action. An almost unbroken line of precedents calls upon us for action. And as I said in opening, I rejoice to know that an attempt has been made to provide a mode. I hope it is a wise mode. As I now understand it, and if it should not be amended so as to make it objectionable, it shall certainly have my voice and support. For it is but in the line of what is our duty; it is but in the line of what our fathers have proposed; it is but in the line of all precedents; and we can but be doing right if we follow this safe line of precedents. If we fail in this duty, then comes the other or second proposition and conclusion from the Constitution, which is almost in the language of the eminent law-writer, Chancellor Kent. I have seen a statement that that proposition of Chancellor Kent ought not to have much weight because it was merely a hasty statement. I do a statement that that proposition of Chancellor Kent ought not to have much weight because it was merely a hasty statement. I do not know by what right men pass back the dial of time from twenty to forty years and say Chancellor Kent did not deliberate before he made this statement. I remember reading in the debates which resulted from the condition of affairs with regard to the Wisconsin electoral vote in 1857 the statement of a gentleman from Virginia, who declared he had a letter from a gentleman in New York who had frequently conversed with Chancellor Kent on this very question, and that his mind dwelt freely and fully and often on what he believed to be the great danger of the Constitution.

If we shall bring ourselves safely past this danger, if we shall adopt a mode which shall give us a fair and free count, which shall ascertain the votes of the States, then we will have added a crowning glory to our institutions; we will have fitly and properly begun the new century of our national life; we will have told the world, we will have told all who shall read in future times of what was done in this good wear that there is a viriality in free institutions which constantly good year, that there is a vitality in free institutions which constantly asserts itself and which constantly adds new life. But if we shall not do our duty, if we shall sit idly by, does it not seem that the imperative requirements of the Constitution must be carried out by the only remaining party named in reference to the count? He must count those votes. Does any one suppose that, if the Senate and House of Representatives should become so lost to a sense of duty as to refuse to be present at the count, they could hinder an election of the President by the people. Take that extreme case which I admit can never happen.

Suppose the Senate and House should refuse to go near the place of count; the day comes; the custodian has the votes. He is required to open them in the presence of the House and Senate, but they refuse to come. Will any man tell me that our great nation shall go to ruin; that we shall have an interregnum with no President; that the voice of the people shall be stifled and silenced because the House of Representatives and the Senate have not done their duty? I think not. I hope every member will see that the propositions contained in the minority report and the resolutions offered by them are safe, just, and proper resolutions.

Mr. BRIGHT obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] asked to be recognized to inquire whether the unfinished business can be resumed.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. After the conclusion of the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Bright,] it is my intention to make a motion to postpone the further consideration of this subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am very desirous, as I have already intimated, that the House should complete the consideration in Committee of the Whele on the state of the Union of the Indian empropriation bill. that the House should complete the consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union of the Indian appropriation bill. As the gentleman from New York desires to postpone the morning hour until the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee is completed, I ask that by unanimous consent it shall be ordered now that, after the hour to which the gentleman from Tennessee is entitled and the morning hour, the House will go into Committee of the Whole to consider the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be bound to recognize the gentleman from Indiana to make that motion, because the rule reads that he can make the motion at any time.

Mr. HOLMAN. But, if by unanimous consent that can be agreed upon now, it would save any trouble.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I give notice that I shall oppose any such motion until we have had a morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana does not seek to interfers with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana does not seek to interfere with the morning hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no interference with the morning hour in my proposition. I propose that the gentleman from Tennessee shall speak; that then we shall have a morning hour and then go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. When that time arrives the House will determine what business it will take up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.
Mr. HOLMAN. Then I give notice that I shall ask the floor as soon

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I give notice that I shall ask the floor as soon as the gentleman from Tennessee is through.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Ihope the gentleman will allow equal debate to each side and that he will not call the morning hour until the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] who has the floor, shall have been heard.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Two hours a day on this question are quite enough.

Mr. LAWRENCE. All the members of the committee should have an opportunity of being heard.

The SPEAKER. The committee have not been neglected in any particular; they have had entire control of the matter up to this time. Mr. BRIGHT. I speak in place of one of the members of the com-

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized and will proceed

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, much has been written, much has been spoken on the subject of our recent presidential election. It is agreed on all hands that it is almost impossible to exaggerate the importance of the question. The eyes of the nation are concentrated upon Congress with the intensity of a burning focus. Our action here upon this important question will be monumental for either good or evil. I approach the discussion of this question with that degree of modesty which I hope is becoming in every representative who sees the magnitude of the question. I propose to argue, not to declaim; to reason, not to rant.

The question involves the rights and jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States, the rights of the State governments, and the rights and duties of the people. My first proposition will be, Mr. Speaker, that the Constitution of the United States has not remitted Speaker, that the Constitution of the United States has not remitted this question to the State governments for final arbitrament. We say so because the election of President of the United States is a question in which all the States are interested. We say so because the Constitution of the United States has prescribed the qualifications of the President; because the Constitution of the United States has prescribed the qualifications of the voters; because the Constitution of the United States has prescribed the qualifications of the electors; because the Constitution of the United States has prescribed the time when they shall vote; because the Constitution of the United States has prescribed the manner in which the electors college shall vote. has prescribed the manner in which the electoral college shall vote; because the Constitution of the United States has prescribed the manner of authentication of the action of the electoral college; because ner of authentication of the action of the electoral college; because the Constitution of the United States has prescribed the depository of that electoral vote; because the Constitution of the United States requires that it shall be opened and that the votes shall be counted before the Senate as an organized body and before the House as an organized body; because the Constitution of the United States prescribes that in the event of a non-election then the House of Representatives shall resolve itself into an electoral college and proceed to the election of a President, and that the Senate shall resolve itself into an electoral college for the purpose of electing a Vice-President.

With all these ample powers lodged in the Constitution of the United States we maintain that they have not committed judgment to the State governments to determine all these vast questions which now rest upon the mind of the nation.

In addition to these powers which are here enumerated in the Constitution which require no argument to illustrate, because we have no need of following precedents as long as we have the Constitution before us, any more than the traveler follows the stars after the sun has risen above the horizon, so in the first place we have the Constitution with all these grants of powers, coupled with the grants of duty imposed upon somebody, not upon State governments. This borrows force from the construction which may be placed on these grants of powers in the Constitution of the United States. If it is not set of order I have leave to call the attention of the borrows force from the constitution of the United States. out of order, I beg leave to call the attention of this honorable body to the opinion of Chief-Justice Marshall in explanation of the powers granted by the Constitution of the United States. In the case of Cohens rs. The Bank of Virginia, 6 Wheaton, page 414:

A constitution is framed for ages to come, and is designed to approach immortality as near as mortality can approach it. Its course cannot always be tranquil. It is exposed to storms and tempests, and its framers must be unwise statesmen indeed if they have not provided it, as far as its nature will permit, with the means of self-preservation from the perils it is sure to encounter.

If it be not out of order to refer to the opinion of the present Supreme Court, I beg the indulgence of the House to a further construcion of the powers of the Constitution, to be found in 12 Wallace, Knox vs. Lee, page 533:

The same may be asserted also of all the non-enumerated powers included in the authority expressly given "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the specified powers vested in Congress, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." It is impossible to know what these non-enumerated powers are, and what are their nature and extent, without considering the purposes they were intended to subserve. These purposes, it must be noted, reached beyond the mere execution of all powers definitely intrusted to Congress and mentioned in detail. They embrace the execution of all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof. It certainly was intended to confer upon the Government the power of self-preservation.

In the same case the court further say:

And here it is to be observed it is not indispensable to the existence of any power claimed for the Federal Government that it can be specified in the words of the Constitution or clearly and directly traceable to some one of the specified powers. Its existence may be deduced fairly from more than one of the substantive powers expressly defined or from them all combined. It is allowable to group together any number of them and infer from them all that the power claimed has been conferenced.

Now, from the powers actually granted, from the rule of construction which has been laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States by Chief-Justice Marshall, the highest judicial mind that the country ever produced, also by the present judiciary, I maintain that there is ample power in the Constitution of the United States for the solution of this vexed question. If the power is not directly delegated, then, as laid down in 12 Wheaton, the power may be inferred from all the powers granted by the Constitution. If we were pushed to an extremity in regard to the construction of the powers of Congress, we would resort to the precedents which have been set by our fathers, some of whom were actors contemporaneous with the adoption of the Constitution of the United States.

some of whom were actors contemporaneous with the adoption of the Constitution of the United States.

We have had twenty-two presidential elections; and the powers of Congress over those elections, I mean of the two organized bodies, have been recognized legislatively in regard to everyone of them from the beginning to the ending. It is unnecessary for us to stop and repeat the precedents which have been established in relation to this matter. I state, furthermore, that the substance of those precedents was embodied in the twenty-second joint rule which was adopted by both Hauses which has been recognized and sangtioned by both poliboth Houses, which has been recognized and sanctioned by both political parties. Here is the rule, (twenty-second joint rule, February 6, 1865, second clause:)

If, upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers, any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the presiding officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and said question shall be submitted to that body for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit said question to the House of Representatives for its decision. And no question shall be decided affirmatively, and no vote objected to shall be counted, except by the concurrent votes of the two Houses; which being obtained, the two Houses shall immediately re-assemble, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted; and upon any such question there shall be no debate in either House.

If this be so, if we have a Constitution which has received the legislative sanction, the sanction of the two political parties, and the submission of the people to the construction of its powers, then he must have a hard current to stem who attempts to oppose the force of the Constitution, the force of the law, and the torrents of the precedents which have been set. I think that it shuts the door of controversy upon this subject.

Then we approach our second proposition: we state that this authority has not been delegated or conceded or reserved to the States. What is the authority reserved to the States? "The States shall appoint electors in such manner as shall be prescribed by the Legislatures thereof." Appoint them; how? Appoint them precisely under the limitations which have been imposed by the Constitution of the United States, and not otherwise. The States have voluntarily taken upon themselves these obligations; the States have also submitted to these limitations upon their powers.

How shall these obligations be answered? I answer, in obedience to the obligations of the Constitution of the United States. These to the obligations of the Constitution of the United States. These obligations I have already enumerated, and it is unnecessary to repeat them. The States have no right to appoint illegal voters, nor to authorize legal voters to vote for ineligible persons. The principle of the Constitution would exclude the illegal voter as well as exclude an ineligible person from the Presidency. There is a constitutional vinculum between the humblest voter and the highest officer. There is really no necessity for any conflict between the State and Federal Governments. They are purely co-operative and auxilliary, one to support the other and both aiming at the grand object of perpetuating the American Republic. Both State and Federal Governments rise up out of the will of the people.

If I am correct in these principles which I have laid down—and I do not believe that they can be denied or gainsaid—then I maintain that no returning board can oust Congress of its jurisdiction. It can as easily overturn the Constitution of the United States, as it can pluck the everlasting hills from their roots. And just here is the pluck the everlasting hills from their roots. And just here is the heart of the question; all besides is mere machinery, which is intended to put into operation the principles and the rights for which we have been contending.

We take our stand upon the election in Louisiana. I invite those gentlemen upon the other side who may differ with me—I throw the gauntlet boldly down and dare the man to take it up. I maintain that your returning board is not final, that it cannot be final, that there is no power known to the laws of the land that can make it final. Why do I say so? We are met by gentlemen who march out in the panoply of the décisions of the supreme court of Louisiana, who tell us that we are to receive this construction of their statutes from their own judicial decisions. I deny the proposition that the supreme court of Louisiana has ever decided this question of the finality of the action of the returning board. The supreme court of Louisiana has never had the question before it to decide; that is, the finality of the re-turning board in its action upon the return of votes for presidential

That court, however, has decided sundry cases involving the right to local offices between the citizens of that State.

The leading cases are Collin vs. Knoblock, 25 An. La. R., 263, being a contest for the office of parish judge; Bonner vs. Lynch, 267, same report, being a contest for district judge, Justice Wyley dissenting: by far the ablest opinion and most in harmony with the settled train of decisions; Kemp vs. Ellis, 253, same report, being a contest for district index. district judge.

The Supreme Court held that the jurisdiction to decide even a State election upon its merits must be conferred by statute; and, such jurisdiction not having been conferred, the courts did not have the right

If it be not out of order, Mr. Speaker, I propose simply to read a paragraph from the leading decision of Louisiana. I ask the attention of the House, (Bonner vs. Lynch, 25 An. R. 268:)

But it has been said the returns are only prima facie proof of the results of the election. This is true. The question, however, as to the election of officers is a political question; and courts of justice have jurisdiction over them only so far as the political department may have authorized them to exercise jurisdiction. If there were no statute authorizing the trial of contested-election cases before the courts they would be without authority to do so.—13 An. R., 90.

No statute conferring upon the courts the power to try cases of contested elections or title to office authorizes them to revise the action of the returning board. If we were to assume that prerogative, we should have to go still further, and revise the returns of the supervisors of elections, examine the right of voters to vote, and, in short, the courts would become in regard to such cases mere offices for counting, compiling, and reporting election returns. The Legislature has seen proper to lodge the power to decide who has or has not been elected in the returning board. It might have conferred that power upon the courts, but it did not. Whether the law be good or bad it is our duty to obey its provisions, and not to legislate.

So then Mr. Speaker I maintain that the supreme court of Loui-

So then, Mr. Speaker, I maintain that the supreme court of Louisiana has not decided this question. I maintain that the statutes of Louisiana did not confer upon it the authority to decide it. Then, if that be so, the supreme court is stripped of the authority, and the foundation of the whole argument on the other side is taken away. If that be so, Mr. Speaker, let us advance a step further in themater. I maintain that the Legislature of Louisiana never conferred upon the returning board the power of final judgment, because they say here in the statute, act of 1872, section 2, that it shall be only prima facie evidence before the courts, and that the power conferred by the real intendment and meaning of it was to settle the controversy between citizens of its own State, and not to decide the quesversy between citizens of its own State, and not to decide the question of the presidential election.

So all the decisions have run. I further maintain that under the constitution of Louisiana the Legislature cannot confer upon that returning board the judicial powers claimed for the board, simply because the constitution which I have before me has vested all the judicial powers of that State in the supreme judiciary, in the district courts, in the parish courts, in the justices of the peace; and that is the end of it; and as a matter of course it is excluded from the omipotent powers which are claimed for it upon the other side. The constitution says title 4 article 73: constitution says, title 4, article 73:

The judicial power shall be vested in a supreme court, in district courts, in parish ourts, and in justices of the peace.

Then, Mr. Speaker, following up the argument, if the supreme court of Louisiana has not had the question before it; if it is impossible that the returning board can be vested with a judicial power, then what is the result of it? Why, sir, according to all the authorities, without one single dissenting voice, unless the statute confers final powers, the returning board can only act ministerially in the matter. Here is the authority, supported by an abundant number of cases. Cooley, in Constitutional Limitations, pages 622, 623, says:

As the election officers perform for the most part ministerial functions only, their returns and the certificates of election which are issued upon them are not conclusive in favor of the officers who would thereby appear to be chosen, but the final decision must rest with the courts. This is the general rule, and the exptions are of those cases where the law under which the canvass is made declares the decision conclusive, or where a special statutory board is established with powers of final decision. And it matters not how high and important the office; an election to it is only made by the candidate receiving the requisite plurality of legal votes cast; and if any one, without having received such plurality, intrudes into an office, whether with or without a certificate of election, the courts have jurisdiction to oust as well as to punish him for such intrusion.

Again, the same author, pages 621, 622, says:

In all this the several boards act for the most part ministerially only, and are not vested with judicial powers to correct the errors and mistakes that may have occurred with any officer who preceded them in the performance of any duty connected with the election, or to pass upon any disputed fact which may affect the result. <sup>1</sup>Each board is to receive the returns transmitted to it, if in due form, as correct, and is to ascertain and declare the result as shown by such returns; <sup>2</sup> and if other matters are introduced into the returns than those which thelaw provides, they are to that extent unofficial, and such statements must be disregarded. <sup>3</sup> If a district or State board of canvassers assumes to reject returns transmitted to it on other grounds than those appearing upon its face, or to declare persons elected who are not shown by the returns to have received the requisite plurality, it is usurping functions, and its conduct will be reprehensible, if not even criminal. The action of such boards is to be carefully confined to an examination of the papers before them, and a determination of the result therefrom, in the light of such facts of public notoriety connected with the election as every one takes notice of, and which may enable them to apply such ballots as are in any respect imperfect to the proper candidates or officers for which they are intended, provided the intent is sufficiently indicated by the ballot in connection with such facts, so that extraneous evidence is not necessary for this purpose.

Then according to the same authority following it up if they only

Then, according to the same authority, following it up, if they only act ministerially, they have power only to act within and upon the face of the returns as they have been made out and submitted to them. They have no power to go outside of the face of the returns; to do no act to change the result of the election; and if they are limited and confined to the face of the returns, I maintain according to the facts that there are 12,000 votes that have been cast out by the usurped judgment of a returning board which had neither constitutional nor legal power to do it.

If that be so, it is the end of the question. Debate is unnecessary If that be so, it is the end of the question. Debate is unnecessary further to follow it up. But then, as a matter of fact, did the Legislature of Louisiana intend to confer such enormous powers upon this returning board? I argue not; and why do I argue so? It was admitted upon the other side the other day by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Garfield] that this was the gravest and the greatest question that ever came before the American people; and greatest question that ever came before the American people; and that being so, why is it possible that the Legislature of Louisiana should so far forget itself as that it could confer these omnipotent powers upon a set of men who were not legal gentleman—no one of them; two of them planters, one an undertaker, and the other a saloon-keeper—to resolve these great questions which appalled the great minds of Kent and Story and the fathers of the Republic, all the great statesmen along down the line of our political history. If such were the case-

Good God! on what a slender thread Hang everlasting things.

No, I cannot believe that the Legislature of Louisiana would have turned these men loose to make havoc of the ballot-boxes of the State, to feel for the very heart-strings of liberty and make them crack, even at the expense of the safety and the integrity of the Republic. It cannot be possible that such powers ever could have been conferred upon men of that description. No, sir, it is impossible to believe it. It would stultify the nation to believe that they can shelter themselves behind a statute of Louisiana, defy the Constitution of the United States, defy all the other States, and hold at bay all the other powers known to this Government. It is impossible to believe such a thing. Why, Mr. Speaker, if this returning board should have such power to go outside of the face of the returns and adjudicate the rights of all the voters in this State, it would put it into the power of that board to confiscate the liberties of the people of that State and to destroy the rights of the State government. No, I cannot believe that the Legislature of Louisiana would have board to confiscate the liberties of the people of that State and to destroy the rights of the State government.

Then, Mr. Speaker, to draw this branch of the argument to a close, I maintain that the returning board of Louisiana was confined to the face of the returns; and if that be so, as there were 10,000 white voters and 2,000 colored who were cast out and who were lawful voters, when these are re-instated it inevitably insures the election of Samuel J. Tilden and Thomas A. Hendricks; and whenever that fact is proclaimed to this nation the exploding thunders of a nation's joy will reverberate to the blue arch above and resound from sea to sea.

But Mr. Speaker, is the country to be deprived of the result of this

But, Mr. Speaker, is the country to be deprived of the result of this election by appealing to a different tribunal for the purpose of counting the vote? Now I understand that it is seriously insisted that the Vice-President of the United States is the delegated power for the purpose of counting these votes. I deny it. I maintain that it cannot be found in the Constitution. The powers of the Vice-President are very simple. They are very few. They are limited, so far as the actual discharge of his duties are concerned. First, he has to preside actual discharge of his duties are concerned. First, he has to preside over the Senate. He has no power to vote except where it is equally divided. He is made the depository of the electoral votes. He is authorized to open the seals of the votes which have been placed in his custody. And I maintain after the discharge of these duties the Constitution in its language stops short, except that he is to succeed to the Presidency in the event of the death or removal of the President.

Where is the power in the Constitution which confers upon him the right to count the vote, to judge the votes, to be made the judicial tribunal of the Union in this respect? I maintain it is not to be found.

It would be a solecism in the Government of the United States. Why to would be a solecism in the Government of the United States. Why so I Look over all your judicial tribunals, I mean the final appellate judicial tribunals, they are never deposited in one head. There is always a multiplicity of them. There is always a concurrence of a certain number of them in order to stamp judicial authority in this

Are we to suppose, in violation of all precedents, judicial and legislative, that our fathers forgot this and reposed unlimited judicial power in the Vice-President of the United States, who perhaps, as power in the Vice-President of the United States, who perhaps, as argued and recited by old authors on the subject, may be a candidate for the Presidency, when he may have it in his power to count himself in; when he may not only succeed to the Presidency, but to the commandership of the Army and the Navy, and to make treaties with the concurrence of the Senate and the House; in other words, to succeed to all these powers and yet be the depositary of counting the vote? Not at all. As has been argued before, the language of the Constitution does not authorize any such construction. The Constitution says that he shall open the votes and there it stops. There the collocation of the words in the sentence changes.

There, for the active, the passive form is substituted. There we have the important fact, if it be true, that you stamp the fathers who framed that instrument with those who are incapable of dictating what should be its terms, in the face of the fact, and I believe it has been so considered, that the scholars of the old revolutionary day were more profound and accurate than they are at the present time. No, gentlemen, do not impeach our fathers with such madness. Do not impeach them with such a want of scholarship. Do not impeach them with the greatest folly which could be inherited by their suc-

But who are to count? Both Houses are to act. What is the language of the Constitution? That in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives the votes shall be counted. They shall be guage of the Constitution? That in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives the votes shall be counted. They shall be counted before these bodies in their organized capacity; the Senate fully organized and the House fully organized. And there is no other power before whom they can be counted. If either one is absent, they cannot be counted. It requires the concurrence of the two Houses to count the vote. They have the power to decide what is a count, and what is a vote. These two concurring leave the judgment just where our fathers intended to leave it. They make it consistent with the wisdom and the policy of our fathers. It was to erect two tribunals who should be the great returning board, where the results of the election should all pour in from the States as rivers into the sea, where they were to finally determine the issue.

That being so, then, Mr. Speaker, we inquire simply as to the functions of the teller or counter. They are nothing but agents and organs of the House. They are appointed by the Senate and the House. The tellers of the Senate are the organs of the Senate and the tellers of the House are the organs of the House. They are the agents, the eyes, the mouths, if you choose, of these two bodies. They perform their duties. They are joint because the Constitution makes them joint. They cannot be separated. They are indissoluble by the Constitution of the United States, and unless there is concurrence in these counters or tellers under the sanction of these two organs or bodies, there can be no judgment rendered constitutionally.

bodies, there can be no judgment rendered constitutionally.
You see the point: These tellers cannot act individually.

Because their duties are joint. They cannot act individually any more than this House in its individual capacity can pass laws without the concurrence of the Senate. I hope this point is understood; and, if understood, it settles the question, and leaves the final judgment with both Houses.

ment with both Houses.

But the inquiry comes up here, Suppose there should be a disagreement. Why, sir, the Constitution provides for such a disagreement. If the votes cannot be counted, it results in no election; and then the House, as an electoral college, elects its President, determines the vacancy and fills the vacancy, independently of the Senate; and in like manner the Senate, as an organized body, determines when a vacancy for the Vice-Presidency exists, and fills that vacancy according to its own law, without the assistance or co-operation of the

Mr. LAWRENCE. May I ask the gentleman a question?
Mr. BRIGHT. Certainly, sir.
Mr. LAWRENCE. Who is to declare and determine when there is no election by the people? If the gentleman claims the duty devolves upon the two Houses of Congress, suppose the Senate should declare one way and the House another way: what then?
Mr. BRIGHT. I can answer the gentleman's question without any trouble. Suppose there is no President declared elected, then the House indees whether there is a vacancy and declares that there is House judges whether there is a vacancy and declares that there is no election. And so the Senate decides. And if they disagree, why the Constitution cuts the Gordian knot, resolves them into two electoral bodies, and they make the election accordingly. Am I understood, sir ?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I understand what is your proposition.

Mr. BRIGHT. But, Mr. Speaker, just here an inquiry may be presented. If these are delegated powers in Congress, judicial powers, can this delegated power be redelegated to another power? If it be once conceded that the power is judicial, this power cannot be delegated. It cannot be delegated any more than a judge with a commission in his pocket can leave the bench and call a stranger to decide a proposition which is pending before him. If, however, it be legislative, then I am prepared to concede that the Constitution provides vent for it. If it be conceded and adjudged necessary and proper by the two legislative bodies constituting the Congress of the United States—that is the only vent that I can see for this constitutional States—that is the only vent that I can see for this constitutional question—I reserve to myself the right and the privilege still further to ponder, still further to determine whether I shall accept the one or the other, as my conscience and judgment may dictate.

But as to the power of the two Houses as organized bodies for counting this vote; why, if there were any doubt left upon the subject we have but to recur to the precedents again. We have had twenty-two presidential elections, and the two bodies have ever exercised these powers—not the Vice-President. I have these precedents here, but I will simply give a sample or two without wearying the patience of the House with a repetition of the whole of them.

Both Houses appointed committees under concurrent resolutions, February, 1793, "to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President." Action:

The certificates of the electors for the several States were opened by the President of the Senate and delivered to the tellers, appointed for the purpose, who, having examined and ascertained the number of votes, presented a list thereof to the President of the Senate, which read as follows," &c.

I would remark that our present difficulty could be settled by the operation of the twenty-second joint rule, without convulsing the country as has been done; and the country ought to understand that the fault does not lie at the door of the House of Representatives. The House has never receded from the rule and is now willing, in my opinion, to stand by it.

These proceedings were uniform down to the adoption of the twen-These proceedings were uniform down to the adoption of the twenty-second joint rule—substantially the same. The twenty-second joint rule embodied the former action of the two bodies, which I have before read, and provided for the decision—yes, that is the word—of these questions. And they did proceed to the decision.

Mr. HOAR. Would it trouble the gentleman from Tennessee if I were to ask him a question?

Mr. BRIGHT. I do not know. My time is running. The sands are very few. I will hear the gentleman's question, however.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question in regard to the proposition he has just stated, that under the Constitution the House must determine whether a President has been elected, and proceed to elect one if it determine no has been elected.

elected, and proceed to elect one if it determine none has been elected; and so the Senate in regard to a Vice-President. Under the original Constitution, suppose that, of the two highest candidates, the House, determining that there has been no election, elects one; the Senate, differing, thinks that the other was elected President. Then according to the gentleman the Senate is to proceed to execute this direction, if there shall remain two or more:

In every case, after the choice of the President, the person having the greatest number of votes of the electors shall be the Vice-President.

Now, according to the gentleman's theory, would it not clearly result that, as against all mankind, the same man was both President and Vice-President of the United States at the same time, the House electing him President and binding everybody to that, the Senate holding that he was the person having second position and binding everybody to that.

Mr. BRIGHT. Why, Mr. Speaker, that is a hypothetical ques-

Mr. HOAR. I should think it was. Mr. BRIGHT. Under the Constitution as it existed before, and not under the Constitution as it exists at the present time.

Mr. HOAR. But the language of the Constitution as it existed at the beginning and the language of the Constitution as it exists now, we far as the gentleman's proposition is concerned, are the same.

Mr. BRIGHT. Not at all. I differ with the gentleman in relation to the construction he gives to the Constitution.

Mr. HOAR. Does the gentleman claim that the House of Repre-

entatives has a power now which it did not have at the origin of the Government

Mr. BRIGHT. I claim no greater power for the House now than is guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. I have stated my proposition, that in the case of a non-election this House resolves itself into an electoral college, and it alone adjudges then whether there is a vacancy or not, and in the event of a vacancy proceeds to elect a President; and so of the Senate. In the case of a non-election of a Vice-President by the people, or default by the people, the

I am not to be diverted from the argument which I am making. I know how the truth hurts sometimes. I remember how on one occasion our Saviour was applying the truth to the conscience of the woman at the well and she then began to talk about the mountains, and Jerusalem, and all of those things around about, instead of listening to the arguments addressed to her.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman permit me.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman permit me—
Mr. BRIGHT. I cannot be further interrupted.
Mr. HOAR. Is not the analogy that of the Pharisees who could not answer the Saviour's questions?
Mr. BRIGHT. And the Saviour did not want to answer theirs, either, or heed them.

But, I was recurring to the precedents, to this twenty-second joint rule to which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts agreed, and under which he has acted, and under which both Houses have acted and have assumed the jurisdiction of this question. And, sir, what is more, the great weight, the overwhelming weight of authority is in favor of counting the vote by these two bodies.

I simply allude to the opinions of a few of our great statesmen.

Mr. Clay, in 1821, said:

The two Houses were called to decide what are votes.

Mr. Lincoln, in his message of February 8, 1865, said, upon the joint resolution before the two Houses:

The two Houses of Congress have complete power to exclude from counting all ectoral votes deemed by them to be illegal.

In 1869, on the vote of Louisiana, the joint rule was objected to as unconstitutional, and the President of the Senate (Mr. Wade) said:

I believe the rule in accordance with the Constitution. (Votes counted.)

In 1876, Mr. MORTON, in speaking of counting, &c., stated:

The duty is imposed upon the two Houses of Congress; they alone can perform it.

Mr. BOUTWELL said, in 1876:

The power and the duty are in Congress.

Mr. Dawes said, in 1876:

I think the Constitution means that they shall be counted by the two Houses.

Other gentlemen who concurred in this opinion may be mentioned, and among them Crittenden, Cass, Douglas, Humphrey Marshall, Van Buren, George W. Jones, and Judge Black, the peer of the greatest living lawyers of the United States.

Then the country, both Houses of Congress, the Vice-President, and ablest lawyers of the country have acquiesced in it for a century, and therefore, if it is possible that any question should be settled within parties. If the question has been settled by the acquiescence of all parties. If the question cannot be settled in that way, how can it ever be settled? Has the Vice-President ever complained? Surely he has not. If, then, it has been acquiesced in for all these years; if he has not. If, then, it has been acquiesced in for all these years; if the power applied to these objects was properly exercised; if it was not a usurped power which belonged to the Vice-President, then the question is fairly barred by the statute of limitations of a century. Then, Mr. Speaker, we have been told here, in order to have a sort of moral effect upon the country, that intimidation has been used over the voters of the United States, and particularly in Florida, Louisiana, and South Carolina. Where does the intimidation come from? When the God of heaven speaks in his thunder man is silent; when the Government speaks in the roar of its artillery, in the tramp of its legions, the citizens are silent and are in terror. Who had possession of these sections of the country? The Government had the

when the Government speaks in the roar of its artillery, in the tramp of its legions, the citizens are silent and are in terror. Who had possession of these sections of the country? The Government had the power of the Army and Navy, and of the officials, and if there was intimidation to be exercised, against whom was that intimidation to be exercised? It was exercised against those who were subject to the power of the Government; the democratic party and not the republican party, they were shielded by the power of the Government. But while all that is so, Mr. Speaker, permit me to say that according to English policy and according to American policy the parade of soldiers upon the occasion of election day has been reprobated and discarded and punished as they were in the days of the corrupt Sir Robert Walpole in the British government. It will not do to refer to the whisky rebellion in Pennsylvania, which was an insurrection against the lawful authorities, a refusal to pay the revenues of the Government. But here was the exercise of the highest duty of the American citizen, here all law waives the Army away as a terror to the freedom of ballot upon the occasion and holds them in the distance and out of view, but here they were paraded with as a terror to the freedom of band upon the occasion and notes them in the distance and out of view, but here they were paraded with martial tread, with fife and drum, and glistening bayonets, all to impress terror, whether so meant or not.

But they tell us that there are individuals in the State of Louisiana who refused employment to the freedmen there unless they should vote as they willed. Why, sir, the estates belong to the white men, and they had a right to do what they wished with them. But if there is any truth in that, without conceding the fact, would it be worse than turning a man out of office simply because he was a democrat, and exacting tribute of 80,000 or 100,000 office-holders to carry or at, and exacting tribute of 80,000 or 100,000 office-holders to carry on in behalf of a party a presidential contest? No, sir; if there was intimidation at all, it was on the other side.

I do not propose to weary the House with a discussion of these questions. I do deprecate, however, the effort that I have seen made to stir up sectional strife with a view of influencing the presidential election of the United States. I have no words of burning denunciation sufficient to strike and rive the man from whatever section who is so unpatriotic, so truant to duty, so unjust as to stir up these fires merely for political purposes and to transmit the virus of our distemper to posterity.

Ay, sir, let shame roll its burning fire over his memory. Let him go and worship the volcano which buried Pompeii and Herculaneum go and worship the voicano which ouried Pompeli and Herculaneum beneath its streams of burning lava. Let him go and worship the earthquakes which swallowed up Lisbon and Aleppo. Let him go and worship the conflagrations which devoured the cities of London, Moscow, Chicago and Boston, and then perhaps he may be suffi-ciently demonized to stir up the dying embers of sectional contro-versy to light the torch of his unhallowed ambition, to illumine his pathway to the Presidency of the United States over the fragments of the American Constitution. Sir, we wish no more of it; we have seen this great Republic rent and torn asunder as the rocks and hills in some mighty convulsion of nature, leaving a deep chasm flowing with fraternal blood.

We of the South propose not only to shake hands across the bloody chasm, but to have it healed and cicatrized so that the scar will disappear like the course of the eagle in the air or the path of the ship in the sea. Let us have peace; such peace as will make the land ra-diant with joy; such peace as will make heaven bend to kiss the

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask consent of the House to have printed in the RECORD, as a portion of the debate, some remarks which I have prepared upon this subject.

No objection was made, and leave was accordingly granted. [See

Appendix.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the further consideration of the present order be postponed until to-morrow after the reading of the

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour now begins at eighteen minutes past two o'clock, and reports of a public nature from committees are now in order.

ARTICLES FOR EXHIBITION FREE OF DUTY.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4528) to provide for the free entry of articles imported for exhibition by societies established for encouragement of the arts and sciences, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

DESTITUTE POOR OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4529) for the relief of the destitute poor of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the following title:
An act (H. R. No. 2461) for the relief of certain officers of the Third

United States Artillery who suffered by fire at Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor, on the 3d of March, 1875.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 3156) entitled "An act to approve the revision of the statutes of the United States," and asked a conference of the House upon the disagreeing votes thereon, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. Boutwell, Mr. Christiancy, and Mr. Wallace.

MARY FEARON AND JESSIE CROSSIN.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 178) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Mary Fearon and Jessie Crossin, executrices of Samuel P. Fearon, deceased, certain registered United States bonds redeemed by the Government on forged assignments and power of attorney, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, also, from the same committee, reported back the following petitions; which were referred to the Committee of Claims:

The petition of David Allen, Company C, Second United States Artillery, for salary due; and

The petition of William L. Riley, of the District of Columbia, praying for relief for work done on the grounds of the Smithsonian Institution.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported adversely upon the following; which were laid upon the table:

A bill (H. R. No. 3752) to repeal section 3412 of the Revised Statutes which imposes a 10 per cent. tax on the notes of State banks and State banking associations used for circulation and paid out by them;

A bill (H. R. No. 3971) to establish the legal-tender quality of the silver coins of the United States as it existed prior to the enactment of section 3586 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for the reueal of said section; and the repeal of said section; and A bill (H. R. No. 3789) to amend section 5200 of chapter 3 of title 62 of the Revised Statutes.

BANK-NOTES REDEEMABLE IN GOLD.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3725) to amend sections 5185 and 5186 of the Revised Statutes, and the bill (H. R. No. 3724) to amend sections 5185 and 5186 of the Revised Statutes, and the bill (H. R. No. 3734) to provide for the redemption of national-bank notes payable in gold at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in San Francisco, California, together with a substitute for the same, being a bill (H. R. No. 4530) to amend sections 5185 and 5186 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that section 5185 shall be amended so as to read

as follows:

Associations may be organized in the manner prescribed by this title for the purpose of issuing notes payable in gold; and upon the deposit of any United States bonds, bearing interest payable in gold, with the Treasurer of the United States, in the manner prescribed for other associations, it shall be lawful for the Competroller of the Currency to issue to the association making the deposit circulating notes of different denominations, but none of them less than $5, and not exceeding in amount 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited, which shall express the promise of the association to pay them upon presentation in gold coin of the United States, and shall be so redeemable.

The bill further provides that section 5186 shall be amended so as to read as follows:

The offi further provides that section 5150 shall be amended so as to read as follows:

Every association organized, or which may be organized, under the preceding section in the State of California shall at all times keep to its credit, in the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States at San Francisco, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its outstanding circulation in gold coin of the United States, and shall receive at par in the payment of debts the gold notes of every other association which at the time of such payment is redeeming its circulating notes in gold coin of the United States, and shall be subject to all of the provisions of this title: Provided, That in applying the same to associations organized for issuing gold notes, the terms "lawful money" and "lawful money of the United States" shall be construed to mean gold or silver coin of the United States. And when the circulating notes of any such association, assorted or unassorted, shall be presented for redemption in any sum to the assistant treasurer of the United States at San Francisco, the same shall be redeemed in gold coin of the United States. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the assistant treasurer of the United States at San Francisco to the respective associations issuing the same; and he shall notify them once each week, or oftener at his discretion, of the amount of such redemption. And whenever the redemption for any association shall amount to the sum of $1,000, such association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the assistant treasurer of the United States at San Francisco as um in gold coin of the United States equal to the amount of its circulating notes redeemed: Provided, That the expense incurred in transmission of notes redeemed by said assistant treasurer, shall be borne by such associations from redemption of their circulating notes at their own counters. And any expense which may be incurred in the office of the assistant treasurer by reason of the provisions of this act shall be borne retably by such

Mr. PAYNE. I call the previous question upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] will explain in what respect this bill proposes to change the present law.

Mr. PAYNE. This bill proposes merely two alterations in the present law. The statute in regard to the currency notes permits banks to have of such notes 90 per cent. of the par value of their bonds on deposit with the Treasury. But the gold banks of California are allowed but 80 per cent. of circulation on their bonds deposited. It is proposed by this bill to give to the gold banks of California the right to receive as circulation 90 per cent. of the securities deposited, and thus not them upon the same footing as the currency banks.

to receive as circulation 90 per cent. of the securities deposited, and thus put them upon the same footing as the currency banks.

The effect of the other provision of the bill is this: the currency banks are required by law to keep on deposit at the Treasury Department 5 per cent. of their circulation as a redemption fund. This bill proposes to require the gold banks to deposit with the subtreasurer at San Francisco 5 per cent. of their circulation for the redemption of their notes that may be presented.

These are the only alterations which the bill proposes to make in the present law. They merely assimilate our policy in regard to the gold banks of California to the policy which has been adopted with the present law. They merely assimilate our policy in regard to the gold banks of California to the policy which has been adopted with reference to the currency banks. The bill has the approval of the Treasury Department and is unanimously recommended by the committee.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and

Mr. PAYNE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. LAMAR, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported back, without amendment, the bill (S. No. 14) to extend the time for the construction and completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That eight years' additional time is hereby granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to construct and complete its main line of its road by way of the valley of the Columbia River to its terminus on Paget Sound under its charter and the resolutions of Congress relating thereto. That this extension is granted upon the express condition and understanding that where premption and homestead claims were initiated, or private entries and locations were allowed, upon lands embraced in the grant to said company prior to the receipt of the orders of withdrawal at the respective district land offices, the land embraced in such entries shall not be beld as within the grant to said company, and shall be patented to the parties lawfully entering the same, and in case of abandonment by them shall be open to pre-emption and homestead entry only by actual settlers; but the company shall be entitled to indemnity therefor as now provided by law.

SEC. 3. That entries remaining unadjusted and suspended in the General Land Office on account of an increase in price of the even sections within the limits of the grant, where the same were made or based upon settlement made prior to the receipt of the orders of withdrawal aforesaid at the respective district land offices, shall be relieved from such suspension and carried into patent; but nothing in this act shall be so construed as to affect existing adjustments nor to authorize the refunding of any moneys received for such lands under existing laws.

SEC. 4. That the extension of time granted by section 1 of this act shall not apply to the branch line of said road from Lake Pend d'Oreille, across the Cascade Mountains, to Puget Sound, in Washington Territory; and at the expiration of the time allowed by existing laws for the construction of said branch the lands herefore granted therefor, and not then earned by said company by constructing said branch line of railroad, shall be restored to the public domain, to be dealt with as other public lands, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 5. That this act shall not be construct to affect existing private rights otherwise than as hereinbefore expressly provided, and shall, as well as said charter and other acts and resolutions hereinbefore mentioned, be subject to alteration, amondment, or repeal at the pleasure of Congress.

SEC. 6. That the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior, within six months from the date hereof, its assent to, and acceptance of, the provisions of this act, or be forever debarred from taking or receiving any benefit from or under the same.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to make a question of order on this bill. It

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to make a question of order on this bill. is that by the provisions of the first section the condition on which this company is entitled to receive lands from the Government is changed. Under the present law the condition is that the road shall be completed by July 4, 1877, the 4th of next July. This bill proposes to extend the time within which the company shall have the right to become the owner of this land for the period of ten years. I submit that this extension of time, this creation of a new condition, is the granting of property within the meaning of Rule 112. This not only touches property of the United States, it actually appropriates property by an extension of the time within which the grant shall take effect. I submit that the bill comes very clearly within the purview of Rule 112, to which I desire to call the attention of the Chair.

All proceedings touching appropriations of money and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or anthorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House.

I therefore insist that the effect of this bill is to grant property. It makes an appropriation of property direct and immediate by creating a new condition upon which this company shall be entitled to the benefit of this grant; and, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this involves a very large appropriation of lands—I should think some thirty-six million acres—the question becomes one of grave public concern under the provisions of the rule.

Mr. LAMAR. If this point has not already been decided upon measures of this kind, I am sure that as an original question this cannot be considered a measure of appropriation. It does not appropriate one acre of the public domain or one dollar of the public money; nor does it pledge the credit of the country in any way whatever to the extent of one dollar. It is simply an act extending the time for the construction and completion of the railroad and relieving the company of the consequences of not complying with the conditions already imposed upon it by law. But, of course, I will cheerfully submit to the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, being aware that this question was to arise, has given the subject very careful consideration. The original act of July 2, 1864, contains in its eighth section the condition "that the said company shall commence work on said road within two years from the approval of the act by the President, and shall complete not less than fifty miles per year after the second year, and complete the road by the 10th day of July, 1876."

The joint resolution of July 1, 1868, contains the following condition: "that the said company shall commence the work on said road within two years from and after the 2d day of July, 1868, and shall brild not less than one handred wiles build not less than one hundred miles per year, and complete the road by the 4th day of July, 1877."

The act of May 31, 1870, provides: "And twenty-five miles of said line, between its western terminus and the city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, shall be completed by the 1st day of January, A. D.

The pending bill extends the time for the completion of the entire ad. The Clerk will read Rule 112.

The Clerk read as follows: road.

112. All proceedings touching appropriations of money shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The pending bill is certainly a measure touching appropriation of property, not incidentally but as to a vital feature of its appropriation, namely, the fundamental condition on which this company is entitled to receive this appropriation of land. It creates a new condition and grant of land on a new condition that the company shall complete the road within a new period. The bill therefore is not only a measure touching the appropriation of property. But pany shall complete the road within a new period. The bill there-fore is not only a measure touching the appropriation of property, but is a direct, material, vital feature of the appropriation. It is virtu-ally and directly a new grant of that property upon a new condition. Time is an element to be considered in connection with the grant. And by the existing law time is of the essence of the grant.

It is not an answer to say the company might become entitled to the land by completing the road within the time now fixed by law, for it will be observed that the application to change the terms of the grant and extend the time implies a necessity for such change of time to enable the company to obtain the benefit of the grant. It can be, the Chair believes, justly held that the extension of the time is of itself property within the meaning and spirit of the rule.

While the Chair has no doubt on the point raised, he begs to say to such as may have doubts that such doubts should, at least by the Chair under existing circumstances, be given in favor of the Government, because there is no mutuality of interest in this contract. The point of order, therefore, the Chair holds is well taken.

Mr. LAMAR. I ask by unanimous consent that in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union this bill may be considered on next Monday at two o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests the gentleman will be more likely to get consent to consider if he named some other day, because on Monday next at two o'clock the Chair would be compelled to recognize the Committee for the District of Columbia under the arbitrary and heart the arbitrary are the relative to the consider of the relative to the r trary reading of the rule fixing that day and hour for the consideration of District business

Mr. KASSON. Say Tuesday next, then.
Mr. LAMAR. I ask, then, that Tuesday next at two o'clock this matter be set down for consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe I will have to object.

Mr. LAMAR. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me a single statement in connection with this request?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, we have found in committee there are about thirteen thousand paragons who have been driven by stress of

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, we have found in committee there are about thirteen thousand persons who have been driven by stress of misfortune to be stockholders in this road; that they are chiefly people of very small means who have been persuaded to take bonds. surprise I found among my own farmer constituents some of those who had stock forced upon them in that way. I am also informed in committee if this bill passes so they can have additional time, they will immediately make contracts for about forty thousand tons of iron and go on with this work. Many members of this House also find their constituents in the same condition. Unless this is done this session the whole thing expires, and no contracts can be made and no work continued. We have believed, therefore, the public interest, as well as the interest of these poor stockholders, would be greatly promoted by this act; and in that view I make an appeal in behalf of these unfortunate men to the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his objection

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say a word in answer to that suggestion.

The SPEAKER. This debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish only to say a word, as time is of some consequence now. As I understand, the greater portion of these unfortunate persons who were induced by false pretenses and fraudulent representations to become stockholders in this company—

Mr. MASSON. Now holders of bands.

Mr. KASSON. No; holders of bonds.
Mr. HOLMAN. Unless they are prepared to advance further sums of money, are to be deprived of all benefit resulting from the completion of this road, if it shall be completed. Indeed, this stock was extinguished by the judicial sale of the road. It is quite manifest the benefits of this road and this proposed legislation, if secured, will necessary to the complete of the road. will accrue only to a comparatively small number of persons, and those only who are able to advance further sums of money and aid in its completion. The investments made by widows and guardians of orphan children are already lost. The number who will derive benefit from this renewal of the grant will be small, and will be confined to the leading capitalists who heretofore have had control of this whole enterprise and for whose benefit the original grant was made. The small investors will take no benefit under this bill. Sub-made. The small investors will take no benefit under this bill. Subsidies from Government further enrich great capitalists and skillful and unscrupulous adventurers, but are fatal to the honest investors who only seek legitimate gains.

Mr. KASSON. Let me say a word.

Mr. HOLMAN. One word further. This whole subject of subsidy by the Federal Government, in all of its forms, has uniformly ended in fraud, not only upon the Government, but upon the people, and has been a most fruitful source of dishonesty and of national humiliation, and the scoper the whole system is put an end to the better it ation, and the sooner the whole system is put an end to the better it will be for the Government, the public honor, and the people. Its continuance will be ultimately fatal to the integrity on which our free institutions rest.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will allow this to be considered by the House.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Speaker, as the bill is in a position wherein one objection may prevent its consideration, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the history of this case, with the hope of inducing him to withdraw his objection to the designation of a day for the consideration of this important bill in the Committee of the Whole. Of course he is as familiar as I am with the circumstances under which the Northern Pacific Railroad Company was formed and began its operations. He remembers as well as I do that tormed and began its operations. He rememoers as well as I do that it undertook to build a great transcontinental line of road over the most feasible of routes, through the richest of our Northern Territories, and to connect the great lakes and the Pacific Ocean, without any subsidy from the Government, but by private enterprise alone, directed and organized by one of the great monetary houses which then commanded the confidence of the people of this country; that it received no bonds from the Government; that it contracted no great loan abroad and received no aid from foreign capital, but that it was carried on entirely from the proceeds of the sale of its bonds which were floated among our own people by the great firm which had helped to organize the war credit of the Union and which so entirely possessed the confidence of the country that its recommendations and promises were ranked second only to those of the Government itself. Everywhere throughout the Union the subscription-lists were opened. The legacies of widows and of orphans, the small savings of superannuated clergymen, the trust-funds of benevolent institutions, the selender pittances of aged spinsters, the savings of the farmers, mechanics, and laborers were everywhere freely invested, and even the bonds of the Government were exchanged for the bonds of the company by those who wished to secure a little larger income from what pany by those who wished to secure a little larger income from what they regarded and were assured was an equally reliable investment. They had reason to think so, for the bonds were floated by the same house that had placed the bonds of the United States, and the assurances of that house were regarded as infallible. By those means $30,000,000 were raised and about six hundred miles of the road were built and are now in successful operation.

Then came the panic. The crash of the great firm was unjustly said to be the cause thereof, but time has proven it to be merely one of its incidents. The road could not go on. It was stopped in the middle incidents. The road could not go on. It was stopped in the middle of the plains. It could not even reach the mines and settlements at the eastern base of the mountains. A year or more passed, and then by one of the wisest and best adjustments ever made in railroad matters a change of ownership and management was effected. The original stockholders, the charter-members, the Credit Mobilier stockholders, if you please, those who had hoped to profit rather by their interest in the franchise than by the investment of their money, were put aside; the road, its franchises, and its equipment were delivered over to the the road, its franchises, and its equipment were delivered over to the bondholders, to these people who had actually put in the money to build it, and to secure themselves they took the property, canceled the bonds and all other debt, and took the road and its management into their own hands. They now come with the property on their hands, and representing to Congress that they have invested their money in a work of great public benefit ask that it may not be confiscated, but that they may be granted time to make their investment good and complete the road for their own benefit and the benefit of the country. The gentleman from Indiana is entirely mixtaken in his good and complete the road for their own benefit and the benefit of the country. The gentleman from Indiana is entirely mistaken in his proposition that they will be in a way to forfeit their stock unless they put in more money to go on with the road. If it were so it would be no worse than to forfeit their property from lack of time. But I assure the gentleman from Indiana that, without disturbing the rights of a single owner, the railroad, which is entirely free from debt of any kind, can now procure the means to go on. Great iron companies and other industrial interests, anxious to set the wheels of business again in motion, are desirous to take the bonds of the company and a lien mount the finished and unfinished portions and to mean it within a lien upon the finished and unfinished portions, and to push it within the year up the rich valleys of the Yellowstone to the gold, silver, lead, and copper mines of Montana and to the coal-fields of the Columbia, where a business awaits it sufficient to pay not only expenses but interest on all its bonds.

Now these people, not a few people as the gentleman says, but 13,000, a list of whose names is in the hands of your committee, living in twenty-three States of this Union, to be found in almost every gentleman's district, have been engaged in a great and worthy undertaking. It may not have been very remunerative to them, but certainly has been of great public good. It has opened to settlements lands that without it would be of no more value to the country than those traversed by Livingstone in the center of the African continent. It has enabled you to reach the hostile Indian tribes at less cost, and It has enabled you to reach the hostile indian tribes at less cost, and promises to open their very strongholds to our people; it will develop the rich mines along the route and unlock untold treasure for your benefit; it will give the rich territories that it traverses an outlet and break down monopoly and give the East another highway to the Pacific, and all without asking for a dollar in subsidy, but merely making the reasonable request for time to go on with their own money.

Unless they can go on, the road is worthless. And if you deny this motion you virtually confiscate the property of 13,000 citizens engaged in a laudable and beneficial enterprise. Let gentlemen take notice that this will be the effect of it. But it is not asked that actually the bill comes up every gentleman will you notice that this will be the effect of it. But it is not asked that action be now had. When the bill comes up every gentleman will vote on its merits. Now all we ask is that a day may be set for the hearing of this case. And I say that when 13,000 of the people of the United States, having put $30,000,000 into a great public work, which by no fault of theirs has not been completed in the time specified, and they desire to go on with it, knowing that if they do not all they have put in will be lost, confiscated, and they come to this House of Congress and ask for a hearing, that they should not be deried a day in court.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana—
Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. Is debate in order?
The SPEAKER. Debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.
Mr. COX. Then I object to debate, and I object to fixing this bill for a day certain.
Mr. WALLING. I also object.
The SPEAKER. One objection is sufficient.
Mr. LAMAP. Describe certleman insist on his chiestion?

Mr. LAMAR. Does the gentleman insist on his objection?

The SPEAKER. Two other gentlemen have objected, and the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole House. Reports are still in order from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. LAMAR. I am instructed by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to report, as a substitute for sundry bills relating to the same subject, a bill amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act incorporating the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and the act supplementary thereto approved May 22, 1872, and the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific Ocean," approved July 27, 1866.

The bill (H. R. No. 4531) was received and read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire that the bill be read at length?

Mr. LAMAR. I do not if it is to be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order is not waived on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Mississippi does not desire the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I submit the views of the minority in relation to

Mr. KASSON. I submit the views of the minority in relation to the bill, and ask that they be printed with the report of the majority. Mr. FRYE. What has become of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Mississippi, who reported the bill, did not desire its present consideration, and consents that it go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Public Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. Is it too late to have the bill read?

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that the bill appropriates money and land.

money and land.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is not necessary when the gentleman from Mississippi himself moves to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the Public Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. I did not rise to make a point of order but to ask for the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is the gentleman's right. The bill will be ordered to be printed.

Mr. LAMAR. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be made a special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the 3d day of February next, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. HOGE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The bill will then be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the report of the committee, with the views of the minority, will be printed.

BRIDGE AT OMAHA.

Mr. THROCKMORTON, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4532) to provide for the fixing of the rates and charges for freights and passengers passing over the bridge constructed across the Missouri River at Omaha, Nebraska, on the line of the Union Pacific Railroad; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and made a spe-Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and made a special order for the 6th day of February after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the only effect of this bill is to reduce the tolls over the bridge at Omaha.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. It is a substitute for a bill which was intended for that purpose, but this bill leaves the Government to adjust the rates.

just the rates.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the entire effect of the bill?
Mr. THROCKMORTON. Yes, sir.
Mr. HOLMAN. There being no other subject in the bill, I will not object.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask that the bill and report be printed.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. And I also ask that the bill be made a pecial order in Committee of the Whole after the morning hour on the 6th day of February next, and from day to day until disposed of.
Mr. HOLMAN. Subject to the appropriation bills.
Mr. THROCKMORTON. Of course.

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman will include the Northern Pacific Railroad bill, I will not object; but I think that bill is as important

The SPEAKER. The objection must be absolute, and not conditional.

Mr. KASSON. I object to picking out these bills and giving them preference over others of equal importance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.
Mr. KASSON. Unless the other bill is included.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make his objection conditional.

Mr. KASSON. I name the condition simply as a notice to the gentleman, so that he can withdraw his request if he desires to do so.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DURHAM. Has the morning hour expired ? The SPEAKER. It has.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

Mr. DURHAM. The Senate has returned House bill No. 3156, to perfect the revision of the statutes of the United States, with their amendments disagreed to by the House, and have asked a committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. I move that the request of the Senate be granted.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. DURHAM, Mr. BELL, and Mr. DENISON.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table. The motion was agreed to.

TROOPS EMPLOYED IN THE SOUTHERN STATES.

The SPEAKER. The first business upon the Speaker's table is the message of the President in reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 9, 1876, in relation to the employment of troops in the States of Virginia, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida since the 1st of August last. That message has already been read and is printed in the RECORD. Is it desired that the message be read again f

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I move that the second reading of the message be dispensed with.
Mr. HURLBUT. I object to that, and I call for the reading of the documents accompanying the message.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The message has already been read.

Mr. HURLBUT. I want the documents accompanying the message

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the demand for the reading of the documents cannot be entertained. The rule provides for the reading of the message.

Mr. BANKS. If the reading of any paper is called for, the question must be submitted to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House under Rule 141:

When the reading of a paper is called for and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the House.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire if the present occupant of the chair did not the other day rule on this very question, that a document must be read when its reading is called for by any member?

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled that the message must be read. Mr. HOAR. And that the documents called for must be read. The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit that question to the consideration of the sideration of the House, for he desires to do what is exactly in order.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Are not the documents very voluminous and in writing, and would it not take two or three days to read

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to say how long it would take to read them; there are three large boxes of documents.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that only the reading of the message can be called for.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is quite willing to submit the question to the House.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to know if the House is not entitled to have

Mr. HOAR. I desire to know if the House is not entitled to have a ruling of the Chair upon the point I have suggested, and whether the Chair did not rule the other day, when this precise question came up, that we were entitled to the reading of the documents?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The gentleman opposite may be technically entitled to make the call, but I suggest whether they are willing to take the responsibility of interposing purely dilatory motions and calling for the reading of telegraphic messages and details which will take an indefinite period of time, when to-morrow morning they will have the whole thing in print, and when the morning they will have the whole thing in print, and when the message has been read and has been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HURLBUT. If the gentleman intends to move to print I will not insist on the reading.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The printing is included in my resolo-

Mr. HURLBUT. I will hear the resolution read.

Mr. KASSON. I would inquire whether a motion to go into Committee of the Whole upon an appropriation bill would not be in order

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, pending this question. It would have been if it had been a prior motion.

Mr. KASSON. But is it not in order pending this business? I think the rule makes it in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would have entertained a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but it was not and has not been made.

Mr. KASSON. I supposed the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Hol-Man] desired to make it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from New York supposed that the

mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from New York supposed that the message would be disposed of in a few minutes.

Mr. KASSON. It cannot be, for the reading of these documents will take a large portion of the afternoon.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the documents are to be read, I am satisfied that a great deal of time will be consumed. In that event I shall feel justified in raking a motion to go into Committee the Whole. feel justified in making a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of Union.

Mr. HURLBUT. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to page 194 of the Manual and to page 97, which is explicit on this ques-

Where papers are laid before the House or referred to a committee, every member has a right to have them once read at the table before he can be compelled to vote on them.

If the Chair will allow me I will refer to a precedent in the Journal, which was cited once before when this question was up.

Mr. HURLBUT. To page 194 of the Manual and to page 97.

Mr. COX. I call for the reading of the Digest upon page 97, which confirms the Speaker's opinion that the will of the House has to be taken on the reading of a paper. This message has been read. These various accompanying papers cannot be read independently of the will of the House. If the Speaker should submit that question to the House I think it would be decided very promptly and would save much time. much time.

The SPEAKER. The passage on page 147 clearly alludes to the message proper:

All messages from the President are in writing and are sent to the House by his Private Secretary.

And then at the close of the paragraph is the following:

Whenever taken up, messages from the President are always read in extenso.

That would seem to imply that it refers to the message proper, but the Chair is clearly of the judgment that the question should be submitted to the House, under Rule 141 already cited.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. What is it that it is desired to have read?

The SPEAKER. The papers accompanying the message.

Mr. COX. It would take a week.

The question was put upon reading the accompanying papers, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I now submit the following resolution, on which I ask the previous question:

Resolved, That the message of the President, and the accompanying documents, in answer to the resolution of the House, calling for copies of all dispatches, orders, &c., relating to the use of troops in the States of Virginia, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida since the 1st of August last, be printed and referred to a select committee of eleven members, with instructions to report whether there has been any exercise of authority not warranted by the Constitution and laws of the United States in the use of the troops in the States referred to within the period stated, for which the President is justly responsible; with power to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths.

Mr. BANKS. I raise the question of order upon the last clause of that resolution; that is, as to the power to send for persons and papers, not as to the power to administer oaths, which is given by statute. The power to send for persons and papers changes the rules of the House, and under the rules of the House, where a question is pend-ing, no motion can be made except that series of motions with which the Chair is familiar, of which the motion to commit is one. It canthe Chair is familiar, of which the motion to commit is one. It cannot be offered in any other way than simply as a motion to commit or refer, if gentlemen choose that expression.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts considers that the word "refer" is equivalent to the word "commit."

Mr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. It is so held throughout the Manual.

Mr. BANKS. It is. I say that the message cannot be committed with this power given to the committee without a change of the rules or a motion to suspend the rules.

or a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I will hear the judgment of the Chair before submitting some remarks in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts

The SPEAKER. The Chair would prefer to hear anything the gentleman has to say upon that point before making his ruling.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I desire to say that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] has for the first time raised this question; it is the first time within my experience that it has been raised in it is the first time within my experience that it has been raised in this House. Almost every resolution under which an investigation has been ordered by the House during this Congress has included these precise words, and by a majority vote those resolutions have been adopted, no gentleman raising this question of order upon them. Mr. BANKS. The gentleman will allow me to express the opinion that he is mistaken in regard to the practice of the House. In my opinion the practice, where this special power to send for persons and papers is asked, is for a committee to come into the House with the declaration that evidence is required which cannot be obtained the declaration that evidence is required which cannot be obtained without this order; and then unanimous consent being asked for the without this order; and then unanimous consent being asked for the granting of this power, it is very rarely or never refused. But to grant it without any suggestion of its necessity or of the use to which it is to be put is something which has never been conceded by any House; and such a proposition cannot be in order under the rule regulating the series of questions which may be propounded to the House in a matter of this kind, the motion to commit being one. Mr. WOOD, of New York. During the present Congress more committees of investigation have been constituted than during any prior Congress; and I ask the gentleman whether in any case where a resolution has been presented for the institution of inquiry by a committee, a resolution containing precisely this same language, any gentleman has raised a question of order upon it?

Mr. BANKS. These resolutions of inquiry have in many cases been pressed upon the House in such a way that members who did not approve them did not object. I have not approved them myself; but I have not made objection. But I say at this time that we have had enough of them. I do not object to a special committee upon this President's message if gentlemen ask it; and if the gentleman from New York, as chairman of this committee, or any other man, shall be reafter report that information necessary for the House is in New York, as chairman of this committee, or any other gentleman, shall hereafter report that information necessary for the House is in existence and cannot be obtained without these powers being granted to the committee, I do not think anybody will object. But until that is done I must insist upon an adherence to the rules of the House.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. If almost any other gentleman than my friend from Massachusetts had raised this question of order, placing it upon the ground that he does, I should have strongly suspected that there was some motive in preventing this proposed compected that there was some motive in preventing this proposed committee of investigation from sending for persons and papers. The gentleman tells us that if this committee shall find that they cannot gentleman tells us that if this committee shall find that they cannot procure certain testimony or certain papers they can then report the fact to the House, which will probably give them the necessary power. Now we all know that almost every hour of the time of the House up to the 4th of March is pre-occupied by special orders, by appropriation bills, and by the pending proposition with reference to counting the electoral vote. Hence this committee, deprived of the right to report at any time, which I have consented to, will find it almost impossible to get an opportunity to present to the House the request for these powers. Hence I am obliged to suppose that there must be some motive or some reason why some gentlemen—I do.not intend to apply this personally to my friend from Massachusetts—are desirous that this committee shall be deprived of an opportunity to make a full, fair, and free investigation.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I raised this same point when the message was read the other day purely out of a desire to keep the gentleman was read the other day purely out of a desire to keep the gentleman from New York straight in the traces. [Laughter.] Now, when he speaks about the difficulty of reporting to the House, he should remember that the resolution does not give him power to report at any time; and any report which he may make asking this power must come in under a suspension of the rules or by unanimous consent.

It will be well for the Chair to consider before making his decision

It will be well for the Chair to consider before making his decision the extent of the power proposed to be conferred. The power to send for persons and papers goes to the extent of taking any member out of his seat or from committee service or any other business in which he may be engaged. Hence, I am inclined to believe with the gentleman from Massachusetts, that it requires a suspension of the rules to give the committee power to send for persons and papers, as well as

Mr. KASSON. If the Chair will allow me, I wish to say that the last clause of the resolution is not only unnecessary, but it changes the character of the committee in two respects. First, it proposes to confer by a mere resolution the power to administer oaths; but that power is already provided for by statute. The other point is that the resolution does not propose to refer the subject to such a committee as can be created under the rules and without a suspension of them. as can be created under the rules and without a suspension of them. I agree in part with the previous ruling of the Chair upon this point; but it will be observed that this is a proposition to create a committee of investigation, and that is certainly not in order under the rules pending the other orders of the House. I am inclined to think that the gentleman from New York has the right to include in the reference the creation of a select committee as suggested by the Chair, under the general rule as to the selection of committees in a certain order. But this is not now a more motion of reference. It becomes order. But this is not now a mere motion of reference. It becomes an independent motion to create a new committee of the House called an investigating committee, and to give this committee powers which do not belong to ordinary select or standing committees. I simply make these remarks in support of the point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to address myself distinctly to a reply to the suggestion of the honorable gentleman from New York, that there must be some motive on the part of members who object to endowing this investigating committee with power to send for persons and papers. There is such a motive. My motive is that it does not seem to me a decent thing in the relations of the different departments of the Government to propose to inquire into the action of the President or any of the Departments through the mode of sending for persons and papers by a committee of this House until the ordinary, respectful, proper mode of asking for information has been tried and exhausted. I do not deny there may be cases looking to an impeachment, looking proper mode of asking for information has been tried and exhausted. I do not deny there may be cases looking to an impeachment, looking by an investigation to the prevention of abuses in the public service, in which this mode of approaching the subject would be proper and courteous and the duty of the House, if the resolution should be offered and passed within its rules.

But it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is for the interest of all parties in this Government alike that the courtesies, the etiquette, the proprieties which attend our official life, should be preserved where it can be done without sacrificing the essentials of truth, and that it is not wise to introduce elements which create and excite an-tagonism.

Now, here is a question of what has been the constitutional action of the President of the United States in what I conceive is a very grave and important particular. It seems to me if there is any person who knows any specific fact the proper legal constitutional method is to ask for it, and if the President gives the House the fact that is all; if he says he cannot give it to us without a violation of the public interest, then consider whether that answer is on the whole satisfactory or not. The question will then come up whether an application of this kind will be proper. That is my opinion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to read from the Manual, page 59, in connection with this point:

A motion to commit may be amended by the addition of instructions

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

The SPEAKER-

Also by striking out one committee and inserting another.

That is found decided in various places in the Journals of the House. A division of the question is not in order on a motion to commit with instructions, or on the different branches of instructions.—Journals, 1, 17, page 507; 1, 31, pages 1395, 1397; 1, 32, page 611.

And further on in the Manual it is stated that, "on a motion to commit, the whole question is open to debate," and therefore open to instructions and open to amendments.

The Chair thinks the House, having the power to commit a subject to a committee, has the power to instruct such committee how they shall proceed, and the Chair, if he had time, thinks he could show many instances of such action by the House.

The question as to the right to report at any time is a very different one, because the question of the right to report at any time changes the order of committee reports and interferes with the rights of committees in that respect. Therefore he held that the rule of the House which recognizes the order of reports from committees would be interfered with by permitting a special committee to report at any time, and such change of the rule would require a suspension of the

The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] that it is not within the power of the House to commit with instructions.

Mr. Banks. I ask for a vote of the House on that question.

The SPEAKER. That is the right of the gentleman from Massachusetts

Mr. BANKS. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit his appeal in writing.
Mr. COX. I move to lay that appeal upon the table.

Mr. BANKS. I beg your pardon; I have the floor and desire to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit his appeal in writing.

Mr. BANKS. The Clerk will take it down, that I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not often, and never with my own choice, I trouble the House on questions of this kind.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] has suggested certain

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] has suggested certain motives which are possible in reference to this matter. For myself, I have no personal motives. I object to this extension of the power of the committee, because it is an abuse of power for which no cause is assigned. Under this power, the committee, if it shall be appointed, can send all over the United States for information, and it can bring individual after individual here in troops, and when they are here monopolize the time and attention of the House. Everything connected with their presence and applications is a question of privilege, and if there is to be an end to this session to which the gentleman refers, the House may see the defeat of its appropriation bill and all the great, important matters connected with the presidential election. election.

It is upon this ground, first, that it is an abuse of power, absolute and unlimited, for which there is no cause assigned, and, then, that it may, in the natural course of things, take up the time of the House, which, at this stage of the session, is of absolute and, lasting importance to the House.

In reference to the suggestion of the Chair that it is competent for the House to commit a measure with instructions, I have this to say: that the instructions must relate to the bill or the question or the matter which is to be committed. No instructions are given to any committee except in reference to the bill or measure committed to it. If the Chair takes time to consider he will see the necessity of this interpretation of the rule, which requires the instructions to relate to the measure committed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will allow the Chair to direct his attention to Rule 47, which provides that "motions and reports may be committed at the pleasure of the House."

Mr. BANKS. I know it. I am perfectly familiar with that rule, that they may be committed at any time at the pleasure of the House, but they are committed under the rules of the House, and the rules of the House cannot be changed except by suspension of the rules.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Is this appeal debatable? If it is, I desire to reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from New York will have an opportunity to reply, no doubt.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Is the appeal debatable?
The SPEAKER. It is. The gentleman from Massachusetts is speaking in his right.

Mr. BANKS. The privilege of the House to commit reports or measures at any time is one that is known to every member of the House, and is never contested. If the House chooses to give instruc-tions as to the mode of committing the measures, it can do so; but those instructions always have reference to the matter committed. Now, this motion to confer authority, to send for persons and papers, has no reference to the matter committed. It affects the powers of the committee. It has no other object and effect than that. But those powers are established by the rules of the House, and cannot be changed at this time without unanimous consent.

I trust the Chair will not, under this construction of the rules of the House in regard to instructions that may be given to a committee, give the House at any time the power to confer upon committees, the right to send—to any extent, without any limit, for any purpose whatever—for persons and papers.

I now yield to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE, ] who desires to address the Chair on this question.

to address the Chair on this question.

Mr. HALE. I want to appeal to the gentleman from New York, if he will give me his attention for a moment—

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to suggest to the gentlemen that they speak to the question of appeal.

Mr. HALE. I will endeavor to do that. It is on this point of the extensive powers that are sought to be lodged in this committee that the point of order as I understand arises. Now the gentleman from New York should bear in mind that the origin of this matter was an inquiry of the President which the President has respectfully and the president

New York should bear in mind that the origin of this matter was an inquiry of the President, which the President has respectfully answered. He has held back nothing. He has sent in the message read, with all the accompanying documents, very voluminous; embracing many papers, many orders, many reports. Now is it a good thing to do if the gentleman wants more—

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Maine that that is not an argument upon the appeal. It is an argument upon the question of policy in passing the resolution.

Mr. HALE. I was about coming to this very point of the extended power. The gentleman from New York himself does not know—these documents are sealed; that is, they are closed up; they are sent in here in large boxes—he does not know but everything that he desires has been sent in here by the President of the United States until he has found on perusal as they are ordered to be printed, or may be that more is wanted from the Executive than he has sent. The gentleman, from his long experience, must know that it is hardly courteous to the head of the Executive branch of the Government to appoint a committee, giving it power to send for persons and papers, when everycommittee, giving it power to send for persons and papers, when everything has been answered. Would the gentleman go on and summon officers of the Army who have acted under the order of the President, who is the Commander-in-Chief? How does he know that he needs more information upon that than the papers themselves afford? Does the gentleman want to go on and insist upon this committee with these extra powers in this condition of affairs?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I only wish to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Maine. The gentleman from Maine is entirely accurate in his statement that we have a large quantity, I do not know how many, of sealed packages. We do not know what they contain; we do not know what they purport to be or will be upon examination, and we cannot tell whether it would be necessary for that committee to exercise and use the power which this resolution proposes to give them. That is quite true. But, sir, the gentlemen appeared to assume that it is the design of this committee to do something that will be offensive to the dignity of the President of the United States. I can assive to the dignity of the Fresident of the United States. I can assure those gentlemen that if that is their apprehension, so far as I am concerned, if I shall have the honor to be a member of that committee, I have no such intention. The Executive has been treated with the greatest respect by this House upon this whole question. We have not exercised what, in my judgment, was our just prerogative in calling the Executive to account for these alleged military interferences on the very first day of this session. But, sir, when a resolution of inquiry waterially not find at the prescript that resolution of inquiry, materially modified at the suggestion of these gentlemen, was adopted by the House the President waited forty days before he sent in a reply. And if we are forced at the end of the session to be crowded into a few days in which to investigate and report upon the most important question to-day before the American people, higher in my judgment than that which relates to the election of a temporary Executive for four years, the President and his friends here are responsible, and not myself and others on this side of the House.

We do not intend to commit any disrespect to the President or to any other person, but we do not want to be obstructed in a fair and full investigation, so that, if it be true that there has been any violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States in ordering troops into the Southern States to interfere with the election, to interfere with the organization of the State Legislatures, we may be enabled to place upon the archives of the Government our condemnation of those acts which are contrary to the theory and genius of our institutions. That is what I desire to do and what I think gentle-institutions. That is what I desire to do and what I think gentlemen on this side of the House desire to do.

Mr. HALE. It is not a question of what the committee want to do; that is not the point. It is the act of the House in appointing a special committee to inquire into this matter when the President has done all the House asked him to do.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. When the committee reports, if they perpetrate any wrong, it will be time enough for the gentleman to

Mr. WATTERSON. In continuation and explanation of the closing remarks made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Wood] and in response to those made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] and the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Hale,] I wish to say that, in the early part of the present session, when there was time for impeachment, the majority on this floor declined to institute so much as an inquiry looking to that end. They declined at the instance and request of those who are described by the republican journals as the confederate brigadiers. We did not doubt that the President was impeachable. But, as he had befriended us in time of need, we took that method of paying the debt. In other words, in his hour of need we simply declined to prosecute. I submit therefore that the refusal of his apologists and defenders to sanction a modest and proper search after that comes at this time in exceeding bad grace.

refusal of his apologists and defenders to sanction a modest and proper search after that comes at this time in exceeding bad grace.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire that the House shall wander from the question before it. It is not a question of public policy, nor is it a question of political propriety. The question before the House is simply this: an appeal is taken from the decision of the Chair, which is, that it is within the power of the House to instruct a committee in connection with a reference.

Mr. HURLBUT. O, no.

Mr. BANKS. I made no such question as that

Mr. BANKS. I made no such question as that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] questioned the right of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] to embrace in his resolution certain matters, which in the opinion of the Chair, are instructions from this House. This is a very simple matter. Rule 47 states that "Motions and reports may be committed at the pleasure of the House." Further, the Journals of the House, in at the pleasure of the House." Further, the Journals of the House, in almost every part of them, show a uniformity of decision that a motion to commit may be amended by the addition of instructions. In the Journals of the House of Representatives are to be found decisions to this effect; a division of the question is not in order on a motion to commit with instructions or on the different branches of the instructions. The Chair therefore entertains the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] not only as in order under Rule 47, but as in accordance with the uniform practice and decisions of the House. The question before the House is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of this House?

Mr. COX. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. BANKS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BANKS. I desire—

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. BANKS. I desire—

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. BANKS. I desire that the question shall be stated to the House, that I appeal from the decision of the Chair that the request for permission to send for persons and papers is in order at this time.

Mr. MILLS. I ask that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] shall reduce his appeal to writing, in order that we all may know what it is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will reduce

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will reduce his appeal to writing.

Mr. BANKS. I have done so. I appeal from the decision of the Chair just given, that the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] with the power included therein to send for persons and papers is in order at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did decide, and he again decides, that the propositions embraced in the resolution of the gentleman from New York are in the nature of instructions and are in order.

Mr. COX. Lwithdraw my motion to law the appeal upon the table.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my motion to lay the appeal upon the table for the purpose of saying one word.

Mr. PAGE. I object; that cannot be taken without the consent of the House.

Mr. FORT. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon that mo-

The SPEAKER. The call of the roll has not been begun, and the gentleman has the right to withdraw his motion.

gentleman has the right to withdraw his motion.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the motion to lay the appeal on the table. I merely wish to call the attention of the House to the importance of this power to send for persons and papers. Having been on a committee which had the power of investigation without the power to send for persons and papers, the committee were more or less embarassed in the discharge of their duties.

After looking over the authorities, my best impression is that any order of this House for investigation implies the right to send for persons and papers. I know it is customary to add to these resolutions the words "with power to send for persons and papers." But when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] and others make the point that it is indecent on the part of the Honse to question the Executive as to his military orders, or to inquire into their propriety priety— Mr. HOAR. O, no.

Or something to that effect.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman will pardon me. I stated that to approach such an inquiry without first making the request of him was very indecent.

Mr. COX. I think the indecency would come in when the inquiry Mr. COX. I think the indecency would come in when the inquiry was answered. But all I desire to say, before I renew the motion to lay this appeal on the table, is that the resolution of my colleague [Mr. Wood] (striking out of it the right for this committee to report at any time, which has been done) is in perfect order, and this House will do itself but justice as a parliamentary body by laying the appeal on the table. I now renew the motion to lay the appeal on the table. Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will allow me to say a word about this latter branch of discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has already spoken on the appeal. Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] I hope will withdraw his motion to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] asks consent of the House to be allowed to speak a second time on this appeal.

this appeal.

Mr. BANKS. I do not ask any such thing.
Mr. COX. I have no objection to withdrawing the motion.
Mr. BANKS. If the Chair decides that no member of this House shall speak a second time to any question, I have no objection to submitting equally with other members.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have read—
Mr. BANKS. I know the rule perfectly well. If it is to be enforced, let it be enforced upon others as well as upon me.

The SPEAKER. There is no occasion for any warmth about this matter. Mr. BANKS.

Mr. BANKS. Well, that depends. [Laughter.]
The SPEAKER. It will depend upon the gentleman himself and not upon the Chair. The Clerk will read Rule 2.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. He [the Speaker] shall preserve order and decorum; may speak to points of order in preference to other members, rising from his seat for that purpose; and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the House by any two members; on which appeal no member shall speak more than once, unless by leave of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, while obeying the rule, was desirous to give the gentleman the opportunity to speak twice.

Mr. BANKS. I do not wish to have that question put to the House. The SPEAKER. The action of the Chair was in the direction of extreme courtesy to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BANKS. If I have not the right to speak, I do not ask to have the privilege given to me by a vote of the House.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 146, nays 79, not voting 65: as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 25, 1877.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of an act (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D., 1877; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HOOKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?
Mr. HOOKER. For the purpose of making a personal explanation in reference to a vote given on yesterday in this House.
The SPEAKER. There being no objection the gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that when the vote was taken on the resolution offered by my honorable friend from New York [Mr. Wood] my name was called as I entered the Hall just as the list of members was about being finished, and I inadvertently cast my vote in the affirmative, forgetful of the fact that I had made arrangement with the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. MacDougall] to pair with him during yesterday on all political questions. I therefore ask unanimous consent of the House that my name may be withdrawn from the list in the affirmative, and I may be reported in the Record as saying, during the roll-call on that name may be withdrawn from the list in the affirmative, and I may be reported in the Record as saying, during the roll-call on that vote, that I had paired on that occasion with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MacDougall,] who would have voted in the negative, while I would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose, as it makes no difference in the result, the statement made by the gentleman puts him right upon the record, and that nothing further need be done. But it seems to me there is a constitutional difficulty in ever giving the consent of the House to do something that will amount to a change of the Journal which we are required to keep. That objection was sustained two or three Congresses ago in a like case. However, as the gentleman has made his statement which goes into the Record, perhaps nothing need further be done.

Mr. HOOKER. In all probability the gentleman from Massachu-Mr. HOOKER. In all probability the gentleman from Massachnsetts is right. My only desire was to correct the inadvertence into which I fell in voting yesterday so far as it could be done, and perhaps the explanation which I have already made is sufficient if the RECORD of to-day will show the fact just as I have stated it.

Mr. MacDOUGALL. The fact will be spread upon the record on the statement made by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi; and I have only to add that it is perfectly satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's statement of course will go into the RECORD. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts the Chair will state that the Constitution says the yeas and nays shall be entered on the Journal on the demand of one-fifth of those present.

Mr. HOAR. It is a constitutional direction to keep a journal. Now, if the Journal shall be permitted to assert what was not the fact of actual occurrences yesterday, by the withdrawal of the vote given by the gentleman from Mississippi, then we will not have a correct journal of yesterday's proceedings. The Journal will merely state what was desirable to have go upon the record, and not what actually occurred. ally occurred.

The SPEAKER. The Journal of to-day as read and approved is orrect as to the transactions of yesterday.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that unanimous consent is asked by the gentleman from Mississippi to withdraw from the Journal the record of a vote given yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts state that unanimous consent cannot be given for that purpose?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir; that is, I do not say unanimous consent cannot be given, but that it would be a violation of the sworn duty of the House to keep a journal of its proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the object of the gentleman from Mississippi has been reached, and that the point of honor which he has properly raised has been fully satisfied by the statement which he has made in the presence of the House.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I voted in the affirmative on the resolution submitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Wood,] but I am recorded as not voting. As it does not affect the result, I ask that my vote be recorded.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the gentleman's vote will be recorded in the Journal and in the RECORD in the affirmative.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MARY A. SECOR.

Mr. BLISS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4533) for the relief of Mary A. Secor, as executrix of Zeno Secor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ESTATE OF S. H. HILL.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4534) for the relief of the estate of S. H. Hill, of Columbus, Muskogee County, Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HARBOR OF REFUGE, OHIO RIVER.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to report upon the expediency and utility of constructing a harbor of refuge in the Ohio River in what is known as "Mill Bottom," above Newport, on the Kentucky shore, and opposite the city of Cincinnati.

WARREN MITCHELL.

Mr. MILLIKEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4535) for the relief of Warren Mitchell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered

CREEK ORPHAN FUND.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4536) to transfer to the Secretary of the Treasury all stocks and evidences of indebtedness due and held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior on account of the Creek orphan fund; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SPECIAL MESSENGER, FOLDING-ROOM.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, also, by unanimous consent, submitted a resolution to appoint a special messenger for the folding-room; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts.

ROBERT H. MILROY

Mr. HAYMOND, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 186) for the relief of Robert H. Milroy, late superintendent of Indian affairs of Washington Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

METRIC SYSTEM OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. O'BRIEN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to Congress as to the feasibility of providing by law that the system of weights and measures known as the metric system be exclusively used in the assessment of duties for the customs service of the United States, and also to indicate the earliest date from and after which such provision if considered by him feasible may in his opinion properly go into effect.

Mr. O'BRIEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. WHITING. I ask that the resolution of the Peoria Board of Trade, which I send to the desk, may be read and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was read, as follows:

The following resolution was this day adopted by the Peoria Board of Trade, with directions to be forwarded to you by telegraph:

*Resolved**, That the report of the joint committee recommending a plan for counting the electoral vote is a wise and just one, honorable to both parties, and that we as members of the principal commercial organization of Central Illinois heartly indorse the same, and respectfully request our Senators and Members in Congress to use all their influence for its adoption.

**SAMUEL WILKINSON.**

SAMUEL WILKINSON, Secretary Peoria Board of Trade.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

SAMUEL B. ROBERTSON.

Mr. ROBINSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4537) granting a pension to Samuel B. Robertson, late a second lieutenant in Company B, Seventieth Indiana Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS DILL.

Mr. ROBINSON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4538) granting a pension to Thomas Dill, late a private in Company B, One hundred and twenty-fourth Regiment Indiana Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SECTION 833 OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. DURHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4539) to amend section 883 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and ordered to be printed.

A. B. STEINBERGER.

Mr. FAULKNER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved. That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House all dispatches, letters, reports, and other papers not already communicated under a previous call, connected with the agency and residence of A. B. Steinberger in the Samoan Islands

Mr. FAULKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BLAND, by unanimous consent, leave was given to Mrs. Helia A. Cooksey, of Dent County, Missouri, to withdraw from the files of the House the discharge papers of the soldier Cooksey, her late husband.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GOODIN. I call for the regular order.
Mr. CONGER. I ask leave to withdraw the papers in the case of Augustus Sprague, being a soldier's discharge.
Mr. COX. I call for the regular order.

COUNTING OF THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. PAYNE addressed the Chair. The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio

Mr. PAYNE. I rise to ask unanimous consent that the House proceed to business on the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking there-from the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877, in order that it may be referred to the select committee on counting the electoral vote.

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, if he is ready, as probably the House is, to go on with this important matter, that, instead of taking up the Senate bill to be referred to the committee, he should ask to take up the Senate bill for action. I believe no change was made in the bill during its consideration by the Senate. If the gentleman accepts that suggestion, the bill may be taken up for consideration at once, and the gentleman will not have to assemble his committee in order to report it back to the House. If the gentleman makes that proposition I think there will be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that if the bill is referred, the committee having the right to report at any time, the Chair would feel bound to recognize the chairman of the committee whenever he desired to report it. Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly. But it would take some little time. The committee perhaps would have to meet, and there would be nothing gained by the reference. If the gentleman asks permission to take up the bill and bring it before the House for consideration at once I believe there will be no objection. I suppose the gentleman wants to get it before the House,

Mr. McCRARY rose,

Mr. PAYNE. If referred, the committee will instantly report the bill back to the House.

Mr. McCRARY. I rose for the purpose of making that statement.

Mr. McCkary. I rose for the purpose of making that statement.
Mr. HALE. Suppose something else should intervene?
Mr. PAYNE. It will be reported back instantly.
Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I hope that will not be done, but that the Honse will proceed with the regular order, which is the consideration of the report of the committee on the powers, privileges, and duties of the House in regard to counting the electoral vote.

The SPEAKER. That is the regular order; but it is competent for the House by a majority to postpone it.

for the House by a majority to postpone it.

Mr. CONGER. Before giving consent to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PAYNE,] the chairman of the committee, I would like to inquire what course he proposes in regard to the dis-

Mr. COX. What is the point of order?

The SPEAKER. There is no point of order. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] asks unanimous consent to take the Senate bill from the Speaker's table for reference.

Mr. COX. Is there any objection to that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] rose to suggest another mode of reaching the same object.

Mr. HALE. My object was to hasten the consideration of the

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] now seems to object. The Chair would like to know whether he does or

Mr. LAWRENCE. If I can have an opportunity to speak to the bill when reported I am perfectly willing—
Mr. COX. I object to debate. If unanimous consent is not now given, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] can move at the end of the morning hour to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PAYNE,] recognized as having charge of the bill, desires that the manner of treatment he has indicated shall be adopted, and the Chair is asking unanimous consent for that nursose.

inous consent for that purpose.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Ohio is now asking leave to make a speech upon this subject.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I hope the question asked of the chairman of the committee by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Conger] may be answered, because there are a great many members who desire to speak upon this question, and they will be ready to facilitate the action of the committee in hastening this matter, if in so facilitating it it does not cut them off from an opportunity of being heard. I hope the chairman will answer the question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] will explain the course he proposes to adopt in regard to this bill, and as to the time to be consumed in its consideration. How long a time does he propose to allow for debate on the bill?

Mr. CONGER. I have already requested him to state that.

Mr. KASSON. And he is waiting to tell you, but you will give him no chance.

Mr. GARFIELD. It occurs to me that if the House will hear my colleague from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] we shall all be satisfied.

Mr. PAYNE. I shall be very glad to explain to the House the course that the committee propose to adopt in reference to the disposition of this bill. There are two courses which have suggested themselves to the mind of the committee. If it is the general sentiment of the House that the bill shall be put upon its passage to-day, or at once on its reading, the committee will eneerfully waive their right to discuss it in deference to the wish of the House, but otherwise it is proposed that the discussion of this bill shall commence immediately and continue until two o'clock to-morrow, at which time we propose to ask the previous question on the passage of the bill; and in the mean time it is proposed that the debate shall be continued during this evening until as late an hour as is agreeable to the House, and that then a recess shall be taken until eleven o'clock to-morrow and the discussion to continue until two o'clock in the afternoon, after the discussion to continue until two o'clock in the afternoon, after the discussion to continue until two o'clock in the afternoon, after which time they will call for a final vote on the bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. When does the gentleman propose to demand the previous question, so that the House may pass upon the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. To-morrow at two o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will repeat the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PAYNE,] which is that if the House consents that this bill shall be taken up immediately it shall be discussed during this morning's session and the House shall then take a recess and continue the discussion during the evening session until such hour as the House may see fit, and then that there shall be a further recess until to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock, and that it is his purpose to call the previous question to-morrow at two o'clock.

recess until to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock, and that it is his purpose to call the previous question to-morrow at two o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire, with my colleague's permission, to make a suggestion to him. I am sure, so far as I know, that every member of this House will give due diligence to prosecuting this matter without anything like undue delay or factious opposition. But I do suggest that a longer time than two o'clock to-morrow ought to be granted. granted.

If the debate is carried on until to morrow night so that we may have a vote on it before the legislative day closes to-morrow, certainly nothing can be lost. I think my colleague will find that a large number of gentlemen who desire to be heard will be thus accommodated who could not be heard at all if the debate were to close at two o'clock. The difference between two o'clock and any other hour of the same day can be but slight in its bearing on the public interest, and I trust my colleague will make it a later time with the general agreement that we shall come to a vote before we adjourn to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. I did not understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Paywell to state that as a part of his proposition it should now be PAYNE] to state that as a part of his proposition it should now be fixed that the previous question should be ordered at two o'clock.

He only indicated his intention to ask it at that time.

Mr. PAYNE. At two o'clock I will endeavor to be recognized by the Chair to move the previous question.

Mr. HALE. Then I think if that is the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio the suggestion of his colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] should be regarded, and that if by devoting all of to-day and this evening and to morrow and to morrow evening, sitting late as the Senate did—if by that time we can get a vote, the gentleman ought to assent to it. by that time we can get a vote, the gentieman ought to assent to it. There would be no factious opposition made to this bill. Some of us are opposed to the bill and desire to state the reasons; still we see the importance of its being acted on at once, and the suggestion which I made, if the Chair pleases, a moment ago, was in the interest of accelerating action upon the bill and not of delaying it.

The SPEAKER. The Chairso understood.

Mr. HALE. If there is objection to this proposition, cannot the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] report the bill of the House committee at once so that a single objection cannot ston the discussion.

mittee at once, so that a single objection cannot stop the discussion of it?

The SPEAKER. A single objection could not prevent that; but the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Hale] will recognize the fact that if the committee report their bill it would not be the bill upon which the House desires to act now.

Mr. HALE. I see the advantage of getting the Senate bill before the House at once.

The SPEAKER. The bill upon which the House desires to act is The SPEAKER. The bill upon which the House desires to act is the Senate bill. The Chair can suggest another mode by which by a postponement of a single hour the object will be accomplished of reaching the bill. The Chair would state that the unfinished business of yesterday comes up this morning and can by a majority vote be postponed to a day certain. The effect of that would be to reach a morning hour by any member calling for the regular order. After that morning hour had expired, then it would be in order for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] to move to go to the Speaker's table and reach this bill. The plan which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] suggested now practically secures one hour longer debate on

Mr. HOLMAN. Has there been any objection made to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PAYNE?]

Mr. CONGER. I myself made the first proposition to arrest action on this matter, not that I desired to object at all to the immediate action of the House, for I did not, but I did wish to know what course in regard to debate should be adopted before giving consent.

The SPEAKER. It is a very proper inquiry.

Mr. CONGER. I would like, in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PAYNE,] who has charge of the bill, that he would indicate the time which would be given to the opponents of the bill, if there be any.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to so regulate it that members shall speak first one on one side and then one on the other, and will conform to that rule.

Mr. HUNTON. My understanding was it was the desire of the committee that there should be no debate upon this bill, but that the House should proceed at once to vote upon it. But in deference House should proceed at once to vote upon it. But in deference to the opinions of some gentlemen here who desire to debate it, they decided, as I understand, that the debate may run until to-morrow at two o'clock, and the time between now and to-morrow at two o'clock may be made longer or shorter for debate as the House may determine by the length of its sessions or may agree to hold a session before twelve o'clock to-morrow. But I trust the committee will not recede from the conclusion at which they arrived, that the gentleman having charge of the bill shall call the previous question to-morrow at two o'clock. morrow at two o'clock.

Mr. FRYE. I rise to a parliamentary question, and that is whether or not it is in the power of the House now to determine that the last two hours of the debate prior to two o'clock to-morrow, when the previous question is called, shall be in ten-minute or five-minute sent to do it.

Mr. FRYE. I would like an arrangement of that kind, because there are many gentlemen on the floor who do not propose to make extended speeches, but who desire very much to give a reason for their vote. Now, if we devote two hours to ten-minute and fiveminute speeches many gentlemen will have an opportunity to give a reason for their vote and thus explain to their constituents their

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the House that more than fifty members have indicated to him a desire to speak on this question, so that the Chair thinks that two hours as suggested by the gentleman from Maine would not be a sufficient time, and would suggest to him to make it four hours.

Mr. FRYE. There are gentlemen too modest to indicate to the Speaker a desire to speak and yet who wish to explain their votes. I now ask unanimous consent that the last four hours of the debate shall be limited to ten-minute speeches.

Mr. PAYNE. I will agree to that.

Mr. WADDELL. In accordance with the suggestion made by the chairman of the committee, as I understand with the consent of the committee, and in order to test the sense of the House as to whether it is the desire of the House to have any discussion of this question, I move, if it be in order, that, when the bill is reported for the consideration of the House, gentlemen desiring to make speeches on the bill shall have leave to print them in the RECORD and that the House

mr. CONGER. I object.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] objects. The magnitude of this bill in its effects cannot well be overstated, and the Chair hopes that order will be preserved in the House so that gentlemen may understand all that is being done.

Mr. PAYNE. I am willing, under the authority of the committee, to modify my proposition to this extent: that the debate shall now proceed as indicated in my remarks a few minutes ago, and that the last three hours of the debate, or if more agreeable to the House, all of the debate to-morrow, (and the House can meet at ten o'clock instead of eleven o'clock, as I first suggested,) shall be devoted to tenminutes speeches, with permission to every member who desires to do so to have printed in the RECORD such remarks upon this subject as he may desire. I cannot consent, however, to a later hour for calling the previous question, unless, perhaps, I say three o'clock instead of two o'clock. [Cries of "Three o'clock" and "Two o'clock."] I think I am authorized by a majority of the committee to say that the previous question will be called at three o'clock to-morrow. I hope that will be satisfactory to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House what he understands to be the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PAYNE.] It is that the bill from the Senate be now taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the select committee of which the gentleman from Ohio is chairman; that the debate upon the bill when reported shall continue until three o'clock to-morrow, at which time the gentleman will call the previous question upon the bill; that the last four hours of the debate before calling the previous question shall be confined to speeches of not more than ten minutes each, and that any member of the House who may desire to have printed in the RECORD his remarks upon this bill shall have that permission. Is there objection to that proposition? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

The bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877, was then taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the select committee upon that subject.

Mr. PAYNE. The select committee on counting the electoral vote, to which was just referred Senate bill No. 1153 upon that subject, have instructed me to report the same back and to recommend its

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock p. m. on the first Thursday in February, A. D. 1877; and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer. Two tellers shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers, having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and, the votes having been ascertained and counted as in this act provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses. Upon such reading of any such certificate or paper when there shall be only one return from a State, the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall state of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all objections so made to any vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and such objections of the question s

During the session of each House on the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, 1877, each House shall, by viva voce vote, appoint five of its members, who, with the five associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to be ascertained as hereinafter provided, shall constitute a commission for the decision of all questions upon or in respect of such double returns named in this sec-order.

SEC. 4. That when the two Houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or upon objection to a report of said commission, or other question arising under this act, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question ten minutes, and not oftener than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours, it shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without further debate.

hours, it shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without further debate.

SEC. 5. That at such joint meeting of the two Houses seats shall be provided as follows: For the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, immediately upon his left; the Senators in the body of the Hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall not provided for the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon each side of the Speaker's platform. Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the count of electoral votes shall be completed and the result declared; and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes, or otherwise under this act; in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess of such House not beyond the next day, Sunday secepted, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoom. And while any question is being considered by said commission, either House may proceed with its legislative or other business.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be held to impair or affect any right now existing under the Constitution and laws to question, by proceeding in the judicial courts of the United States, the right or title of the person who shall be declared elected or who shall claim to be President or Vice-President of the United States, if any such right exists.

SEC. 7. The said commission shall make its own rules, keep a record of its proceedings, and shall have power to employ such persons as may be necessary for the transaction of its business and the execution of its powers.

Mr. PAYNE. I now enter a motion to recommit this bill, in order

Mr. PAYNE. I now enter a motion to recommit this bill, in order that that motion may be pending. I will merely state to the House that this bill as it comes from the Senate is precisely the same as the bill reported to the House by the select committee, so that members who have not yet considered this bill in print, may do so by referring to the House bill.

I do not myself propose to occupy any part of the hour to which I may be entitled for the purpose of opening the debate upon this bill. Whatever I may have to say, if there be any occasion for me to say anything, I will reserve until the closing hour to which I will be entitled. The members of the committee of course will each be entitled to their hour under the rule. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCrary] who first introduced into this House the substance of the proposition contained in this bill will open the discussion.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has made a motion which was not in contemplation when the unanimous consent was given; I refer to the motion to recommit, the effect of which is to cut off all opportunity to offer amendments to this bill. I submit to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Payne] that it was not in contemplation of the House, or of the Speaker when he submitted the proposition to the House, that the motion to recommit should now be entered.

that the motion to recommit should now be entered.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman make a point of order against that motion? I will state frankly that my purpose in entering the motion to recommit is to cut off amendments. Unless compelled by order of the House to do so I do not propose to admit any amendment to this bill.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that that is not in order under the unanimous consent given by the House, which left this bill open to amendment or suggestions of amendment. It is not in order to make a motion now which places the bill in a different condition from what it occupied under the order of the House. It is not fair to the members of the House, it is unexpected, and in my judgment it is not the proper course to pursue.

Mr. PAYNE. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Mc-

CRARY.]
Mr. CONGER. My point of order is that the distinct course of proceeding upon this bill, even to the minutiae of the order of debate, was agreed upon by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to my friend from Michigau, [Mr.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the gentleman will allow me to finish my point.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly; I beg pardon of the gentleman for interrupting him, I thought he had stated his point.

Mr. CONGER. My point is that the mode of proceeding by the House, even to the minutiæ of limiting the time of debate and fixing the time when the call for the previous question should be made, was all submitted to this House and determined by unanimous consent. The motion now made to take away rights which were left to members under that unanimous consent, by the motion to recommit, which is a motion to cut off rights which we possessed under that unanimous consent, is not in order. That is my proposition.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the Chair and to my friend from Michigan that every experienced parliamentarian must of course have

Michigan that every experienced parliamentarian must of course have understood, when this unanimous consent was granted, that the gentleman having the bill in charge would enter this motion to recommit; but if any gentleman did not so understand, and if the arrangemit; but if any gentleman did not so understand, and if the arrangement entered into by unanimous consent was an arrangement of all the minutiæ of proceeding, if it cut off a motion to recommit on the part of the majority, it would equally bind the honor of every gentleman in the House not to move an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoan] is correct. The motion made by the gentleman from Ohio was not necessary at all. The control of the bill was in his hands under the rules, and it would not be compared to for any gentleman during the disension contrary to be competent for any gentleman during the discussion, contrary to the wish of the House, to offer amendments. If any gentleman desires to offer amendments, the House can give its consent by voting down the previous question when called, and thus throw the bill open to amendment.

Mr. CONGER. This, then, is one of those cases which frequently

Mr. CONGER. This, then, is one of those cases which frequently happen when by waiving a right for the purpose of conciliating and accommodating gentlemen we lose it entirely.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman lost no right. He had not the right to amend if the gentleman having charge of the bill called the previous question. The House, if it desires to have the bill amended, can vote down the previous question. If the previous question is sustained, then of course the House expresses its wish against any amendment being offered. That is the usual practice.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair will recollect that all the power gentlemen had was to object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Whatever that power might have availed, every gentleman on this floor had.

The SPEAKER. If the House were forced to vote on amendments, the gentleman in charge of the bill could of course call the previous question, the effect of which would be to cut off all debate. The effect question, the effect of which would be to cut off all debate. The effect of the understanding reached is to give greater latitude to debate. The bill is now before the House for consideration, and is not open to amendment. The House, if it desires to entertain amendments, can vote down the previous question. The Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from Ohio was not necessary; that it does not change the position of the bill.

Mr. McCRARY. Mr. Speaker, the duty and the privilege of opening this important discussion have been devolved upon me by the kindness of the chairman of the committee and the other gentlemen upon ness of the chairman of the committee and the other gentlemen upon it, for which I return them my thanks. As a result of very careful, very earnest, and I may add very anxious consideration of this great and important question, I, in common with the other members of the committee, have reached the conclusion that this bill ought to pass. It is not necessary for me to remind the House of that fact of which every gentleman is so painfully conscious that we are in the presence of a very great and very dangerous emergency. It is that crisis in our national affairs which the fathers of the Republic foresaw in 1800, and which at various periods in the course of our history the great statesmen of this country have foreseen and have dreaded. We have on several occasions in our history reached a point where the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States were to be counted, when disputes existed as to the legality of some of those votes; but we have never until now met the occasion when the disputed votes were decisive of the result.

In all the instances in our history when disputes of this character In all the instances in our history when disputes of this character have arisen, statesmen have commented upon the danger which would threaten the very existence of the Government, if a case should arise in which the election would turn upon the disputed votes in the absence of any provision by legislation for settling such disputes. If gentlemen will look into the debates which have occurred from time to time in the course of our history, which have been engaged in by nearly all the great men of the past and many of the great men of the present, they will find that this has long been regarded as one of great danger, rising above every other and liable at the end of any four years to involve us in conflicts for the settlement of which peaceful methods would be wholly inadequate. If the statesmanship of to-day shall, as I hope and believe it will, prove itself equal to the to-day shall, as I hope and believe it will, prove itself equal to the emergency so long predicted, so much dreaded, and meet it by a peaceful and lawful solution, all good men will rejoice, and faith in the stability of our free institutions and in the continued peace, progress, and prosperity of our beloved country will be made firm and

We are confronted not only with a great and wide-spread difference We are confronted not only with a great and wide-spread difference of opinion in this country upon the merits of the questions that have arisen, but we are confronted also with that which is a thousand-fold more perilous, namely, with the fact that the American people, the American statesmen, the American lawyers and jurists are almost equally divided not only, I say, as to the merits of the question but as to the authority that shall decide them. That, Mr. Speaker, I say is the occasion of the alarm, of the anxiety which pervades the public mind from one end of this land to the other. There would be no danger to our institutions, there would be no occasion for alarm, there would be no real peril in consequence of the great diversity of opinwould be no real peril in consequence of the great diversity of opinion as to the merits of this controversy if it were not for the fact that we are divided as to the authority that shall decide.

Now I submit that that statesman is false to his duty, that that man does not come up to the exigency of this great occasion, who will stop short of the most earnest endeavors to provide some lawful mode for does not come up to the exigency of this great occasion, who will stop short of the most earnest endeavors to provide some lawful mode for the decisions of these questions by a tribunal whose authority nobody can question and in whose decision all men will acquiesce.

Sir, there could be no greater danger than that which grows out of a fact like this. On one side of the question there are some 20,000,000 people who honestly believe that Governor Hayes has been fairly elected President of the United States and who honestly believe (at least the greater part of them) that in the absence of any legislation upon the subject it is the duty of the President of the Senate to count these votes and that in order to count these votes, and that in order to count them he must decide what are these votes, and that in order to count them he must decide what are votes. They are honest, they are sincere, they are earnest in this belief and in this position. On the other side, sir, we are bound to concede the fact that there are some 20,000,000 people who as honestly believe that Governor Tilden has been elected, that the President of the Senate has no authority in the premises in the absence of legislation, and that no vote can be counted unless with the consent of both Houses of Congress. These are the differences of opinion.

It is not my purpose to day, Mr. Speaker, to enter into discussion as to who is right and who is wrong. It is idle to suppose that either side can convince the other. I say, sir, that, if we fail to pass this bill and no tribunal is provided which we shall all agree is competent to decide these questions, we shall drift upon a rock upon which the to decide these questions, we shall drift upon a rock upon which the ship of state may be broken to pieces.

It may be, sir, that, in the absence of any law and in the presence of this great wide-spread difference of opinion, in the presence of this known difference of opinion as to the authority which shall decide these questions—it may be, if this bill is defeated and the two Houses fail to present the wholes the state of these difference of the wholes the state of t these questions—it may be, it this bill is deteated and the two Houses fail to pass any other measure on the subject, one or the other of these two parties will peaceably submit to the other. I hope, I earnestly pray, sir, that if we should meet that exigency one or the other party would submit, but I confess to very grave doubts and grave fears such would not be the case. And I would ask gentlemen on the one side or the other, who think their position is impregnable and the other side must submit, to consider whether it is probable in such an analysis of a dual Presidency and the possibility of civil emergency we can avoid a dual Presidency and the possibility of civil commotion and civil war.

I have said that upon this question as to the authority that shall decide upon these disputed votes there is a wide-spread, honest difference of opinion. I do not, as I have already said, propose to discuss the merits of this controversy upon the question who shall decide upon disputed votes. What I desire to do is to impress upon the House this one fact, that there is an irreconcilable difference as to the true interpretation of the Constitution which can be settled and adjusted only by legislation.

Now, to show that, let me call the attention of the House to some of the authorities on the one side and upon the other of this question. Those who claim that the President of the Senate has the absolute right to count these votes in the absence of legislation are sustained by very high authority, and I wish to refer to some of them, not to indorse or to argue whether they are sound or unsound, but to show how idle it is to expect those who hold that view, in the absence of legislation, to give up that position and agree to the inauguration of a person who is declared President without the consent and against the decision of that officer.

In the debates in Congress from time to time, this question has been discussed. In the debate in 1857 there was some discussion of it; and while I am not able in the time I shall occupy to refer to all that was said on one side or the other, I have made a few selections to which I will call the attention of the House.

Senator Thompson, of Kentucky, speaking in the Senate of the United States on the 12th of February, 1857, used this language, addressing the President of the Senate:

As the presiding officer of the Senate, the direction of the Constitution is that you, sir, shall open and count the votes—that is your duty—before the Senate, and the members of the House of Representatives are to be present as witnesses. In the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution, what could have been meant by this? The idea was that we were not to go into executive session, nor, by some secret cabal or clandestine arrangement, get together here and have a coup d'état, and make a President. But the contemplation of the Constitution was that the House of Representatives were to be present as witnesses, to see that the count was fair; that the Senate were to regulate the mode of counting, and that we should not have a secret session and exclude the other House.

In the same debate, Mr. Stuart, a Senator from the State of Michigan, a very able and distinguished lawyer, made use of this language:

My view was and is that the duty of counting the votes devolves upon the President of the Senate, and nobody else.

Mr. Shellabarger, of Ohio, who is known to this House and to the whole country as one of the ablest lawyers of the country, delivered a very able and exhaustive argument in 1869 on the same side of the question, but I will not stop to quote from that.

Senator BAYARD, of Delaware, in a debate which occurred in the first session of this Congress, expressed his view in these words.

After quoting the clause of the Constitution in question, he said:

This latter clause contains all the power that is delegated to the two Houses of Congress or to any other officer of the Government in respect to the counting of the electoral vote; and the present bill provides simply the legislative machinery to accomplish this result. There has been argument heretofore before Congress, which I have concurred in, to the effect that the two Houses are mere witnesses to the counting of these votes. The only officer named is the presiding officer of the Senate into whose custody the certificates shall have been delivered in accordance with the mandate of the Constitution by the electors or their agents, their messengers, and those certificates being in his hands are to be opened by him and the votes are then to be counted; by whom is simply a matter of inference, perhaps of necessary inference; but they are to be counted.

Senator Whyte, of Maryland, expressed his views very decidedly on the same side of the question in the course of the same debate.

I do hold that the Vice-President of the United States is the proper person to state which vote shall be counted, because the Constitution has put it in his hands. I do say that, probably, except for the military interference, there never would have been any question as to what was the right return or the proper exhibit of the popular will in any of the States of this Union. Our fathers lodged the power with the people, in their Legislatures, in their States, to regulate the election of electors, and only left it to Congress to enunciate the voice of the people, the result of the action of the people in the several States. The Constitution puts the power in the President of the Senate in plain and unmistakable words.

Senator Stevenson, of Kentucky, in the same debate expressed his deliberate opinion in these words:

I am aware, Mr. President, of the difficulty involved in the solution of this question, nor do I undervalue its magnitude. I have given to its consideration the time and reflection which its importance demands. I have sought light in the ways of our fathers in the early Congresses. I have listened with great interest to the very able discussion which the subject has evoked in the Senate; and I frankly confess, sir, I have been unable to reach the conclusion that any of the legislation proposed by the pending amendments is sanctioned by the Constitution.

I concur in the able argument of the Senate of the United States is the only agency selected by the framers of the Constitution and named in that instrument as invested with the sole power of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President as returned by the electoral colleges and of declaring the result of that election.

These views, Mr. Speaker, are also sustained, as every gentleman knows, by the opinion of Chancellor Kent, whose statement is as

The President of the Senate, on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, in the presence of both Houses of Congress, opens all the certificates, and the votes are then to be counted. The Constitution does not express by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes and a closely contested election this power may be important; and I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the Houses are present only as spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it may be said, as it has been said by a great many people who agree with me in their political opinions, that these authorities are conclusive; that there can be no doubt, after such ex-pressions as these, as to the right of the Vice-President to decide these questions and declare the result, and that all citizens should at once submit to these views. But, sir, gentlemen who say that have looked at but one side of the question; for the opinions on the other side are equally potential and equally numerous. Let me call the attention of the House to a few of them. In the debate of 1857 the venerable John J. Crittenden, of Kentucky, took an active part. That was a dispute over the vote of the State of Wisconsin, which had been cast, not upon the day fixed by the Constitution, but on a later day. Mr. Crittenden offered in the Senate of the United States the following resolution, which expressed his idea as to the power of the Vice-President and the power of the two Houses:

Resolved. That the vote of Wisconsin, being given on a day different from that prescribed by 'aw, ought not to have been included in the count of the electoral vote, and that any member of either the Senate or House of Representatives had the privilege and right to object to the counting of said vote, and that it was competent for the Senate and House of Representatives alone to decide upon that objection.

Mr. Pugh, of Ohio, then a leading member of the Senate, expressed his views in these words:

The presiding officer of this bedy may be the Vice-President of the United States, and may claim to be the President-elect, and he is to stand there, in the presence of both Houses of Congress, and reject votes or admit votes by his single will, and thus make or unmake himself President. It is a power higher than the veto. I am bound to say, under my construction of the Constitution of the United States, no such power is lodged in any individual, whatever may be his station.

In the course of the debate in 1869, which grew out of the trouble over the vote of Georgia, Mr. Colfax, of Indiana, then Speaker of the Honse of Representatives and subsequently Vice-President of the United States, made these remarks:

I remember the scene well which took place in the old Hall, but I will not take up the time of the House by describing it. Subsequently, in 1865, in consequence of the troublous condition of the country and the disorganized condition of many of the States, and in order that there might be no difficulty in reference to counting the votes, it was decided to adopt this joint rule, which declares that, whenever the vote of any State is objected to by any person, the two branches should retire, each to its own Chamber, there to decide upon the question. That rule gave Congress the power which it has this day exercised. I believe it to be constitutional and wise.

He referred in these remarks to the now famous twenty-second joint rule, which certainly was not consistent with the doctrine that the Constitution vests in the President of the Senate independently of Congress the right to count or reject votes.

Mr. Schenck, of Ohio, in the course of the same debate, speaking on this very point, said:

I hold that it is a casus omissus in the Constitution; that the Constitution requires not that the President of the Senate shall count the votes at all. There is no such declaration in the Constitution; but it declares that he shall open the certificates and that the votes shall be counted.

Mr. BOUTWELL, of Massachusetts, in the course of the debate in the Senate at the last session, used this language:

I do not accept at all the suggestion that the Vice-President of the United States has anything more to do in the business of counting the votes for President and Vice-President than that specific duty which is prescribed for and enjoined upon him by the Constitution. That duty is, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, to open the certificates. There being no other duty assigned to him, I infer naturally that he is to do nothing more.

I quote now from what was said by Mr. THURMAN, of Ohio, in the same debate, in answer to a question by Senator Eaton, of Connecticut:

Mr. EATON. I did not suppose myself that the Vice-President counted the votes

Mr. Thurman. That was exactly the conclusion I would have come to, that the counting is not by the Vice-President, and these facts show that it never could have been contemplated that he should be the judge of the election. What his duty is, is prescribed in the Constitution.

Senator Christiancy, of Michigan, in the course of the same de-bate, expressed his view of the subject in these words, after quoting the clause of the Constitution:

It does not say by whom the votes shall be counted; and as it does expressly provide that the President of the Senate shall open all the certificates, and then immediately declares that "the votes shall then be counted," without saying by whom, there is, as it seems to me, a fair though not conclusive inference that it is not made the duty of the President of the Senate to count them, because, if this had been intended, the language in that connection would naturally have been, as already suggested by several Senators, "the President of the Senate * * * shall open all the certificates and count the votes."

Senator Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, expressed the same opinion in these words:

I was somewhat impressed by the argument made by the Senator from Maryland Mr. Whytel for the purpose of showing that the Constitution contemplated that the vote should be counted by the President of the Senate; but I am satisfied, on reviewing that subject, that my first impressions were correct, and that the Constitution does not contemplate that the President of the Senate should count the vote. The fact that the Constitution does in terms provide what duty the President of the Senate is to perform, to wit, that he is to open all the certificates, and omits to provide that he shall count the vote, I think is conclusive that it was not intended that he should do more than he is expressly authorized to do by the Constitution.

Senator Dawes, of Massachusetts, expressed the same opinion. He

I think that the Constitution means that they shall be counted by the two Houses. I cannot quite agree with the Senator from Maryland, that they are to be counted by the President of the Senate for the reason that the framers of the Constitution kept in their mind, when they prepared for the election of President, the States. They provided, as I have said, that the States should appoint the electors, that the college of electors should in the first instance choose the President, and the Vice-President; they provided that, if the college of electors shall fail to do their duty, then the States in the House of Representatives, as States, shall elect the President, and the States as represented in the Senate shall elect the Vice-President. They have kept up the idea of the States all through, until, as they supposed, they had secured beyond peradventure the election of a President.

I am not discussing the question whether we can now in this day afford to stand upon the ground of the States as against the people in the popular branch. I am one of those who believe in State rights, and I am one of these who, so far as State rights are defined in the Constitution, are for preserving them with sacred care, and I shall stand up for them. More than any other feature of this whole Constitution this idea is prominent, running from the time when the States reserved to themselves the power in such manner as they pleased of appointing the electoral college to the time when, if the electoral college fail to make that choice, they devolved it upon the States in the House of Representatives to choose the President, and upon the States in the Senate to choose the Vice-President. I infer, therefore, that, if these two bodies are there for any purpose whatever, they are first there to aid in the counting of the votes; and the question is whether they are there as one body or as two.

These quotations might be greatly extended did time permit or the occasion require it. I have quoted nothing from any of the very numerous and very able arguments and opinions on both sides of the question which have appeared since the late election. I have quoted only the utterances of statesmen and lawyers made under circumstances which render it certain that they spoke without bias. I have reason to know that many people in the country have read in partisan news-papers the utterances of these and other men on one side of this ques-tion, and have straightway decided that there is no other side. But the situation is too grave and the subject too important to be decided by any member of this House upon any such ex parte examination of it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that neither the two Houses nor the two parties behind them can agree as to the manner of settling these questions, I submit to the House whether it would be wise, thing these questions, I submit to the House whether it would be wise, whether it would be patriotic to refuse to adopt a proposition which all men must agree is fair and just by which these questions may be settled by a tribunal in whose decision all men of all parties will acquiesce? Would it be wise to decline such a proposition and drift on to the 14th of February and the 4th of March with these conflicting opinions dividing the two Houses, dividing the people, and take the chances of a dual government with all its evils, or of one side or the other peaceably acquiescing in the views and opinions of its opponents.

other peaceably acquiescing in the views and opinions of its opponents. But, sir, there is another question upon which there is and can be no agreement. There is a class of gentlemen in this House and in the country who assume that a single House of Congress has the right, under the Constitution, to exclude the vote of a State for any reason which may seem to it sufficient, whether technical or substantial. I submit to gentlemen who hold that view that they cannot expect the country to acquiesce in it, or to acquiesce in any declaration of the result of this presidential election that might result from it, and I beg to call their attention to some of the opinions of the great men of this country upon that question, and upon this point I shall be very brief. In the Senate of the United States, on the 18th of January last, Senator Bayard, of Delaware, used these words:

I will only say now in response to the Senator from Indiana that I do regard the

I will only say now in response to the Senator from Indiana that I do regard the present power which has been assumed by the action of Congress over this subject as utterly unwarranted by the Constitution. Virtually as we are now acting under this joint rule and as Congress has acted for the last ten years, a veto founded in nothing but caprice is vested in the Senate or vested in the House, to defeat the result of the popular vote for President and Vice-President. Such has been the state of affairs under which the people of this country have lived for eleven years, and it is in the power of the Senate or of the House under the assumptions of this rule to throw the election into the House by refusing to have the votes counted for any pretext whatever. Such a state of things is simply monstrous; such a state of things has been monstrous all the time it has continued.

Senator Maxey, of Texas, spoke in terms scarcely less emphatic. He said:

Now, in so far as the question as to the joint rules, with the exception of the twenty-second, is concerned, I have not one word to say. In so far as this twenty-second joint rule is concerned I have sufficient knowledge from this debate for myself to say that there may be a dangerous power to the existence of this Union by granting to one or the other of these two Houses the power to destroy the political interests and the elective franchise of an entire State, and not only of one, but of

So far as I am concerned personally, it is a question above and beyond all political parties. It is a question that involves the very integrity of the Union, for here is a function which may confer unjustly and improperly the power to strike down the power in the electoral college of a State or of many States; and what may be of value temporarily for one party may be destructive to the entire country.

Senator Whyte, of Maryland, expressed the same views in language quite as clear. He said:

It was wise at the beginning of this session of Congress that the Senate of the United States should undertake the work of reform and annikilate a joint rule which was not intelligently discussed at all or its defects properly pointed out. It passed through the Rotunda to the other side of the Capitol, and there at a night session, without debate, under a suspension of the rules, a rule of such a grave character as that received the votes of a majority of the Representatives of the people. That rule put it in the power of either House of Congress to defeat the will of the people expressed at the preceding presidential election. It was extraordinary in its character, and I was glad to see the Senate of the United States so soon repudiate it.

The result of this debate in the Senate of the United States when no man could say that a decision one way or the other would favor either party, was summed up by Senator RANDOLPH, of New Jersey, in these words:

Debate has elicited these facts: That as to this important subject there is a vital omission in the organic law; that for many years there has been in force as a remedy for the defect a joint rule of Congress. That rule, now abrogated, is admitted on all sides to have been inquitous in conception, dangerous in execution, and constitutionally without warrant. With its paternity denied by all, and its abrogation delayed by none, it seems to have been a political bastard whose usefulness was contingent upon a partisan emergency and whose life closed with the first dawn of pure public sentiment.

And I may say in one word that in the whole course of that debate there was not one man upon the floor of the United States Senate who disputed the proposition that the twenty-second joint rule, if construed to authorize one House to throw out the vote of a State admitted to be a State in the Union, was utterly in violation of the Constitution of the United States

As early as 1821, in the course of a debate in the House upon the right of Missouri to vote for President and Vice-President, John Randolph, of Virginia, denounced the doctrine to which I refer in words of fiery eloquence. As reported in the debates of that day-

Mr. Randolph argued that to reject the vote of Missouri, was not in the power of the House, as Missouri was a State in the Union. He also went back to first principles. The electoral colleges are as independent of this House as this House is of them. "Your office," said he, "in regard to the electoral vote is merely ministerial; it is to count the votes, and you undertake to reject votes." "If," said he, "you do for the first time now reject the votes of a State it will be created into a precedent, and that in the lifetime of some of those who now hear me, for the manufacture of Presidents by this House.

So I say to my friends who now claim that one House can exercise this extraordinary power, you cannot stand upon that doctrine and expect the American people to acquiesce in it. At the same time I say to my own friends on this side who claim that the whole power is in the hands of the Vice-President, I solemnly believe that you cannot stand upon that doctrine without grave danger that a large part of the people of the country will not acquiesce in it. Sir, if in the end there has been an utter failure on the part of the two Houses to agree upon any method, there may be nothing left but for the Vice-President to exercise this power and to trust to Providence for the result. I hope such an emergency may not arise and I intend by my voice and vote to endeavor to provide against it.

I say that upon this question there are irreconcilable differences of opinion. I repeat, for I wish to impress it upon the mind of every member in this House, that they are differences of opinion not merely upon the merits of this question, but such differences as throughout the whole history of the world have been argued with shot and shell and decided at the point of the bayonet. They are differences as to the right, the power, the authority to decide who for the time being is to be the ruler of a great nation. A dispute like this between claimants for supreme power in any other nation on earth would inevitably lead to war, and could be settled only through the blood and carnage of the battle-field. Let us show to the world, Mr. Speaker, the superiority of our free institutions, while at the same time we secure for our country repose, peace, and prosperity.

Let me say in passing (and the point is so important that I wish I had more time to discuss it) that, even if it were clear that the Vice-President has power to count the votes, the question would still remain whether he has the further and vastly larger power of deciding what are votes, of deciding which of two returns from the same State is the true one. This latter power, which is at least quasi-judi-cial in its nature, has seldom been claimed for him. Its exercise now, for the first time in the history of our Government, would be the exercise of a doubtful power, to say the least, and is to be avoided if

Mr. Speaker, the way out of these difficulties is plain. We must Mr. Speaker, the way out of these difficulties is plain. We must provide for the emergency by enacting a law by which, when enacted, we must all abide. Our right to do so is clear. There is and has always been an agreement that it is within the power of Congress by legislation to prescribe an orderly, regular, lawful, peaceable, constitutional mode of settling every question that may arise upon the count and of declaring the result; and it is in pursuance of that power that this hill have been recorded. that this bill has been reported.

We are met in some places with the objection that the bill is unconstitutional. It is said that it delegates to the commission powers which belong to the two Houses of Congress. Well, sir, I will answer that, in the first place, by saying that the greatest legal minds of this or of the past age have thought differently. If gentlemen will examine the records of Congress for the year 1800 they will discover that John Marshall then held a seat upon the floor of this House as a Representative from the State of Virginia—John Marshall, who subsequently became the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and whose name and fame as a jurist, I think I may say, surpasses that of any other of our countrymen, living or dead.

When the difficulty which now confronts us was first presented in 1800, John Marshall, as a member of the House of Representatives, reported a bill which involved every principle that is embodied in this bill to which any objection has been made upon constitutional grounds. It created what was known as a grand committee, and it confided to that committee the decision of all questions that might arise upon the count. It provided, exactly as this bill does, that the decision of the grand committee should be final and conclusive unless overruled by the concurrent vote of the two Houses.

In the Senate the statesmen of that day passed a bill somewhat dif-ferent from the one introduced by Mr. Marshall in the House. The Senate bill provided for a grand committee composed of six members from each of the two Houses and the Chief-Justice of the United States, the Chief-Justice to be its officer, and to that committee all questions were confided, with a provision that their decision should be final.

In 1824, when the question again came before Congress, Martin Van Buren, as the organ of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate of the United States, reported to that body a bill for settling these disputes, which went upon the theory, as the bill of 1800 had done, that the whole matter was within the control of Congress by legisla-

That bill passed the Senate and came to the House, where it was eported from the Committee on the Judiciary by Mr. Webster, of Massachusetts, with a recommendation that it be passed. It was late in the session and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House and was never again reached. But that bill involved a declaration on the part of those who reported it and supported it of the power of Congress to regulate this matter by legislation.

As I have not much time for the discussion of this question, I will read a sentence or two from one whose opinion I think will be considered by the majority at least of this House as worthy of great respect, and who when he states my view of anything always states it so much better than I can that I prefer to take his words. I mean Senator Thurman, of Ohio. In advocating the passage of a bill to regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, Senator Thurman at the last session of Congress answered the objections to which I have referred with these words:

I repeat, when a power is vested in any department of this Government and the mode of its exercise is not prescribed by the Constitution, the prescribing of that mode belongs to the law-making power, the Congress of the United States; and, therefore, in this case, where the Constitution simply says that these votes shall be counted, without prescribing in detail the mode of their count, it follows necessarily, from the structure and genius of our Government and from the very nature of legislative power, that that mode is to be prescribed by law. I never believed, therefore, that a joint rule was the proper mode; and I believe that that law binds everybody, binds each House of Congress as much as any law binds us until it is repealed.

The truth is that the Constitution is silent as to the mode of

The truth is that the Constitution is silent as to the mode of counting, and the inference is that Congress may prescribe the mode. There is no delegation of power in this bill. The count is made by the two Houses. When returns are regular and single there is a prima facie case, and the votes are to be counted according to the face of the returns, unless the two Houses concur in ordering otherwise. two returns come from the same State then there is no prima facie case, and the reference to the commission is no more than a convenient mode of establishing the prima facie case, which, being established by the report of the commission, is to stand precisely as if established by a regular return until overruled by concurrent action. It has been said that no legislation is necessary, that the Constitution is all-sufficient, and the "old way" is good enough. We are accused of yielding up somebody's rights by passing this bill. I would like to ask these people to tell us what is the old way of deciding such questions as are now to be decided. When, in the whole history of our Government, did the President of the Senate decide which of two conflicting returns from the same State was genuine, or any other question touching the validity of an electoral vote? Never.

In 1821, when the dispute arose as to the vote of Missouri, it was not submitted to the Vice-President of the Senate, and nobody suggested that it should be. It was provided for by a resolution of the two Houses, presented by Henry Clay, which instructed the Vice-President what to do. He was directed to declare that whether the votes of Missouri be counted or not James Monroe was elected. At the previous count, in 1817, the vote of Indiana had been objected to and the objections considered, not by the Vice-President, but by the two Houses separating for that purpose. In 1837, when the vote of Michigan was objected to, a decision was avoided, as in the case of Missouri, on the ground that the disputed votes did not affect the result. The case of Wisconsin, in 1857, comes nearer than any other to the point of establishing a precedent in favor of the power of the Vice-President to decide such a question; but a careful examination of the record in that case will show that Mr. Mason, then holding that office, disclaimed any such authority and claimed that he was simply executing the orders of the two Houses as expressed in their joint resolution directing the mode of counting. And it is a fact, and a very important one, that the two Houses have uniformly agreed upon a mode of counting and embodied it in the form of resolutions, and the Vice-President has always obeyed them.

The old way, therefore, is for Congress to provide the mode, and not for the Vice President to decide these questions. I have shown that Congress has the power to provide such a mode, that it has uniformly in some manner exercised it. I add, in conclusion, that under existing circumstances it is our imperative duty to do it. If we negexisting circumstances it is our imperative duty to do it. If we neglect so grave and important a duty, if we are false to so high a trust, we must act at our peril, and may justly be held to answer to our constituents, and to those who come after us, for the consequences.

upon this subject, and we cannot, in deference to the rights of others, vary the rule in the case of any one of them.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. Speaker, I approach the discussion of this great question with profound diffidence. I feel in the strongest manner that I cannot add to the reasons given for the support of this bill, and which have already been so ably and forcibly given both in this House and in the other end of the Capitol. And yet, sir, having been appointed as one of the committee that framed and reported it, I feel it somewhat incompany upon me to defain the House a form single form. what incumbent upon me to detain the House a few minutes from a vote on this important measure in order that I may give some of the reasons which influenced my mind in concurring in the report.

Mr. Speaker, we are, in the history of our country, approaching a period when we have to deal with a contested presidential election—a period in our history always looked forward to by the greatest statesmen of the country as constituting a rock on which our ship of state would founder if it foundered at all. We know that in the history of this country, at different times, contested presidential elections have occurred. The first of any moment was in the year 1801, the memorable contest between Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr. Fortunately for the country, that contest between those two distinguished men ended in an election by the House of Representatives in which all the people of this country acquiesced. On that occasion the patriotic statesmen of the land made an earnest and an honest effort to come to some conclusion by a bill which would prevent the recurrence of the danger of that period. In both Houses the attempt was made and pressed earnestly by the best men of the country to pass a bill regulating the mode of settling a contested presidential election. The bill as originally introduced contained the following provisions:

A bill prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States.

President of the United States.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That on the day before the second Wednesday in February of any year when a President and Vice-President of the United States shall have been voted for by electors in the preceding December, it shall be the duty of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States to choose, by ballot, in each House, six members thereof, and the twelve persons thus chosen, together with the Chief-Justice of the United States, or if he is absent from the seat of Government, or unable to attend, then with the next senior judge of the Supreme Court of the United States who is present and able to attend, shall form a grand committee, and shall have power to examine, and finally to decide, all disputes relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States: Provided, always, That no person shall be deemed capable of serving on this committee who is one of the highest candidates, or of kin to any of the five highest candidates out of whom a President of the United States to be chosen by the House of Representatives in case no person shall be found to have a majority of the whole number of electors by the different States.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That on the 1st day of March next after their appointment, the grand committee shall make their final report to the Senate and House of Representatives, stating the legal number of votes for each person and the number of votes which have been rejected; the report of the majority of the said committee shall be a final and conclusive determination of the admissibility or inadmissibility of the votes given by the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States; and where votes are rejected by the grand committee, their reasons shall be stated in writing for such exclusion, and signed by the members of the committee who voted for rejecting them, and the report shall be entered on the Journals of both Houses, who shall, on the day after the report is made, meet and declare the persons duly elected, and if no election of President has happened, then the House of Representatives shall immediately proceed, as the Constitution directs, to elect a President.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That when the grand committee shall have been duly formed according to the directions of this act, it shall not be in the power of either House to dissolve the committee or to withdraw any of its members.

It is noteworthy that in the original frame of that bill of 1801 the tribunal to settle the controversy and the contested election was composed of six members of each of the two Houses and the Chief-Justice of the United States. So that the minds of some of the very framers of the Constitution under which this power was delegated to Congress originated a bill for settling this controversy similar in its most important features to the one under discussion. That bill, after receiving a favorable indorsement from many of the best minds of the country, was lost by amendments to which the two Houses could not agree. The essential features of this bill received the warm support of John Marshall, of Virginia, who within one year was made the Chief-Justice of the United States, and who before the American people in 1824, and again the patriotic minds of the country undertook to pass a bill to settle this vexed question without any controversy and dispute. A failure was the result again; and that election, in which Andrew Jackson, John Adams, Crawford, and Clay were candidates, was settled by the House of Representatives and the country opioted.

tives and the country quieted. The bill was as follows:

The bill was as follows:

A bill in addition to the act relative to the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That before the Houses shall assemble for the purpose of counting the votes, as directed by the act to which this is an addition, each House shall choose, by ballot, two members thereof as tellers, whose duty it shall be to receive the certificates of the electors from the President of the Senate, after they shall have been opened and read, and to note, in writing, the dates of the certificates, the names of the electors, the time of their election, and the time and place of their meeting, the number of votes given, and the names of the persons voted for, and also the substance of the certificate from the executive authority of each State accompanying the certificate of the electors; and the minutes thus made by the tellers shall be read in the presence of both Houses, and a copy thereof entered on the Journals of each House.

SEC 2. And be it further enacted, That on the day appointed for counting the votes for President and Vice-President, the Senate and House of Representatives shall meet at such place as may be agreed on for the purpose, the names of the several States shall then be written, under the inspection of the Speaker of the House of Representatives on separate and similar pieces of paper, and folded up as nearly alike as may be, and put into a ballot-box and shaken by a member of the House of Representatives to be named by the Speaker thereof, out of which box shall be drawn the paper on which the names of the States are written, one at a time, by a member of the Senate, to be named by the President thereof; and so soon as one is drawn, the packet containing the certificates from the electors of that State shall be opened by the President of the Senate, and if no exceptions are taken thereto all the votes contained in such certificate shall be counted; shall be taken in either House, a message shall be sent to the other, informing them that the House sending the message is prepared to resume the count; and when such message shall have been received by both Houses they shall again assemble in the same apartment as before, and the count shall be resumed. And if the two Houses have concurred in rejecting the vote or votes objected to, such vote or votes shall not be counted; but unless both Houses concur such vote or votes shall be counted. The vote of one State being thus counted, another ticket shall in like manner be drawn from the ballot-box, and the certificate of the votes of the State thus drawn shall be proceeded on as is hereinbefore directed, and so on, one after another, until the whole of the votes shall be counted.

This bill, introduced into the Senate by Mr. Van Buren, passed with some additional sections. In this House it was referred to the Judiciary Committee, was reported back by Mr. Webster without amendment, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House,

In 1865, (for I shall pass over these things very rapidly,) while war was raging between the United States and the Confederate States, an effort was made in some of the seceded States, through what they termed their "loyal legislatures," to vote for President of the United States. And when it was discovered that the votes from these Southern States were certified and an effort would be made to count them in the presidential count of 1865, an effort was again made, and successfully made, to decide this great question before the day arrived for counting the presidential vote. We all recollect, as a part of the history of the country, that a joint resolution was passed by the two Houses of Congress and signed by the President of the United States, declaring that the electoral votes of eleven of the Southern States could not be counted in that presidential election. The joint resolution was in the following words: tion was in the following words:

Whereas the inhabitants and local authorities of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee rebelled against the Government of the United States, and have continued in a state of armed rebellion for more than three years, and were in said state of armed rebellion on the 8th day of November, 1864: Therefore fore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the States mentioned in the preamble to this joint resolution are not entitled to representation in the electoral college for the choice of President and Vice-President of the United States for the term of office commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865; and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from said States concerning the choice of President and Vice-President for said term of office.

This joint resolution was signed by the President, who sent to the two Houses the following message:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives:

The joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the electoral college" has been signed by the Executive in deference to the view of Congress implied in its passage and presentation to him. In his own view, however, the two Houses of Congress, convened under the twelfth article of the Constitution, have complete power to exclude from counting all electoral votes deemed by them to be illegal; and it is not competent for the Executive to defeat or obstruct that power by a veto, as would be the case if his action were at all essential in the matter. He disclaims all right of the Executive to interfere in any way in the matter of canvassing or counting electoral votes, and he also disclaims that, by signing said resolution, he has expressed any opinion on the recitals of the preamble or any judgment of his own upon the subject of the resolution.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 8, 1865.

Then, again, to avoid further difficulty, both Houses united in adopting what is known as the twenty-second joint rule, which was designed to cover this question of a disputed presidential election for all time; and by this joint rule we know that when a State was called and its vote about to be counted, the objection of either House of Congress was sufficient to prevent its count. The joint rule is as of Congress was sufficient to prevent its count. The joint rnle is as follows:

*Resolved by the Senate.* (the House of Representatives concurring therein.)* That the following be added to the joint rnles of the two Houses, namely:

The two Houses shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock p. m., on the second Wednesday in February next succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer. One teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes; and said tellers having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and at he votes having been counted, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with the list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

That is the usual form, as far as I have read, of the resolutions heretofore adopted. The committee have proceeded further to provide for a contingency:

"It, upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers, any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the presiding officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and said question shall be submitted to that body for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives for its decision; and no question shall be decided affirmatively, and no vote objected to shall be counted, except by the concurring vote of the two Houses, which being

"Such joint convention shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared, and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to the counting of any such vote, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess not beyond the next day at the hour of one o'clock p. m."

This remained the joint rule of the two Houses while both were under control of the republican party. But as soon as this House became democratic under the influence of the great political wave that swept the country in 1874, the Senate repealed the rule.

These are some of the troubles that have arisen in the country in regard to the presidential elections, but they all sink into absolute insignificance compared with the present one that is staring both Houses of Congress and this country in the face now. What is the trouble we have to meet? We know that the campaign for President and Vice-President of the United States which was conducted dent and Vice-President of the United States which was conducted in the year 1876 was unusually vehement, highly heated in its partisan character, and terminated by the election of Mr. Tilden, one of the candidates for the Presidency by a popular vote approaching 300,000 in its majority, and, as is contended by his party, (the one to which I belong,) he had a majority of the electoral votes.

It is alleged that when this was known to be the case, a conspiracy was formed to so manipulate enough of these States which had voted for Mr. Tilden as to give it to his competitor. And in this way we find that, when these two Houses shall meet to count the electoral vote from at least four of the States of this Union, there come up to be counted two different sets of electoral votes. This is the grave question that stares Congress in the face to day.

question that stares Congress in the face to-day.

Now the question we have to meet, not, I trust, as partisans, but as patriot statesmen, is, How shall these votes be counted, and this great controversy settled between the two parties, so that the candidate rightfully elected shall be peacefully inaugurated? It is maintained by very many of one party that the President pro tempore of the Senate has a right to open and count the electoral votes and declare which of the two candidates is elected President of the United States. On the other hand, it is maintained by a larger portion of the people of this country—very much larger in my opinion—that the President of the Senate has no earthly authority to count the electoral votes, but that the power resides in the two Houses of Congress.

but that the power resides in the two Houses of Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to go into elaborate discussion as to which of these theories is correct. It has been ventilated by the able argument of my colleague upon this floor; it has been thoroughly argued in the other branch of the Congress of the United States; and I should be wasting the valuable time of the House to go over the arguments presented by those gentlemen.

I only desire to say here that I subscribe earnestly and heartily to the doctrine that the power to count belongs to the two Houses of Congress, and that the Vice-President has no more right to count the votes than any member of this House. I believe the pretense if car-votes than any member of this House. I believe the pretense, if carried into execution by the Vice-President of the United States, would ned into execution by the Vice-President of the United States, would be the purest usurpation on his part, and ought not to be submitted to, but resisted at all hazards.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when these two great parties, numbering four or five millions each, have divided themselves upon these two modes of settling this vexed question, and neither party is willing to yield its conviction to the other, the time has arrived when the members of the two Houses of Congress should rise above partisan feeling, and agree upon some mode of settlement to tide over the difficulty impending and avoid the perils of war.

and agree upon some mode or settlement to tide over the difficulty impending and avoid the perils of war.

I believe, sir, that both Houses of Congress, acting each for itself, has equal rights in the counting of the electoral votes. The Constitution of the United States, which grants this power, says that the Vice-President shall open the votes in the presence of both Houses, and the votes shall then be counted. I believe that, according to the precedents, according to the construction of the Constitution which precedents, according to the construction of the Constitution which has been given by our fathers and by the best men of the present day, that power belongs to the two Houses of Congress, and belongs to them equally.

Ay, more, sir; I believe the counting of an electoral vote is an affirmative act, and to count that vote both Houses of Congress, without some regulation on the subject, must concur in its count. I believe the twenty-second joint rule best formulated the idea of counting, when the two Houses, without a previous law or agreement of some kind, undertook to count the electoral vote. I give some of the opinions of the distinguished men on the subject of the powers of the two Houses.

two Houses

Henry Clay, of Kentucky, (February 4, 1821:)

The two Houses were called on to enumerate the votes for President and Vice-President. Of course they were called on to decide what are votes.

John Randolph, of Virginia, (February 4, 1821:)

For what purpose do they [the two Houses] assemble together, unless it be to determine on the legality of the votes l

Senator Robert Toombs, of Georgia, (February 11, 1857:)

It is our duty to count the votes, and to decide what are vote

Senator A. P. Butler, of South Carolina, (February 11, 1857:)

Let him add up the votes and announce the result to me. I am one of the judges, or why do you call me there?

Senator John A. Logan, of Illinois, (February 25, 1875:)

The mere addition of the number of votes, done merely as a clerical duty by these persons, certainly is subject to the supervision of the two House's of Congress, the same as, for instance, in many States where the State constitution refers the counting of the votes for governor to the house of representatives and the senate of the State. They are to count the vote; that is the language of several of the State constitutions. But the vote is never actually counted by the Legislature; it is counted in their presence by the secretary or clerks, as may be. But the meaning of it evidently is that they count the vote. The clerks merely are those persons designated by the bodies to count the vote. Should they make a miscount of the vote there in the presence of the two houses, the two houses would have jurisdiction over it certainly. Hence it certainly means the counting of the vote by the two Houses of Congress, although the mere enumeration of the number is done by persons who are selected for that purpose. * * * The idea is that the two Houses count the vote. Of course they designate some person to do the mere ministerial office of counting the vote and making the addition, but it is in fact constructively done by the two Houses. Now, if you put in the words "by them," they refer to the men selected as the persons to make the count, and leaves them the persons to count the votes, instead of the construction that the Constitution certainly bears that the Houses count the votes.

Senator Morton, of Indiana, (March 16, 1876:)

We could, without doing any great violence to the Constitution, adopt either of these constructions. Each is possible under the language. The Constitution says:

"The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted."

It does not say who shall count them; it leaves it open to inference that they shall be counted by the two Houses on the one hand or by the President of the Senate on the other. I will assume, for the sake of the argument, that you can give to it either construction. I will assume that it is open to both views. Then the question comes, which is the more reasonable, which is the better, which is the safer of the two: to adopt that construction which gives this great power to one man, the President of the Senate, who may be counting the votes for himself, as it has turned out six times in our history, or would it be safer to leave it to the determination of the two Houses of Congress, representing the States and the people? If we are open to adopt either one of these constructions, I say the latter is the safer; it is the more reasonable; it is in conformity with the spirit of our Government and of popular institutions. I then adopt the latter construction.

Senator Bourwell, of Massachusetts:

Senator Boutwell, of Massachusetts:

Almost always, I think, when the subject has been discussed, the question has been presented whether Congress is to count the votes; and by Congress I mean the two Houses met in convention, according to the terms of the Constitution. Our best answer to that is the fact that, from the first convention that assembled until the last, the two Houses in convention always did count the votes. A teller was appointed by the Senate, two fellers by the House, The votes, or certificates, or returns, whatever they are called, were handed by the Vice-President, after he had opened them, to the tellers. The tellers were the organs, the instruments, the hands of the respective Houses. The votes were counted by the tellers, and, being counted by the tellers, they were counted by the two Houses; and, therefore, there never has been any difference of practice, and no different practice could have arisen under the Constitution. The two Houses in convention have from the first until now counted the votes.

Believing as I do that this power reposes in the two Houses of Congress and reposes in them equally, that this House has at least equal power with the Senate in counting the vote and declaring who is elected, the question recurs, has this House—have the two Houses of Congress—a right to pass the bill under consideration? I, for one, must maintain that the passage of this bill is no more taking away from this House the power of counting the vote than the mode here-tofore existing and adopted by the two Houses of Congress since the first election of President.

tofore existing and adopted by the two Houses of Congress since the first election of President.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a permanent bill. If it were permanent in its character, it would be open to very many objections which I think are not applicable to it. We do not undertake to bind the House which shall succeed this. We do not undertake to say that the House which shall count the electoral vote in 1881 shall be governed by the rule which we shall adopt; but we say here for this occasion, to meet this trouble, that we will agree before the counting upon the mode to count the electoral vote which must result in a reaccful determine. count the electoral vote, which must result in a peaceful determination of this great controversy.

Is this anything new? Has there been a presidential count since the foundation of the Government when the two Houses of Congress did not agree by concurrently adopting a common report upon some mode of counting the electoral vote? It is perfectly manifest the two Houses cannot together take part in the presidential count. There must be a mode and manner of arriving at the count which the two Houses are engaged in. Hence we find ever since the origin of this Government down to the present time, whenever the presidential count was to be made, the two Houses by concurrent action have agreed upon some plan, ay, sir, and some plan which for that occasion took away from the two Houses some of the powers claimed for it, as this bill does.

I desire to call the attention of the House to one single case, and I will not delay them by further reference. In 1857 there was some trouble about the State of Wisconsin. The question was whether she had cast her vote on the day prescribed by law; and the two Houses made this resolution, came under this order by concurrent resolu-

That the two Houses will assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday the 11th instant, at twelve o'clock, and the President  $\ensuremath{\textit{pro tempore}}$  shall be the presiding officer.

Where did the right come from for this House to give up the right for its Speaker to preside over its deliberations when the two Houses according to this resolution that the President of the Senate should preside for that occasion at least the House of Representatives gave up one of its rights in the presidential count?

That one person shall be appointed teller on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate protempore, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled; which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Now, when the two Houses, by concurrent action, agreed that the Vice-President of the Senate should preside, that tellers appointed by the two Houses should examine and declare the vote, and the Vice-President should announce who was elected President and Vice-President of the United States, it was pro hoc vice giving up some powers which the two Houses now claim for the presidential count.

Well, sir, when the count was completed, the tellers made this announcement:

Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, one of the tellers, reported. He said: Mr. President, the tellers appointed on the part of the two Houses to count and report the votes given for President and Vice-President of the United States report that they have examined all the returns and find that they were all regular and that the votes were cast on the day required by law, except in the case of the votes cast by the electors of the State of Wisconsin. Their returns show that they cast their electoral vote in that State on the 4th of December, instead of on the first Wednesday of December, (which was the 3d,) as required by law. All the returns show that James Buchanan, of the State of Pennsylvania, received 174 votes for President of the United States; that John C. Frémont, of the State of California, received—including the votes of Wisconsin—114 votes for President of the United States.

Now, sir, when the two Houses empowered these tellers not only to count—that is, to enumerate—but empowered them to examine and count, it was taking from this House and from the Senate the power which they had a right to exercise: to count the vote themselves. I am aware that it will be maintained that these tellers were but the organs of the two Houses; and I maintain, sir, with equal confidence that this commission provided for in this bill is but the organ of the two Houses of Congress to do what they themselves could have done two Houses of Congress to do what they themselves could have done in the absence of any such commission or tellers. I make this point to show, Mr. Speaker, that whenever a count has been made the two Houses of Congress, by concurrent action, had yielded up some of their rights in the presidential count to tellers or to somebody else. Well, now, while the two Houses concurrently possess the power to count the votes, they concurrently have a right to agree, when the time approaches to count the presidential vote, upon the mode of counting; they have a right to declare, as they did in this case, that the persons selected to examine, to count, and to declare shall make their count and make their declaration, and it shall be final; because, in all these precedents that I have examined. I do not think one can be found precedents that I have examined, I do not think one can be found where the two Houses have authorized tellers to examine and report the count of a presidential election where the count and the report of the tellers were not made a finality.

I say therefore, Mr. Speaker, that when the two Houses of Congress approach a presidential count, they for that time, for that occasion, have a right by concurrent action to agree to any mode of counting the vote which may seem to them best for that occasion; and, when the two Houses agree by concurrent action upon any mode of counting the presidential vote, that is the counting of that vote by the concurrent action of the two Houses of Congress. And it does seem to me that the most strenuous advocates for the rights of this House, of whom I am one, cannot object on the score of precedents at least to this bill, because in their opinion it may surrender some of the to this bill, because in their opinion it may surrender some of the rights of this House to a commission. But where it is done by concurrent action, either by bill, the appointment of tellers, the twenty-second joint rule, or by a joint resolution signed by the President, whatever may be the mode adopted for that occasion by the concurrent action of the two Houses, it is a counting of the vote by the concurrent action of the two Houses. I suppose no gentlemen who agree with me as to the precedents that are scattered all through the books will hesitate for a moment to declare that on all these occasions the two Houses everyised each its separate right and did nor casions the two Houses exercised each its separate right and did participate on equal terms each with the other in counting the presidential vote. That is my belief. But yet we find in consulting these precedents, one of which I have read in the hearing of the House, hat on that occasion the two Houses by concurrent action did agree that somebody else, although a portion of the two bodies, namely, tellers, should examine and count and report and declare, and the action of those tellers became the final action of the two Houses. Not only could it not be reversed by the vote of one House, but it could not be reversed according to these precedents by the concurrent action of the two Houses. But when those tellers reported the result of their examination and count it became a finality to which both Houses of Congress had to bow in absolute obedience, because it was done in the manner and mode established by their concurrent action.

Now this is the condition of affairs that we have to meet, and we believe the idea is abroad throughout the whole land that, unless some plan-whether it be the plan of the old precedent, the twentysecond joint rule, or some other plan—be adopted, there is no power on earth that can prevent war, bloodshed, confusion, chaos, and an end of this Government and of republican institutions. If that be so, Mr. Speaker, then it becomes a high and a solemn duty devolving so, Mr. Speaker, then it becomes a high and a solemn duty devolving upon this Congress to provide some mode which will bring about a peaceful solution of the difficulty and tide over this eventful period in the history of our country. Now, Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration in my opinion does not at all interfere with any of the rights of either of the two Houses any more than the precedent to which I have alluded interfered with the rights of the two Houses in that day. This bill originates in the two Houses, originates like the appointment of tellers in the old precedents, by a joint committee of the two Houses; and that joint committee, instead of resorting to the old formula of a joint report and the adoption of that report by both Houses of Congress, have departed from the old precedents and both Houses of Congress, have departed from the old precedents and have reported to both Houses of Congress a bill to establish for this occasion the mode of counting the electoral vote and settling this great question that is now convulsing the country. And when this bill shall have received the concurrent sanction of both Houses of Congress, establishing, as the old precedents did establish, a mode of counting the electoral votes on this occasion, when the votes shall have been counted in conformity with the provisions of this bill, they will have been counted by the concurrent action of the two Houses and received the sanction of each through the bill they have passed into law.

If any member of the House thinks it is giving up any of its rights, if this bill takes from the House any of its prerogatives it takes them by the consent and the action of the House itself. It seems to me, without going now into the character of the commission, that the commission here established to determine this vexed and disputed question is no more a relinquishment of its rights than the tellers appointed under the precedents from 1800 down to the present time.

The mode is different because the questions arising are different and more difficult of solution.

The provisions of this bill have been so carefully conned over by tion of the two Houses

the members of this House that I will not undertake to go over every point, but will glance at some of its details and its most important provisions.

The first section provides that where there is but one return from The first section provides that where there is but one return from a State the vote shall be counted unless rejected by both Houses. It is maintained by some gentlemen that that provision in itself takes from this House a right which it would have without it, but if it does it takes it from it by its own action, by the concurrent action of this House with the Senate, and when the two Houses have agreed that this shall be the rule, then the vote is counted by the concurrent action of the two Houses.

We all know the trouble that will meet us when the vote comes to be counted. We know the status of the vote of every State in dispute, and therefore we have provided for a case familiar to us all, and with our eyes open, evils to be met. We know that no two returns come up from any States except the four States in dispute, and, if the two Houses have agreed, by their concurrent action in the pasagreed, by their concurrent action in the passage of this bill, as to the votes of all the States except the four in dispute, those votes shall be counted, unless it shall appear when the certificates are opened that there is some such gross defect in the casting of the vote by the electors or some other defect as should induce both Houses to reject the vote, they will be counted. I cannot see, therefore, that when the two Houses have agreed, as to all the States but the four—all the States from which there is but one re-States but the four—all the States from which there is but one return—the votes shall be counted according to the certificates of the returns, unless both Houses concur in ordering otherwise, it is not giving up any of the power of the House over the question, because this House and the Senate, with every fact which will meet us when we count the vote before us, have said by their concurrent action that as to those States we agree they shall be counted unless both Houses reject it as their concurrent action. We agree beforehand that they shall be counted; that when the two Houses meet în joint convention the votes from the States not in dispute shall be counted unless both Houses agree in rejecting the vote on some point that may come up which is not now known. Surely the two Houses have the same right to agree to that now as they will have when the certificates are opened in the presence of both Houses and the certificates are opened and handed over to be counted. So that it seems to me are opened and handed over to be counted. So that it seems to me that when the two Houses of Congress shall say in advance, by bill, joint resolution, or concurrent action in any shape or form, that the two Houses of Congress agree that the votes of certain States shall be counted unless the two Houses shall reject them, it is the concurrent action of the two Houses counting the vote. The first provision of the bill does not infringe upon any doctrine maintained that it is the right of the two Houses in concurrent action to count the electoral

But if that were all there was in the case it would be plain sailing, and the old precedents might have been followed with safety and without fear of resort to war or violence, but unfortunately, as I intimated a while ago, among the States voting for President and Vice-President there are four from which double certificates have been re-President there are four from which double certificates have been returned and two sets of electors have cast their votes, one for one candidate and the other for the other; and that is the case which both Houses of Congress know to-day, as well as they will know when the certificates are opened. That case must be provided for now, before the day arrives for counting the vote; some solution of the difficulty must be provided. It is like the case of Michigan and the case of Wisconsin which I read a while ago. The State of Wisconsin had voted on the day after the day fixed by law, and both Houses knew it before they met in joint convention. They provided a mode of counting the vote of Wisconsin. It so happened that the vote of Wisconsin did not affect the presidential election, and the scheme re-Wisconsin did not affect the presidential election, and the scheme resorted to on that occasion was to count the vote of Wisconsin, which did not alter the result hypothetically. The two Houses, before the day for counting arrived, came together and both agreed how the vote should be counted.

Now we know that we have more trouble than that upon our hands in this case, because unfortunately upon the solution of the difficulty in counting the electoral votes of four disputed States the result of the presidential election depends. If they are all counted one way they decide the election in favor of Mr. Hayes as President of the United States; if any one is decided against him, then Mr. Tilden is President of the United States; and that is the reason why the diffi-President of the United States; and that is the reason why the diffi-culty which we meet now is greater—tenfold greater—than any which was ever met before by Congress in the history of our Gov-ernment. That state of affairs had to be provided for in this bill. How was it to be done? We could not get an equal number of gen-tlemen selected from the two Houses without getting partisans, gen-tlemen on one side who believed Mr. Tilden was elected and on the other they believed Mr. Hayes was elected, and therefore some means had to be devised by which a tribunal should be selected that would decide the question as we hoved and believed, so as to avoid difficulty. decide the question, as we hoped and believed, so as to avoid difficulty, fairly and justly, and hence the committee has reported the second section of the bill. It provides that when there are two returns from any State on the day when the votes are to be opened and counted all the papers, certificates, or papers purporting to be certificates shall be referred to a commission composed of five members of the House of Representatives, five members of the Senate, and five justices of the Supreme Court.

Supreme Court.

These justices are selected by circuits partly because they represent widely different sections of the United States and partly because it is believed they are equally divided in political opinions. It cannot be supposed that these judges will be influenced in their decision of this case by party politics. They are accustomed to view questions judicially, and have decided political questions without regard to politics. But to prevent charges of unfairness in the bill, to satisfy both parties that fairness was the aim of the bill, no preponderance of political bias was allowed in the bill. The selection of the fifth justice is left to the four, and the country has a right to expect at their hands the selection of a non-partisan, and I feel sure there will be no disappointment. With such a tribunal to decide this great question, absolute fairness in the decision must be expected. Napoleon said, "Providence was on the side of the heaviest artillery." In this case, the victory will be on the side of the stronger case. We must expect the decision will be fair and that whoever is elected under the Constitution and laws will be so declared. Having entire confidence in stitution and laws will be so declared. Having entire confidence in the strength of our case, I shall trust implicitly this tribunal and confidently expect a favorable decision.

Another apprehension felt about the bill is that the powers of the court to inquire into the legality of the action of the returning boards may be limited by its provisions. This apprehension is believed to be groundless. It is provided by the last paragraph of the second section that-

All the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of each Stare shall be opened, in the alphabetical order of the States, as provided in section I of this act; and when there shall be more than one such certificate or paper, as the certificates and papers from such State shall so be opened, (excepting duplicates of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote. or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and by a majority of votes decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration; which decision shall be made in writing, stating briefly the ground thereof, and signed by the members of said commission agreeing therein; whereupon the two Houses shall again meet and such decision shall be read and entered in the Journal of each House, and the counting of the votes shall proceed in conformity therewith, unless, upon objection made thereto in writing by at least five Senators and five members of the House of Representatives, the two Houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise, in which case such concurrent order sh

This provision gives to this commission all the powers now possessed for the purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together. It can do in the premises whatever the two Houses, or either of them, may lawfully do. Surely this is broad enough to satisfy all. For this commission ought not to have any power not possessed by the two Houses under the Constitution and the laws. Another objection made is that it is unconstitutional, because it takes from the two Houses the right to count and reposes it in this commission. Can this be valid? I have endeavored to show that this bill, which only provides for this occasion, does not deprive the two Houses of their powers and rights, but only establishes a mode by which they (the two Houses) have it done. If this power is lodged in the legislative department of the Government. By the last paragraph of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution it is provided that Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government, or in any department or officer thereof."

The twelfth amendment gives to the two Honses the right to count, but does not required the reader remover. This was left wright to This provision gives to this commission all the powers now pos

The twelfth amendment gives to the two Houses the right to count, but does not provide the mode or manner. This was left, wisely or unwisely, to legislation, which seems to be necessary to carry into execution this power vested in the legislative department (the two Houses) by the Constitution. It will not do to say no legislation has been found necessary up to this time, all the precedents established by the concurrent action of the two Houses providing a mode of counting for each election. The joint resolution approved by Lincoln and the twenty-second joint rule is quasi-legislation; each provides for this occasion. Whether the provision is made by concurrent or joint resolution, joint rule or by bill, cannot affect the constitutionality of the measure.

Shall such a bill fail to become a law? What will be the consequences? The 14th of February is reached without an agreement upon the mode of counting. It is seriously feared—nay, it is most certain—that the President pro tempore of the Senate will undertake certain—that the President pro tempore of the Senate will undertake to count the votes—will count only the votes contained in the certificates from the unscrupulous and fraudulent returning boards of the three disputed States and will declare Rutherford B. Hayes and William A. Wheeler President and Vice-President of the United States. It is equally certain that this House would, as it should, refuse to submit to this flagrant usurpation, would retire from the joint convention with the Senate and elect Samuel J. Tilled. With two Presidents dents, there must be conflict of authority and consequent conflict of arms. Is the country prepared for war? Already the uncertainty and apprehension which have surrounded this question have paralyzed the business of the country, thrown hundreds of thousands of people out of employment, and brought starvation to the poor man's Shall we hesitate in our duty in this hour of peril? Shall we prove ourselves mere partisans, or statesmen? Shall we meet the just expectations of the forty-four millions of people whose anxious eyes are turned toward us; or, by the refusal to pass the bill, turn them to the dire calamities of war, devastation, and ruin?

I know not how others may feel and act; as for myself I shall vote for it cheerfully, confident that it will afford a fair and honest and just solution of this vexed question. Then with Tilden in the Presidency, and reform and economy in the Government, our country will start on the road to prosperity and happiness. Then will be work for the idle and bread for the hungry, and generations yet unborn may rise up and call us blessed. rise up and call us blessed.

Mr. GOODE. By the courtesy of my friend and colleague I am allowed to occupy twenty minutes of his time. The report of the joint committee on counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President has imposed upon the two Houses of Congress a very grave responsibility. We would be either more or less than men if we did not feel profoundly impressed with the sense of that responsibility. The duty is now incumbent upon us to accept or reject the plan of adjustment which has been proposed by the joint committee. In my opinion, the members of that joint committee are eminently entitled to ion, the members of that joint committee are eminently entitled to the thanks of the Congress and of the country for their patient, self-sacrificing, and patriotic labors. And I have no hesitation in declaring that, so far as I am concerned, I am prepared now to accept my share of the responsibility, and to accord to the plan which they have proposed my earnest and cordial support.

It is refreshing in these times of high political excitement, when the voice of party and of faction is so often heard to vex the public ear—it is refreshing I say to find that the members of this joint committee, composed of equal numbers of both the great political parties of the country, are imbued with a spirit of patriotism sufficiently broad and comprehensive to enable them to forget that there is a party to serve when they have a country to save. It is an auspicious circumstance, and I hail it as the harbinger of a better and a brighter circumstance, and I hail it as the harbinger of a better and a brighter day.

The scheme of adjustment which has been proposed may be liable to criticism; it may perhaps be defective in some of its particulars. But I believe that it is the best that is now attainable, and I believe it is always the wisest statesmanship to do the best that can be done under the circumstances by which we are surrounded. It is easier to pull down than to build up; it is easier to criticise a scheme of adjustment than to devise one.

In common with the great body of the democratic party of this country I entertain the belief that their candidates were legally and fairly chosen at the recent election. I respect the honest indignation of those of my countrymen who insist that we, the representatives of the people, should stand here as a rock in mid ocean and clamor for their rights like the barons at Runnymede. But it behooves us in this perilous crisis of the country's history to pause before we reject this plan of adjustment, unless we are prepared to suggest something this plan of adjustment, unless we are prepared to suggest something more just and feasible in its stead.

In the consideration of this question there are several important facts which cannot be disregarded. It cannot be denied that the great body of the republican party in this country profess to believe that their candidates have been legally and fairly elected. It cannot be denied that some of the more daring and bold of the republican leaders, encouraged and sustained by a powerful element in the country, seem determined to inaugurate Mr. Hayes at all hazards.

The significant utterances of the President of the United States immediately after the election, who persisted in asserting that Mr. Hayes was certainly elected, notwithstanding the whole country, including Mr. Hayes himself, seemed prepared to accept the fact of his defeat; the selection of a partisan committee and the concentration of troops at New Orleans for the purpose of watching the count of the votes; the extraordinary manipulation of the returning boards of three States by a high Cabinet official; the virtual overthrow of the supreme court of South Carolina by the simple edict of a Federal judge; the abrogation of the twenty-second joint rule under which, on three several occasions, the candidate of the republican party had been declared duly elected President; the unwarrantable interference of the military arm of the Government by which the long-suffering and proud-spirited people of South Carolina and Louisiana have been each at three deam from the service when the service is three deam from the service in the again thrust down from the very pinnacle of hope, and again sub-jected to the ignominious rule of the bayonet; the preconcerted clamor of a large portion of the republican press from one end of this land to the other against the inherent right of democratic citizens peaceably to assemble and to concert measures for the public safety; all these things, in my opinion, demonstrate the existence of a wide-spread and dangerous conspiracy to attempt the inauguration of Governor Hayes against the forms of law and in reckless disregard, as I believe, of the wishes of a large majority of the American people

I say these are facts which cannot be disregarded in the discussion of this question. It is my firm conviction that it is the earnest wish—and I have been strengthened in that conviction by listening to another debate within the last twenty-four hours in another forum— I say it is my firm conviction that it is the earnest wish of a portion of the republican leaders that there shall be no agreement upon any plan of counting the electoral vote. I believe if this plan is rejected none will be agreed upon; that when the two Houses come together to count the electoral vote, there will be a disagreement as to the result of the election.

In that event, the House of Representatives, in the exercise of their onstitutional functions, will proceed immediately to the election of Mr. Tilden. And the President of the Senate, in obedience, as I believe, to the requirements of his party, will feel himself obliged to arrogate to himself the right to declare Mr. Hayes the President-elect. What then ? We will have a dual Executive. And in my humble judgment we will then be brought to the point where one party or the other must make an ignominious surrender, or we must fight. Are gentleman prepared for the latter alternative? Are they or the people whom they represent prepared for a conflict of arms? Are they prepared to "Cry 'havoe' and let slip the dogs of war?" If not, then I appeal to them by all the memories of the past and by all the hopes of the future to pause before they enter upon a struggle the consequences of which must be disastrous and the end of which no

Now, are there any insurmountable objections to this plan? Let us inquire. If it be objected that the scheme proposed by the adoption of this bill is to erect a tribunal unknown to the Constitution, tion of this bill is to erect a tribunal unknown to the Constitution, then I submit that if that be true, it is equally true that the issue to be decided is one which, if the framers of the Constitution ever contemplated it, they failed to provide for.

The Constitution merely provides that the President of the Senate shall open the certificates in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, and that the votes shall then be counted. That is all. It is a historical fact that from the foundation of our Government some of our ablest commentators and some of our wisest statesmen have entertained the belief that the Constitution is in this respect signally defective, and that here lies the rock upon which our governmental system must finally split and fall to pieces.

Sir, in my humble judgment, the fair construction of that clause of the Constitution is that the power to count the vote is lodged in the two Houses of Congress, and when I say the two Houses I mean the two Houses of Congress, and when I say the two Houses I mean the two Houses acting concurrently. And, sir, according to my apprehension, this bill provides for carrying out that power. The two Houses of Congress are authorized to pass all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution all powers vested in the Government of the United States or in any department thereof. According to the scheme of this bill the two Houses agree before the count begins that, where there is but one return from a State, it shall be counted unless rejected by the concurrent action of the two Houses; and when there is more than one return the certificate and all the and when there is more than one return the certificate and all the papers connected with it shall be submitted to a joint commission for their judgment; and their decision shall be final unless reversed by the concurrent action of both Houses of Congress.

It seems to me that according to the scheme of the bill the action of the joint commission is substantially the action of the two Houses; that the count of the vote according to the recommendation of the joint commission is, in effect, a count by the two Houses, and that in assenting to this measure it cannot fairly be said that the two Houses of Congress have delegated any power conferred upon them by the Constitution. Gentlemen seem to suppose that the so-called arbitration feature is a novel one, and that it involves the establishment of a precedent which may be dangerous in the future. But they forget that in 1800 the Senate of the United States passed a bill embodying this very principle, the title of the bill being "A bill to prescribe the mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President." That bill was adopted in the Senate by a vote of 16 to 12, and in the House of Representatives by a vote of 52 to 37, with amendments, which amendments afterward caused the defeat of the bill. But I call the attention of gentlemen to this fact, that the arbitration feature now so vigorously assailed was sanctioned and indorsed by the ablest and wisest men in the two Houses of Congress at that day, including John Marshall, of Virginia, afterward Chief-Justice of the joint commission is, in effect, a count by the two Houses, and that in

United States, and the highest model the world has ever known of the able, learned, and incorruptible judge. It is objected in certain quarters that according to the theory of our Government the executive, legislative, and judicial departments ought to be kept entirely separate and distinct; and that according to this bill the judicial department is called upon to decide this issue between the parties. The judicial department is called upon to decide nothing. It is true that five of the fifteen men selected to decide this great issue happen to be judges of the Supreme Court. But the joint commission decides nothing; their action is simply advisory. They merely recommend; and the two Houses can reject or adopt the recommendation according to their pleasure. Nothing can bind the two Houses except their own agreement. But it is fair to presume that all wisdom will not die with these two Houses, and that they may be assisted in coming to their agreement by the advice and recommendation of such an existent religious. mendation of such an eminent tribunal.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is it not high time that a Christian people such as we profess to be shall find some other method besides the employ-ment of brute force for the settlement of these difficulties. If international courts are organized for the settlement of difficulties between nations, if local courts are organized for the settlement of difficulties between individuals, why, I demand to know, is it that this tribunal cannot be organized for the settlement of this great difficulty between the two Houses of Congress and between the two great political parties in the country ?

Sir, we have just been celebrating the centennial year of our national existence. We have invited the people of all nations and all climes to come to our shores for the purpose of witnessing the grandeur of our American system of Government and the unexampled progress which our people have made in the peaceful arts of industry; and shall it be said that there is not intellect and patriotism enough in the American Congress to devise some fair scheme for the adjustment of a controversy which threatens the postration of all our industries, the overthrow of all our liberties, and the destruction of our republican institutions? Shall it be said that in this hour of great public peril, in this supreme moment of our destiny as a people, five Senators and five Representatives and five judges from a people, live Senators and live Representatives and live Judges from the most august tribunal upon earth cannot be found who are capa-ble of rising superior to all party considerations and deciding this great question like patriots and men, according to the Constitution and the laws? I will not believe it. I am willing to trust such a tribunal. I believe that they will decide fairly and impartially, in the fear of God and in the spirit of the oath which they will

But, whatever the decision may be, we will at least have the satisfaction of knowing that the successful candidate will be inaugurated according to the peaceful forms of law, and without violence to our according to the peaceful forms of law, and without violence to our republican system of government. According to my judgment, the chief merit of this plan consists in the fact that it affords a certain guarantee of a safe and speedy deliverance from the military arm of the Government. Its adoption will be equivalent to the service of a formal notice upon all concerned that the two Houses of Congress propose to dispense with the presence of an armed soldiery when they come to exercise their constitutional function of counting the electoral vote; that they intend to inaugurate, for the next four years, a government of opinion, and not of force, the rule of law, and not the rule of the bayonet. And is not this a consummation most devoutly to be wished?

Mr. Speaker, the people whom I have the honor to represent are tired of war and rumors of war. They have fully realized all its multiplied and untold horrors. For the preservation of the public peace they would willingly sacrifice everything but their honor and that priceless heritage of freedom which their fathers have bequeathed to them. Next to the preservation of our constitutional form of Government there is nothing which they more ardently desire than a lasting and enduring peace. The earnest aspiration of their hearts is that the white wings of the sweet messenger of peace may once more

overspread the entire land.

More than one hundred years ago Virginia stood side by side with Massachusetts when the infant colonies invoked the blessing of Almighty God upon the declaration that they would be free and independent States. If the voice of Massachusetts was heard through her eloquent Otis, Virginia contributed her Henry, with his lips touched as it were by a live coal from off the altar. If Massachusetts furnished her Warren to bleed and die for the common cause, Virginia sent her Washington to Boston as the accepted leader of the patriot forces in their heroic effort to be free. And now to-day, as one of the humblest of her sons, I stand in the name of Virginia to respond to the invocation for peace which was heard from Massachusetts day before yesterday. I re-echo the patriotic sentiment contained in the eloquent peroration of her distinguished son when he said that, if this bill could be ratified by this Congress with the unanimity with which it has been reported by the committee, it would shed a glory over the opening year of the second century of our Independence which not even any year of the past century could excel. "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war," and the greatest of all victories is that of reason over passion, of man over himself.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, the danger which our wisest writers on the Constitution years ago predicted and dreaded now confronts the American people. The Constitution contains no express provision her Warren to bleed and die for the common cause, Virginia sent her for that determination of disputed questions of law or fact which it terms counting the electoral vote. The wisest students of its com-plicated mechanism have expressed their fear that it would give way, parateu mechanism have expressed their fear that it would give way, not in resisting foreign force or civil dissension, not even by decay or corruption, but because of its vague and imperfect provisions for determining that most vital of all questions, the title to executive power. With that peril, under circumstances of special difficulty, we have now to deal.

In estimating this danger I am not affected by any fear of civil war or any menace of violence. Such threats, if made in the spirit of empty bluster, deserve nothing but contempt; if serious, the swift and indignant scorn and condemnation of the whole people.

I do not dwell upon any apprehension of violent resistance to the lawful authority of the Government. The evil of civil war—so great that even to threaten it is a grievous crime—is only surpassed by the greater evil of yielding one jot of lawful authority to menace. But I do hold that nothing could be more injurious to the whole Republic, nothing more destructive to the principles that I myself hold dear, than that a man holding them shall be placed in the presidential office whom at least one-half of the American people will regard as an usurper by an act of power which at least one-half of the people will regard as an usurpation. If any gentleman thinks otherwise, his judgment differs from mine as to the influences which commend the truth to the approbation of mankind.

I shall not attempt to add another to the arguments of the consti-

I shall not attempt to add another to the arguments of the consti-tutional question: With whom is the power to determine those grave questions of law and fact which may arise in determining what votes have been lawfully east for President and Vice-President by the elect-oral colleges? I admit that those persons who believe that the Con-stitution requires the President of the Senate in all cases to perform stitution requires the President of the Senate in all cases to perform that office must deem this bill unconstitutional. I do not expect the votes of such persons for the bill, unless they think that the recent almost unanimous acquiescence of Senate and House in a different construction, supported by a current of great authorities, including John Marshall, Daniel Webster, and Abraham Lincoln, may include them to treat the question as concluded, or at least so far to yield their individual judgment as to deal with it as one of doubt. This consideration may perhaps especially commend itself to those gentlemen who have honestly changed their opinions on a grave question of constitutional law in the presence of a great temptation. Fortunate is stitutional law in the presence of a great temptation. Fortunate is that statesman to whom long-settled and matured convictions are sufficient for the solution of the ever new and various problems of his public life,

Who in the height of conflict keeps the law In calmness made, and sees what he foresay

For myself three considerations make me deem it incredible that the framers of the Constitution or the people who accepted it ever meant or could mean to intrust the power of deciding these vast ques-meant or could mean to intrust the power of deciding these vast questions to the President of the Senate, subject to no control of the two Houses of Congress or of the law-making power.

First. They were a generation of men that dreaded above all other things the usurpation of executive power.

Second. They expected that the President of the Senate would ordinarily be one of the candidates whose claim to the office was to be decided. They provided that two persons should be voted for for President, of whom that one having the second highest number of votes was to become Vice-President, and President of the Senate. The President of the Senate. The President of the Senate, therefore, must within four years have been a leading candidate for the Presidency. The habit of continuing the same persons in public station doubtless led them to anticipate that he would be a leading candidate for the succession, as has first happened when Adams succeeded Washington, when Jefferson succeeded Adams, when Van Buren succeeded Jefferson, and in many cases of unsuccessful competition. The same suggestions apply to all cases where the Vice-President is a candidate for re-election.

Third. As in Great Britain, from which our institutions were derived, Parliament for centuries has regulated the inheritance of the crown and determined all questions of right to the succession, so, in every American State in existence when the Constitution of the United States was adopted, the Legislature at that time, either itself, elected the governor or counted the votes of the people and decided all disputes as to the popular choice.

As the Vice-President-

Says Alexander Hamilton-

may occasionally be a substitute for the President, all the reasons which recom-mend the mode of election prescribed for the one apply with great if not equal force to the manner of appointing the other.

There are three other theories, with none of which is this bill in

First. That the President of the Senate must count the vote in the absence of concurrent action by the two Houses, or of other pro-absence of concurrent action by the two Houses, or of other provision by the law-making power.

Second. That under the power expressly conferred by the Constitution upon Congress to make "all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof," the law-making power may provide a method for counting the vote.

Third. That the power of counting the vote is vested by the Constitution in the two Houses voting separately. The two Houses of Congress are the tribunal which according to this bill is to execute this grave authority. If they have it by the Constitution, it is left undisturbed. If it needs the forces of the law-making power to confer it, this bill confers it. The only case when any other aid comes in is when the two members of which the final tribunal is composed differ in their judgment. Certainly it is within the law-making power to provide what shall happen when the members of a constitutional tribunal composed of even numbers are equally divided in the support of the sup tutional tribunal composed of even numbers are equally divided in judgment. We may surely provide by law that, if the Supreme Court composed of six or ten members be equally divided in opinion, the judgment of the court below shall stand or a report of a reference shall be accepted. The commission is not an umpire. It is not an arbitration. It is an agency inferior to the two Houses, reporting to them, its action wholly subject to theirs, but only to stand when the two Houses are divided. The warmest advocate of the constitutional powers of the Houses must concede that this bill comes within the very letter of the definition of the law-making powers of Congress. powers of the Houses must concede that this bill comes within the very letter of the definition of the law-making powers of Congress; a "law necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested in the Government and in every department thereof." Unless this power exist in Congress of providing by law for the case where the two members of this tribunal composed of an even number, House and Senate, stand divided on any question one to one, the advocates of the power of the two Houses to count the vote must believe that the framers of the Government meant it should perish when the not improbable case should arise of a division in sentiment between two political leadies on any question of law or feet which should arise in litical bodies on any question of law or fact which should arise in counting the vote.

Some gentlemen have spoken of this as a compromise bill. There is not a drop of compromise in it. I do not mean that, after it was found that the principle of securing an able and impartial tribunal is not a drop of compromise in it. I do not mean that, after it was found that the principle of securing an able and impartial tribunal conformed to the opinions and desires of all the committee, there was not some yielding of individual views as to detail. But how can that man be said to compromise who, having a just and righteous claim, asserts it, maintains it, enforces it by argument and proof, yields no jot or tittle of it before a tribunal so constituted as to insure its decision in accordance with justice and righteousness so far as the lot of humanity will admit? I think justice and right are compromised when they are submitted for their decision to force. They are compromised when they can only be maintained by doubtful disputed exercises of power. They never can be compromised when they are permitted to stand before a tribunal clothed with judicial powers, surrounded by judicial safeguards, invested with legal authority by the law-making power of the country.

Let it not be said that this reasoning implies that truth and error stand on an equality; that it makes no difference whether matters be settled right or wrong provided only they be settled. It is precisely because truth and error differ; it is because of the vast difference between the righteous result and its antagonist, that we propose to submit the differences between them not to force, not to heat and passion, but to that tribunal which, among all mechanisms possible to be executed by law, is least liable to be diverted from the truth. But it is charged that this commission is in the end to be made up of seven men who of course will decide for one party and even men we of seven men who of course will decide for one party and even men we of seven men who of course will decide for one party and even men we are also and the seven men we of seven men who of course will decide for one party and even men.

But it is charged that this commission is in the end to be made up of seven men who of course will decide for one party, and seven men who of course will decide for one party, and seven men who of course will decide for the other, and who must call in an umpire by lot, and that therefore you are in substance and effect putting the decision of this whole matter upon chance. If this be true, never was a fact so humiliating to the Republic confessed since it was inaugurated. Of the members of our National Assembly, wisest and best selected for the gravest judicial duty ever imposed upon man, under the constraint of this solemn oath can there be found in all this Sodom not ten, not one to obey any other mandate but that all this Sodom not ten, not one to obey any other mandate but that of party? Far otherwise was the thought of Madison when with exultant aspiration he commended the Constitution to his countrymen:

In cases where it may be doubtful on which side justice lies, what better umpires could be desired by two violent factions, flying to arms and tearing the state to pieces, than the representatives of confederate States not heated by the local flame? To the impartiality of judges they would unite the affection of friends. Happy would it be if such a remedy for its infirmities could be enjoyed by all free governments; if a project equally effectual could be established for the universal peace of mankind.—James Madison in Federalist of No. 43.

But I especially repudiate this imputation when it rests upon those members of the commission who are to come from the Supreme Court. It is true there is a possibility of bias arising from old political opinions even there, and this, however minute, the bill seeks to place in exact equilibrium. But this small inclination, if any, will in my judgment be overweighted a hundred-fold by the bias pressing them to preserve the dignity, honor, and weight of their judicial office before their countrymen and before posterity. They will not consent by a party division to have themselves or their court go down in history as incapable of the judicial function in the presence of the disturbing element of partisan desire for power, in regard to the greatest cause ever brought into judgment. Mr. Speaker, the act we are about to do will, in my judgment, be one of the greatest in history. Our annals have been crowded with great achievements in war and peace, in art, in literature, in commerce. But other countries, other republics have equaled us in these things. But in this great act we shall stand without a rival or an example. For a thousand years our children, with tears of joy and pride, will read that while in the fierce strife for executive power the sun of other republics has gone down in darkness But I especially repudiate this imputation when it rests upon those and in blood, in their own country, too, the same great peril has arisen. Their sky has been darkened by the same cloud; their ship with its costly freight of love and hope encountered the same storm and was driven near the same rock; but in the midst of storm and darkness and conflict the august and awful figure of law rose over the face of the waters, uttering its divine, controlling mandate, Peace, be still!

Mr. HOAR. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. FORT. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts takes his seat, will he answer a question?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORT. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he can give any reason either on his own behalf or on behalf of the committee why the entire Supreme Court as an organized body was not taken to make up this tribunal, or why all the members of that court were not

Mr. HOAR. One very good reason was that it did not seem to be proper to take an entire department of the Government and put it on an equality with committees chosen by the two branches of another. But another-a franker, better answer-is this: for one I desired (I speak only for myself) to have an absolute equilibrium of any possible political bias, however small, in the gentlemen who are to constitute this commission.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, in opposing this bill I am aware that I lay myself open to the charge of being an "intense partisan," for I read what has been said elsewhere:

In the intense criticisms that have been made upon this bill in the very few days that it has been known, by the extreme upholders of party wishes upon both sides, I have never observed any criticisms upon the absolute fairness and justice of such a mode, provided we could get over the constitutional objections that these newspaper writers and intense politicians seem so suddenly to have discovered and with which no doubt they are so very familiar.

I am glad to say, Mr. Speaker, that in the debate on this measure here there has been upon the part of no gentleman discussing it favorably any disposition to withhold due credit from the honest objections that may be found in the minds of gentlemen opposing it. What I have read was not uttered here. What an "intense politician" may be in other men's estimate I cannot tell. I may suppose that what is meant is an American citizen who shows by his acts that he takes a deep interest in the elections at which the American people choose their Chief Magistrate; who believes that so far as principles choose their Chief Magistrate; who believes that so far as principles and results go one party is right and the other is wrong; and who when the battle is at its thickest contributes or attempts to contribute something to bring the right side out uppermost; who during presidential contests does not linger by the sea-side or rove in the mountains or retire to home seclusion, but who gives and takes hard blows for the sake of his beliefs, and who is "intense" enough to think when he has helped to win a fair victory that it should not be thrown away by those who have shirked the battle or have proven themselves better in criticising its plan than in fighting it out to the heard selves better in criticising its plan than in fighting it out to the hard end.

Nor am I unaware, Mr. Speaker, that he who sets himself up against this measure will be charged with obstructing a pacific settlement of a dispute which it is said threatens the peace of the Republic and involves its business interests in further doubt, and, it may be, in ruin. The voice of the great cities has been heard, and day by day petitions and memorials are presented here from all the large aggregations of business communities expressing themselves in favor of this bill. And I have seen in a newspaper circulating far and wide in New York City the direct enunciation of the proposition that if Congress does not at once accept and pass this bill the business men of New York City will take both the matter and Congress in hand. As I read the menace I remembered that a great lawyer of New York City not many months ago stood up in Cooper Institute and revived memories of the day when the Republic rocked on its foundations in the early months of 1861, and drew a picture not soon to be forgotten of the loyalty of 1861, and drew a picture not soon to be forgotten of the loyalty of New York City, declaring that when Abraham Lincoln needed that New York City, declaring that when Abraham Lincoln needed that his hands be sustained and upheld as never before, six faithful souls met in that city and deliberated and considered whether it was safe to call a meeting to show that New York sustained the Republic and the Union, being then fearful that her business men wanted some kind of settlement or compromise which would give up the real issue then involved before the American people.

It was the tramp of men from the valley and hillside hurrying to the defense of an imperiled country which showed the timid souls in the city that there was something worth fighting for besides bonds and stocks and even quotations at the exchanges.

The cities, sir, are entitled to respect; but God made the country and man made the town, and from the Saint John's waters to the Colorado every scattered township and county has as great a stake and man made the town, and from the Saint John's waters to the Colorado every scattered township and county has as great a stake in this contest as the dwellers in New York or San Francisco. Nor do I question the motives and purposes of gentlemen who have devised this measure and have given many laborious days and nights to shape it. The trouble has been, sir, not in their will or lack of patriotic endeavor, but in the profound fundamental errors upon which their structure is built, in my belief. Carefully scrutinizing that belief, as I was bound to do in the face of the conclusion of the able and thoughtful men who have made this report and presented us with this bill, I started with doubting my own doubts, but my search for light in the direction in which these gentlemen have gone has been vain, and my doubts and fears have ripened into what is positive conviction against their conclusions.

To say nothing, Mr. Speaker, at present of the make-up and details of this bill, or the difficulties which must arise in its practical operof this bill, or the difficulties which must arise in its practical operation, it startles me by its bold assumption of a power in the Congress to regulate and control the election of a President of the United States, which, in my judgment, was never lodged in the two Houses by the framers of the Constitution; and which, whatever the popular impulse may be at this speaking, will never be sustained by the American people when they shall have had time to measure the assumption and contemplate its consequences.

Objection has been taken because of a close election, and the natural claim set up by each side giving rise to embarrassment, and no doubt to sincere regrets that a more clearly expressed method has not been fixed in the Constitution by which to arrive at a determination of the votes of the electoral colleges to go far away from all attempt to cure or remove this uncertainty, and to strike a blow at the whole structure of the electoral college, which must shatter it from foundation stone to turret; and when it has fallen, build up in its place a power in Congress which at any time may thwart the will of the people and render nugatory their deliberate and expressed sentiment; for, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in this bill from line 1 to the close which maintains or tends to maintain which maintains or tends to maintain

THE INTEGRITY OF THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

We are confronted with difficulties, it is said, in arriving at a result in the electoral college; but the bill is not one which by its methods brings us to a conclusion what the electoral college has done, but is a bill which in the boldest manner assails and destroys the electoral system. The first class of electoral votes that are tried by this bill are those where but one set of electoral certificates has been presented. The bill provides that even these may be rejected by the two Houses without reason or from such reason as may seem sufficient in the judgment of the two Houses. Have gentlemen reflected how early in this bill the fell blow which some gentlemen, I must believe, intend to strike at the electoral college, and to set up a congressional assumption instead, has been struck? The first one hundred lines show it. Massachusetts may come here with her vote certified as she has always sent it; she may have given 40,000 majority for Governor Hayes; and New York may come here with 40,000 majority which she has given for Governor Tilden; there may be no question whatever about a certificate, there is no duplicate return, but yet this committee could not, in treating such clear expression of the States, leave it without declaring in terms that all these claims, presumably covering nine-tenths of the electoral vote, may be rejected by both Houses without reason, or, as I have said, for reasons that seem to them fitting.

And the second class carries out the thought which must have all the time been possessing the minds of some or all the gentlemen of this committee, that although disputes have arisen and double certhis committee, that although disputes have arisen and double certificates have been presented from certain States giving rise to doubts as to what the electoral college had done, and the intervention of this tribunal is provided for, yet the question is not left for this tribunal to decide finally, as it had selected nine-tenths of the votes of the electoral college which may be overslanghed by both Houses where there is no dispute, it leaves the other tenth after it has passed through this commission, yet to be passed upon by the two Houses, and if they agree, to be rejected by them.

All the way through this bill—and that is what has alarmed me in studying its provisions—pitilessly moves along this

NEWLY CREATED POWER IN THE TWO HOUSES TO REGULATE AND CONTROL THE VOTE OF THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

OF THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

Where is this right gained, sir? By what provision? The electoral college stands as high as a constitutional monument as anything else that is provided in the Constitution for the American people; as high as the Presidency, the two Houses, or as the Supreme Court; and is the medium for the most supreme exercise of the free-man's right in this Republic. The power of Congress to throttle the electoral college is not under the right to "carry out" and put in operation constitutional provisions. It is not under the general power as to methods that so much talk has always been made about—this goes deeper, and inflicts wounds that are deadly.

The electoral college, Mr. Speaker, was adopted by the framers of the Constitution after much thought, discussion, and comparison and rejection of other plans for electing a President. It was the result the Constitution after much thought, discussion, and comparison and rejection of other plans for electing a President. It was the result of the straining out of other plans, the infirmities and vices of which were thoroughly considered. In the convention of 1787—and I have not the time to quote from the debates, but only to refer cursorily to the course this discussion and settlement finally took—the first view was to elect the President by the National Legislature. The convention at first seemed generally favorable to this plan. The States voted nine to one against popular election. Its advocates upon the floor of that convention, led by Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, were at first in a meager minority. Objections to the plan of electing by Congress were urged, that the Executive would not be independent; that the election would become open to corruption; and other plans were sought to be substituted. Elbridge Gerry, of Massachusetts, had a scheme by which the State governors were to elect the Executive of the United States. Finally, when the convention seemed to be inclining toward the selection of a President by the t = 0 Houses, the question of eligibility to re-election changed the currents of its Roger Sherman, the grandfather of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who has so ably and impressively spoken just now, gave the great weight of his opinion against the limitation of ineligibility to re-election, and re-election was clearly seen to be inconsistent with an election by Congress. Finally when the discussion seems to have lagged a new difficulty presented itself. If the two Houses elected how should it be done? On joint ballot or by vote of the separate Houses? This obstacle was fatal and the plan went to pieces. A special committee of one from each State was raised, to which the whole subject was committed; and as a result of its dewhich the whole subject was committed; and as a result of its deliberations the plan for congressional control and interference in this matter was deliberately abandoned and the electoral college was substituted and adopted. The advocates for a central government, like Mr. Hamilton, joined with the advocates for a direct popular election, and out of it came the provision for the electoral college.

That provision, sir, stands to-day as follows:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

And, to fix methods by which the vote of the electors should be arrived at, the framers of the Constitution embodied the provision

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of tepresentatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

On the 4th of September, 1787, the clause providing for opening the certificates and counting the votes was reported to the convention in this form:

The President of the Senate shall in that House open the certificates, and the votes shall be then and there counted. (See page 1486, third volume, Madison Papers.)

On the 6th of the same month (see page 1509) the following passage occurs in the journal:

On several motions, the words "in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" were inserted after the word "counted," &c.

Turning to page 1513 the clause is reported thus:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of depresentatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

This is the form in which it stood and still stands in the adopted Constitution. Why the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" were inserted before and not after the word "counted," as required by the amendment, does not appear by the Journal. If the clause had conformed to the amendment it would have read as follows:

The President of the Senate shall open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives.

But the "committee on style" changed the order of the sentence, not, as it will be seen, in any such way as to lodge in Congress any control over the matter.

General Dix, in his letter to Mr. Kasson upon this subject, says:

The first action of the framers of the Constitution in regard to this clause shows that it was not contemplated to open the certificates and count the votes in the presence of the House of Representatives, and that their final action was only designed to bring both branches of Congress together as spectators of the formality, according to the interpretation of the clause by Judge Kert, Judge Story, and other eminent public jurists, and not to confer on them any authority in regard to opening the certificates and counting the votes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not the time nor the inclination to enter into any ingenious discussion upon the force of these express words as though we were beginning to construe this provision before we should let it go into operation. That clause, Mr. Speaker, has stood from that day to this. That clause is the clause that to-day is constitutional law. Under it for forty years, with but one exception, the President of the Senate did proceed to count and declare the vote. Indeed, if gentlemen will dip at a venture into the volume of precedents compiled by order of this House, by its Committee on the Privileges and Powers of the House, they will see that in the years since 1830 the power of the Vice-President or President of the Senate has been regarded and acknowledged by both Houses.

Let any gentleman read the following journalized record of the

IN SENATE, January 28, 1841.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election.

Mr. Preston, Mr. Hubbard, and Mr. Huntington were appointed the committee.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 30, 1841.

On motion of Mr. Cushing, the House concurred in the following resolution of the Senate adopted on the 28th instant:

*Resolved**, That a committee be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election.

The following Representatives were appointed the committee on the part of the House: Messrs. Cushing, J. W. Jones, Granger, Dawson, and Atherton.

IN SENATE, February 2, 1841.

In Senate, February 2, 1841.

Mr. Preston, from the joint committee appointed on the subject of counting the, electoral vote, reported the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the two Houses will assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 10th instant, at twelve o'clock, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall amounce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid; which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

The resolution was agreed to and

The resolution was agreed to; and The Vice-President appointed Mr. Preston the teller on the part of the Senate.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 3, 1841.

The House of Representatives agrees to the foregoing resolution, and appoints Mr. Cushing and Mr. J. W. Jones tellers on its part.

On motion of Mr. Briggs, it was Ordered. That the Clerk inform the Senate that the House is now ready to receive the Senate, and to proceed in opening the certificates and in counting the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States.

IN THE PRESENCE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The Senate attended in the Hall of the House; the President of the Senate was invited to a seat provided for him on the right of the Speaker, which he occupied, and the Senators having taken seats set apart for their accommodation. The Vice-President of the United States, in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, proceeded to open the certificates of the electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, beginning with those of the State of Maine and ending with the State of Michigan; and the tellers, Mr. Preston, on the part of the Senate, and Messrs. Cushing and John W. Jones, on the part of the House, having read, counted, and registered the same, making duplicate lists thereof, and the lists being compared, they were delivered to the Vice-President of the United States, and are as follows:

Number of electors of each State.	States.	President.		Vice-President.
		William H. Harri- son, of Ohio.	Martin Van Buren, of New York.	John Tyler, of Vir- ginia,	R. M. Johnson, of Kentucky.	L. V. Tazewell, of Virginia.	James K. Polk, of Tennessee.

The Vice-President of the United States then announced to the two Houses the state of the vote for President of the United States, as delivered by the tellers, to

For William Henry Harrison, of Ohio. 234
For Martin Van Buren, of New York. 0

And the state of the vote for Vice-President of the United States, as delivered by the tellers, to be—  $\,$

For John Tyler, of Virginia.

For Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky

For Littleton W. Tazewell, of Virginia.

For James K. Polk, of Tennessee.

The Vice-President of the United States then declared that William Henry Harrison, of Ohio, having received a majority of the whole number of the electoral votes, was duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1841; and that John Tyler, of Virginia, having received a majority of the whole number of electoral votes, was duly elected Vice-President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1841.

IN SENATE, February 10, 1841.

Mr. Preston from the joint committee, reported, in further execution of their duties, the following resolution; which was agreed to:

*Resolved**, That a committee of one member of the Senate be appointed by that body, to join a committee of two members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the House, to wait on William Henry Harrison, of Ohio, and to notify him that he has been duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1841.

Mr. Preston was appointed on the part of the Senate.

Mr. Preston submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to: Resolved, That the President of the Senate do cause John Tyler, of Virginia, to be notified that he has been duly elected Vice-President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1841.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 10, 1841.

Mr. Cushing, from the joint committee appointed to ascertain and report a mode for ascertaining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of certifying the persons elected of their election, presented the following in continuation of their report:

Resolved, That a committee of one member of the Senate, to be appointed by that body, to join a committee of two members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by that House, to wait on William Henry Harrison, of Ohio, and to notify him that he has been duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1841.

Adopted.

UNIFORM TIME OF PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

An act to establish a uniform time for holding elections for electors of President and Vice-President in all the States of the Union.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the electors of President and Vice-President shall be appointed in each State on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November of the year in which they are to be appointed: Provided, That each State may by law provide for the filling of any vacancy or vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote: And provided also, When any State shall have held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and shall fail to make a choice on the day aforesaid, then the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the State shall by law provide.

Approved January 23, 1845.

ELECTION FOR THE FIFTEENTH TERM-1845.

JAMES K. POLK, President. GEORGE M. DALLAS, Vice-President.

IN SENATE, February 3, 1845.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election.

The President pro tempore appointed Mr. Walker, Mr. Woodbury, and Mr. Dayton the committee on the part of the Senate.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 4, 1845.

Mr. Burke moved that the House take up and concur with the following resolu-

Mr. Burke moved that the House take up and consistent to from the Senate:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election.

The motion was agreed to and the resolution was concurred in; and Mr. Burke, Mr. A. A. Chapman, Mr. J. R. Ingersoll, Mr. D. L. Seymour, and Mr. Vance were appointed the committee on the part of the House.

IN SENATE, February 7, 1845.

In Senate, February 7, 1845.

Mr. Walker, from the joint committee, reported the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the two Houses will assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 12th day of February, 1845, at twelve o'clock; that one person be appointed teller on the part of the Senate, and two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the House, to make a list of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who will announce to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid the state of the vote and the person or persons elected; if it shall appear that a choice hath been made agreeably to the Constitution of the United States; which amuniciation shall be deemed sufficient declaration of the persons elected; and that the said proceedings, together with a list of votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Mr. Walker was appointed the teller on the part of the Senate.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 7, 1845.

Mr. Burke submitted the report of the joint committee identical with that Mr. Walker submitted to the Senate as above.

The report was concurred in; and Mr. Burke and Mr. J. R. Ingersoll appointed tellers on the part of the House.

Mr. Burke announced that Mr. Ingersoll, one of the tellers appointed by the House, was unable, through indisposition, to attend, and he moved another teller be appointed in his place. The motion was agreed to; and Mr. J. P. Kennedy was appointed to serve as teller in place of Mr. Ingersoll.

IN THE PRESENCE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The hour set apart by a joint resolution of the Houses for counting the votes of electors for President and Vice-President, Mr. Brodhead moved that the Senate be informed that the House was now ready to receive them and proceed to the opening of the certificates and counting the votes given by the electoral colleges; which was agreed to.

The Senate soon after entered the Hall of the House of Representatives, two abreast, preceded by their Sergeant-at-Arms, who was succeeded by their President, Hon. Willie P. Mangum, and Secretary. Asbury Dickins, esq. 'The Senators took the seats prepared for them in the central area of the House, and the President of the Senate took the chair of the Speaker, (Hon. John W. Jones,) the lastnamed officer being seated on his left. The tellers took their seats at he Clerk's desk, assisted by the Secretary of the Senate and B. B. French, esq., Clerk of the House.

The President of the Senate rose, when the mean test of the seat of the Senate and B. B. French, esq., Clerk of the House.

House.

The President of the Senate rose, when the members of the House and Senators were all seated, and stated the object of their thus assembling to be to count the votes cast by the electors of the respective States of this Union for President and Vice-President of the United States; and handing to Mr. Walker (one of the tellers) a sealed packet, he said, "I deliver to the gentlemen tellers the votes of the electors of the State of Maine for President and Vice-President of the United States in order that they may be counted."

Mr. Walker received the packet, and, having broken the seals, the tellers examined the votes, which were announced to be nine in number, all of which were given for James K. Polk, of Tennessee, as President of the United States. The same number of votes for the Vice-President were given for George M. Dallas, of Pennsylvania.

The President next delivered to the tellers the votes of the electors of New Hampshire, and of all the other States of the Union in succession in the same manner, and they were examined by the tellers, and the result was announced with the same formalities. The final result stood thus:

And the state of the vote for Vice-President of the United States, as delivered. by the tellers, to be:

For George M. Dallas, of Pennsylvania.
For Theodore Frelinghuysen, of New York.

The President of the Senate pro tempore then declared that James K. Polk, of Tennessee, having received a majority of the whole number of the electoral votes, was duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1845; and

That George M. Dallas, of Pennsylvania, having received a majority of the whole number of the electoral votes, was duly elected Vice-President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1845.

The Senate then returned to its Chamber.

IN SENATE, February 12, 1845.

Mr. Walker, from the joint committee, reported the following resolution; which as considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of one member of the Senate be appointed by that body, to join a committee of two members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by that body, to wait on James K. Polk of Tennessee, and inform him that he has been duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1845; and also to wait on George M. Dallas, of Pennsylvania, and inform him that he has been duly elected Vice-President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1845.

Ordered, That Mr. Walker be the committee on the part of the Senate.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 14, 1845.

The House concurred in the foregoing resolution, and appointed Mr. Burke and Mr. Boyd the committee on its part.

He will see that the whole proceeding recognizes the count and declaration by the Vice-President. The tellers merely compute. The Vice-President "declares" everything. As in 1837, he "declares" that nobody has been elected Vice-President and announces the two names from whom the Senate may proceed to select a Vice-President for the next four years. He will find, if he looks at the record, and I will presume that it is given faithfully here, that, while in the proceedings taken by either House, in each case leading up to the ceremony of the count and declaration, the heading of Senate proceedings was: "In the Senate, January the 31st, 1849," and in the House was: "In the House of Representatives, February 2, 1849." That in the journal of proceedings when the count took place they are headed the journal of proceedings when the count took place they are headed in each case, "In the presence of the Senate and House of Represent-atives." If the two bodies were here to count and determine themselves, why was it that it was so carefully preserved and recorded that it was simply done "in the presence of the two Houses."

The provision remains, Mr. Speaker, and has stood from that day to this. It does not stand because it is obscure or because it has not been questioned. I do not deny that it has been assailed. It stands to-day unchanged and unamended in the Constitution. There is no law upon the statute-books put there by the two Houses of Congress that conflicts or interferes with it. So much for the sanction that time gives. The provision, assailed and contemned and despised as it is, in the view that it justifies the count by the President of the Senate, or Vice-President, a man who four years before the time he is to act has been intrusted with the second place in the gift of the people—that provision stands to-day, and I say again that there is no constitutional provision that has ever been able to be put there against it; there has been no legislative enactment put upon the statutebook that conflicts with it.

But it has been questioned, sir. By whom? It has been questioned by members of the House of Representatives and members of the Senate. For it was not to-day, Mr. Speaker, it was not yesterday nor last year when the tendency of the Congress to aggress and encroach on the rights of other departments of the Government began. The first blow was struck early in the history of the Gevernment, and from that day to this there have been members of Congress in either branch that assailed this construction of the counting and declaring of the votes by the Vice-President. And the utterances of these members are carefully marshaled by gentlemen as proof that this clause of the Constitution cannot be so construed. Why, sir, taking them at their best they are but citations from sources naturally seeking to encroach and gain power. Is there any citation of a precedent of a single State Legislature ever resolving that the President of the Senate shall not count the vote in the electoral college, unless at the present time there may have been some such resolution passed under pressure?

Why, sir, the precedents that are so much talked of are all in the line where they would naturally be found. No assault upon this provision has come from the people or from the State Legislatures that direct the appointment of these electors. From these sources there has never been a voice against the count being made by the President of the Senate and the integrity of the electoral college maintained thereby. Through it all the Constitution remains precisely as it was found when in 1789 Congress was met by the count of the electoral vote. The provision stands to-day as it stood then. And what did vote. The provision stands to-day as it stood then. And what did the first Congress do, in which there were many men who had helped to frame the Constitution? They found this provision; it had to be carried into effect. There was no Vice-President. The Constitution had not been set to work, so far as the officers elected under it were concerned. What did the first Congress proceed to do? They were confronted, as we are confronted, with the presence of the vote of the electoral college. Did they proceed to consider it in the two Houses and decide? No. Did they proceed to legislate as to a method or a court?
By no means. Did they create any tribunal? The farthest from it.
But as the Constitution had provided what officer should do this important duty, and as no such officer was in existence. Congress proportant duty, and as no such officer was in existence, Congress proceeded to make a President of the Senate for the purpose of counting and declaring the vote of the electoral college.

I transport myself, sir, in imagination back to that scene. The framers of the Constitution sitting in the Senate and in the House, confronted as we are confronted by the presence of the electoral college. I fail to find, because three generations had not sharpened the thirst for congressional assumption—I fail to find any indication that any member of either body had a question but that the only thing to do was to create the officer that the Constitution had provided for to count and declare the vote, which they then and there proceeded to do.

Here is the record of what the fathers did. It speaks for itself. April 6, 1789.

April 6, 1789.

The Senate proceeded by ballot to the choice of a President for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States.

John Langdon, esq., was elected.

Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed in the presence of the House to discharge that duty; and that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose; who reported that he had delivered the message.

The House responded as follows:

Mr. Boudinot, from the House of Representatives, communicated the following verbal message to the Senate:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House is ready forthwith to meet the Senate to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the President and Vice-President of the United States.

The votes having been counted and the two Houses having returned to their respective Chambers, the following occurred, as appears by the Journal:

Mr. Madison, from the House of Representatives, thus addressed the Senate:
Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House have agreed that the notifications of the election of the President and of the Vice-President of the United States should be made by such persons and in such manner as the Senate shall be pleased to direct.

And he withdrew.

Whereupon the Senate appointed Charles Thompson, esq., to notify George Washington, esq., of his election to the office of President of the United States of America, and Mr. Sylvanus Bourne to notify John Adams, esq., of his election to the office of Vice-President of the said United States.

Ordered that Mr. Patterson, Mr. Lee, Mr. Ellsworth, be a committee to prepare the certificates of the election of the President and of the Vice-President of the United States, and to prepare letters to George Washington, esq., and to John Adams, esq., to accompany the said certificates respectively.

The following is the form of the certificates respectively.

States of America, being convened in the city and State of New York, the sixth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, the underwritten, appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes of the electors, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and for a Vice-President; by which it appears that George Washington, esq., was unanimously elected, agreeably to the Constitution, to the office of President of the United States of America.

One word, Mr. Speaker, as to the CONSTRUCTION OF THIS TRIBUNAL.

It is provided that five members may be taken from the Supreme Court, who shall have a controlling influence in its deliberations.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that the time yielded to me by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has expired, but inasmuch as I shall have in my own right directly after the members of the committee have finished one hour, perhaps there will be no objection to my going on for ten minutes, the same to be counted as a part of that hour, and then I will yield the remainder of it, when I obtain the floor, to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Garfield] and to my colleague, [Mr.

FRYE.]
Mr. PAYNE. I hope that may be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope that may be done by unanimous consent. No objection was made.

Mr. HALE. To begin with, the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States is carefully left out in framing this commission. Was it because of infirmity in him, or infirmity in the scheme? Some officer is to preside over this great commission. The bill provides that the senior associate justice shall perform that important duty. Why not the Chief-Justice? If it was thought desirable to select four from the associate justices, why was it not left to them in their discretion, if they should see fit to do so, to select the successor of Marshall and Taney to preside over the tribunal? If you assume that such a tribunal should be created, there is nothing in the office of Chief-Justice that should exempt him from such a duty.

that such a tribunal should be created, there is nothing in the office of Chief-Justice that should exempt him from such a duty. When Great Britain made up the tribunal at Geneva, so far as she made it up, she selected Chief-Justice Cockburn who there acted. If you go into the Supreme Court at all, why not take its head to preside over this commission? The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar,] in reply to a question from the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT,] said that it was done for political reasons, from a desire to avoid anything that might seem to be unfair in indicating the selection.

Mr. HOAR. I said so far as I was concerned.
Mr. HALE. Yes, so far as he was concerned. That throws light upon what really governed in the construction of this tribunal so far as the Supreme Court is concerned. The explanation that has been given that one judge was taken because he represents Maine, another because he represents Pennsylvania, another because he represents Iowa, and another because he represents California, cannot hold at all. Represents what? Represents law? Represents in the presidential election? Sir, there is nothing in the nature of representation affected by these localities.

The sober fact, the undoubted fact, is that these gentlemen were selected because two of them were known or believed to be of one selected because two of them were known or believed to be of one party in politics and two of the other. Behind the two who are democrats will be in solid column five democratic Senators and Representatives. Behind the two who are republicans will be five Senators and Representatives who are republicans, and the two forces are to be there, with the two judges in front of each, as political forces; and the fifth justice who is to be selected is to be the man who de-

I listened the other day in the Senate to the stately march of tropes, metaphors, and illustrations framed in a rich setting, picturing what might be the manifold evils of a single man deciding this presidential contest. In the midst of it all there seemed to be forgotten or ignored what is the fact, that out of this bill, scan it as you may, apply practical common sense to it as you must, will come the result that a single man is to decide who has been elected President of the United States. And because of the fear that the Vice-President, second in the Republic holding a political office, shall do it, the judiciary is rudely invaded, and a man is taken from there and brought to confront this political contest and to decide it for the American people.

Sir, this is a step that should have been the last taken. There is danger enough already of bringing the members of that court into politics. Why was it done? Whether it is because one of those judges was thought likely to be selected that he has already been selected by one of the political parties in this land for the office of United States Senator, I cannot tell. But it is unfortunate that the selection comes so closely upon the heel of the plan of this tribunal. No man here has been so careful to keep the judiciary clear of any charge of interference with politics as the gentleman from Massachusetts on my left, [Mr. Hoar.] But now he has aided to select a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States to pass upon the question of electing a President. Sir, this is a step that should have been the last taken. There is

WHAT SHALL THIS TRIBUNAL DO AND HOW FAR MAY IT GO?

I see that I have not the time fully to go into that question. I hope gentlemen will with the greatest care examine the provisions of this bill in relation to the jurisdiction that this commission may take. The bill declares that, where two or more sets of electoral certificates are presented-

When all objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and by a majority of votes decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration.

How far under this may this tribunal go in wresting from the States their last rights? There is no charter in this bill that limits and controls the commission. It is a charter that extends and amplifies. I should hold, notwithstanding, that the commission would have no power to go into the questions as to who have been elected in the several States. But who can tell what the tribunal may do? Here is what an eminent lawyer of New York wrote a few weeks ago for the people to read:

If what has been said be founded in sound reason, the two Houses of Congress, when inquiring what votes are to be counted, have the right to go behind the certificate of any officers of a State, to ascertain who have and who have not been appointed electors. The evidence which these Houses will receive upon such inquiry it is for them and them only to prescribe, in the performance of their highest functions and the exercise of their sincerest judgment.

The gentleman who wrote these words, [Mr. FIELD,] largely because of having written them, is now a member upon this floor. He was taken from his profession in New York and brought here. And although he is a modest man, and since he has been here has taken no part though he is a modest man, and since he has been here has taken no part in the proceedings, I am bound to believe that my friend on the other side will not consent to lose the opportunity of securing his efforts and ability as a member of this tribunal. When all this has been done, Mr. Speaker, and you have at last got a President, not quite likely the one elected by the American people under the forms of the Constitution and the laws, the mischief and woe of the future begin.

You have broken down the electoral college; you have put a premium on presidential contests carried on after the November elections; you invite the Congress to come in and arbitrarily settle the tions; you invite the Congress to come in and arbitrarily settle the question. Indeed, if at any time a Congress has betrayed its trust and has fallen out of the favor of the people, you will yet be unable to elect a President over it.

The rights of the people, the rights of the States dissolve and disappear. They are represented by the shifting, receding shore, constantly melting away, being swallowed up by the resistless, aggran-

Against such an assumption of power in Congress I set myself as firmly as I may. Whatever the danger that may be in the sky, it is better met by adherence to the spirit of the Constitution.

Irresponsible power always seizes upon some occasion of exaggerated danger to the state as an excuse for its encroachments. The American people have never been threatened with such an aggression as to-day seeks to ride rough-shod over all the forms and observances of the past

Should the bill pass, whatever measure of support the American people may seem to give to it will be no test of the after-view which thoughtful men will take of the movement. It is fraught with the gravest of dangers, and time will show it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, obtained the floor.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from New York yields to me for a moment that a dispatch may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS, January 25, 1877.

Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR, M. C. : A resolution fully indorsing and approving the electoral bill now before Congress passed the Massachusetts house of representatives this afternoon by a vote of 189 to 19.

STILLMAN B. ALLEN.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Speaker, although I think that this bill transcends in importance any measure which is likely to come before Congress during the present generation of men, if I were to consult my own inclinations I would be quite content to refrain from taking any part in the debate, and to let the question be decided upon its intrinsic merits, with the clear light which has been shed upon it by the conclusive arguments of the members of the committee who by the conclusive arguments of the members of the committee who have preceded me. But unhappily circumstances which I never could have anticipated, have placed me in such a position with reference to one of the great parties of the country as to give to 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 of voters the right to ask me a question which I am bound to answer, and I may as well admit that they are exercising this right with unbounded liberality by post and by telegraph. They have acquired this right because I have assured them of my belief that the election in November last resulted in the choice of the democratic candidates for President and Vice-President. As nothing has occurred since, which could otherwise than strengthen this conviction, as well in their minds as in my own, they are naturally led to ask me why, as a member of the joint committee which has reported this bill I have given my assent to a measure which departs from the "ancient ways" by which the result of twenty-two presidential elections have been determined, and which, if adhered to, would surely result in the formal declaration of the election of our candidates. This question I propose to answer fully, freely, and without any reserve whatever.

The main opposition which we had to meet in the late election was the influence of the Administration, exerted in the organization of its partisans, in the use of patronage, in the control of the personal services of the office-holders, in the levying of assessments, in the direction of the press, and in countless other channels, which a party long in power knows well how to use. After their defeat in November there still remained intact the organization, and the powerful will to direct it to its own preservation and perpetuation. The electoral votes necessary to insure the success of its candidates were claimed without delay, and the means taken to have them counted through the agency of State administrations and returning boards under the control of the republican leaders in Florida and Louisiana. disputed vote in Oregon, 185 votes were thus nominally secured for Hayes and Wheeler, with prima facie certificates more or less regular to sustain the claim.

It only remained to find some means by which these votes could be counted and declared under the existing statute regulating the time and manner of opening the certificates and declaring the result. The plan for effecting this object was speedily agreed upon. The twenty-second joint rule, under which the results of the three last presidential elections had been ascertained and declared, was repealed by the Senate. This deprived the House of the right previously existing to throw out the vote of a State by an objection to its validity. Thus the votes of Florida and Louisians, no matter how fraudulent might be the returns and worthless the certificates besed thereon were be the returns and worthless the certificates based thereon, were made secure to the republican candidate. But in order that they might be counted at all, it became indispensable to assert the claim of the Vice-President not merely to open, but to count the votes, first deciding upon their validity, in all cases where there were duplicate certificates or disputed elections. This claim was therefore promptly set up, and during this week has been boldly maintained in the Senate Chamber by the men who have been most conspicuous in the management of the late election.

The scheme was thus complete for counting Tilden out, and counting Hayes in. I became satisfied that unless this reheme should meet with opposition from the more conservative members of the republican party, it would be executed; that the President of the Senate would count the votes and declare the result; and that the President of the United States would deliver up his high office to the successor so declared, and by the use of the troops already concentrated in Washington see that he was duly inaugurated.

Of course the House of Representatives would not be silent and passive spectators of this programme. They would insist upon their constitutional right to participate in the counting of the vote, the ascertainment and declaration of the result. They would count the votes of Florida and Louisiana for Tilden and Hendricks, and would record the result on the Journal and make the formal declaration of their election to the offices of President and Vice-President. This duty made incumbent upon them by the Constitution and their oaths of office they could not, from any fear of the consequences, refuse to

Thus would result two Presidents and two Vice-Presidents claiming each to be lawfully chosen, and demanding recognition at home and abroad.

The logical result of such a state of affairs is civil war, or possibly, but hardly in the light of contemporary experience among our neighbors, one or the other party might content himself by asserting his rights upon paper, and be satisfied with the empty honors of a pronuctamiento. But such a course is scarcely to be expected from a race which carried on the wars of the Parliament, which executed Charles I, carried on the wars of the Parliament, which executed Charles I, deposed James II, threw off its allegiance to George III, and preserved the Union against attempted secession, at a countless cost of blood and treasure. But if acquiescence were possible, it would not be peace, prosperity, and plenty for the people. Usurpation never brings contentment or confidence. The springs of industry would be dried up and the fountains of capital cease to flow. But, what would be worse, the respect for the Constitution, essential to free government, would be destroyed in the minds of more than half the voters of the country. It would be greenfly accented that resurration was of the country. It would be generally accepted that usurpation was to be the law of succession, and by common consent we would be glad to take refuge in military despotism as the only panacea "for all our

to take refuge in military despotism as the only panacea "for all our woes." The experiment of free government would thus utterly fail at the close of the first century of its existence, thus confirming the experience of all history as to the ultimate decadence of free nations. But if the usurpation were not acquiesced in, civil war with all its horrors would ensue, and the strife would penetrate into every household in the land. The end no man could foresee, save the refuge sooner or later in the all-embracing guardianship of an imperial ruler. In either event, then, the objects which the democratic party had most at heart in the recent struggle would be utterly lost. These objects were not the election of any man to the Presidency, or the es-objects were not the election of any man to the Presidency, or the establishment of any special financial policy as contrasted with that of our opponents. In fact the platforms of the two parties were scarcely distinguishable from each other in principle. What we aimed to

First. Reform in the administration by which the personal character it had of late years assumed should cease to exist, and public offices filled by men who could comprehend and act upon the old-fashioned principle, which has been better formulated in the constitution of Massachusetts than elsewhere within my knowledge, that "government is instituted not for the profit, honor, or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men."

The second and still more important object, underlying indeed all other motives, was to preserve the Constitution from being destroyed by the use of the military power in the elections, or in the main-tenance in the several States of government, not resting upon the will of the people.

A series of statutes doubtless the inevitable fruit of the war of the secession had been enacted, under color of which the Federal authority had been used in a manner which excited the alarm, and called for the condemnation of patriotic and thoughtful men without regard to party. Especially in the State of Louisiana in 1872 had been enacted a scene unprecedented in our history, filling the minds of men with fear for the permanence of constitutional government. By the order of a dranken judge, signed in the dark hours of the night, away from the domicile of justice, the lawful government of a sovereign State had been rudely overturned, and the usurping power which had taken its place was sustained by the arm of Federal power, acting through files of soldiers invading the halls of legislation, and dragging from their seats, the representatives of a people to whom a republican form of government had been guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.

The pretended and fraudulent government thus created had been kept in its place only by the military power of the Federal Governkept in its place only by the military power of the Federal Government; and when once overthrown by a sudden breath of popular discontent, it had been promptly restored by the orders of the President of the United States, through his Secretary of War, the military and not the judicial branch of the Government. Against this violation of the Constitution the best men of all parties did not hesitate to protest, and yet, when the late election came to pass, this fabricated government still existed in Louisiana, controlling all the machinery of justice of legislation and of election. Its arturning heart approach justice, of legislation, and of election. Its returning board pos ernment still existed in Louisiana, controlling all the machinery of justice, of legislation, and of election. Its returning board possessed an odor peculiarly its own, with which every voter in the United States was familiar. Many of these who had heretofore acted with the republican party perceived, that if this practice of military interference should become incorporated, by the tacit consent of the people into the permanent fabric of the government, the Constitution would be destroyed, the principles of liberty undermined, and the way prepared for the early establishment of a military despotism. Hence, reluctantly, but moved by convictions of conscience, they joined themselves to the democratic party, and engaged as they believed in a death struggle for the preservation of their rights and liberties.

Now these rights and liberties, for which we had made so gallant and successful afight, would equally perish whether a President should come in by usurpation, even if acquiesced in by the people, or whether, if not acquiesced in, civil war should be the result.

There was no escape from this deplorable position except by agreement between the conservative and patriotic men of both parties, who prefer the good of the country to the success of party, upon some method by which the incoming President should be accepted by all parties as the lawful Executive of the General Government. For one, partisan as from my position I was supposed to be, but patriotic as I hope henceforth to be regarded, I deemed it my plain duty to labor zealously toward the attainment of some just and constitutional plan, whereby but one President should be declared, and by a title which all citizens would respect, and no considerable number of voters would dispute. It was essential to the formation of such a plan that it should be constitutional; that it should be so absolutely fair between the two political parties, that neither could possibly claim or take any advanbe constitutional; that it should be so absolutely fair between the two political parties, that neither could possibly claim or take any advan-tage by reason of its provisions; that the scales of judgment should be so evenly poised that the dust in the balance would incline the be so evenly poised that the dust in the balance would incline the beam. Such a plan, in my judgment, the committee were able to agree upon and have presented to Congress, and this plan has already received the sanction of the Senate by a majority so overwhelming as to indicate its triumphant passage through this House. No man can predict who will become President by virtue of its operation, but all men can predict that it will be the man who is lawfully entitled to be President. If the law should violate the equity of the case, it is ground for the amendment of the law, but not of rebellion against its decrees.

The proposed plan of sattlement for it is a measure of with

The proposed plan of settlement, for it is a measure of settlement and not of compromise, provides for a commission on which each branch of Congress and each political party is equally represented by five of their members to be chosen viva voce and not by the presiding officer. To these are added five men who by their elevated position and long service in the Supreme Court of the land have gained the respect and absolute confidence of the country. They have been long removed from the influence of party politics, and, holding life offices, are above all the temptations and blandishments of power. For them, then, there is neither reward nor higher honors. They have already reached the summit of human preferment, for a great and just judge is the glory of humanity. To no men in history has ever been confided a greater trust than this bill proposes to confer, the duty of deciding between conflicting parties as to who shall be the ruler of forty-five millions of free people. It is impossible to conceive that such a trust shall not be faithfully discharged, with the eyes not only of this people, The proposed plan of settlement, for it is a measure of settlement of free people. It is impossible to conceive that such a trust such a great duty will be performed with an eye solely to the glory of God and the good of His people.

On the subject of the constitutionality of this measure it does not

On the subject of the constitutionality of this measure it does not become me as a layman to say more than that I am bound to accept the opinion of the twelve lawyers with whom I have been associated on the country, that the bill is not unconstitutional.

On the subject of the composition of the committee it is however proper for me to say that I found myself on a committee with thirteen lawyers. As a matter of course, it was to be expected that it would be very difficult for one layman to keep straight thirteen lawyers, each having his own construction of the provisions of the lawyers, each having his own construction of the provisions of the Constitution on this subject. [Laughter.] I did what I could. I labored without ceasing to keep their minds in the right direction; and they assure me—all but one—that I succeeded, and that the plan upon which we have agreed is constitutional.

But even if no express warrant for it could be found in that instrument, it is clearly within its spirit, which we have so often invoked in times of peril, as when we made the Louisiana purchase; when we preserved the Union against the heresy of secession; and when we adopted the policy of reconstruction, rendered necessary by oc-currences which the Constitution had never contemplated. That in-strument declares that it was established "to form a more perfect strument declares that it was established "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Surely none of these ends will be gained, and they will all irretrievably perish, if by neglect of Congress the country is allowed to drift into civil war, or be ruled for four years by a President who, by a majority of the people, will be regarded as a usurper, when, by the establishment of a fair tribunal, the questions in controversy can be settled to the satisfaction of the great mass of the people of this country.

There are men, it is true, who think that the Constitution was not established for these beneficent purposes, so much as to give occasion for tablished for these beneficent purposes, so much as to give occasion for casuists to draw nice distinctions and for the display of the powers of the human intellect, just as a great German physician frankly thanks divine Providence for the existence of disease, because it enables man to develop his marvelous skill in effecting cures. Doubtless when the last trump is sounded there will be found men splitting hairs, unconscious that the day of judgment is at hand.

nnconscious that the day of judgment is at hand.

So far as one can judge from public utterances, the proposed measure of settlement is sustained by the country at large and opposed only by the office-holding and office-seeking interests. A hundred thousand place-holders in esse and an equal number of place-hunters in posse are busily attacking this bill and its authors, and for the same reason as did the Ephesian "worker in copper" the early Christians, "it threatens to spoil their trade." Whetever be the real motives of this class, they shoot the arrows of opposition from behind the shield of the Constitution. Admitting the gravity of the situation, involving perchance war and the very existence of the Republic, they shake their frowning heads and declare "nothing can be done; the Constitution forbids." stitution forbids."

A story is told of a young Oxonian, that he stood on the river's bank and saw a fellow-student drown without making an effort to save him, because a formal introduction had not passed between them. Shall a ship be allowed to drift upon the rocks because the right man Shall a ship be allowed to drift upon the rocks because the right man does not happen to be on deck to give the order to "port the helm?" Are constitutions intended to be ends or means, means for the preservation of liberty and order? The framers of the Constitution of the United States drew in bold lines the great principles and framework of Government. Sensible men, they left details to be worked out, as occasion might arise, in the light of necessity and experience, by the legislative department. They did not cut out a tight, inelastic garment to fit the five millions of people strung along the Atlantic slope, and intend to bind the limbs and smother forty millions of their descendants, spread over a continent.

Unconstitutional! Why, the very Unconstitutional! Why, the very spirit and essence, the pineal gland of the Constitution is in the proposed measure. The old Saxon love of liberty and order is there. It contains the genius of Magna Charta, the great petition of right, the settlement of 1688, the Declaration of Independence. It substitutes law and order and right for strife, anarchy, and wrong. It means that whoever shall hold the executive office, shall hold it by the consent, and with the support of all the people of this land. It means that the wheels of business shall again be put in motion, and the welcome hum of vast industries shall again be heard, that the waiting laborer shall have work and his wife and children bread. It means the supremacy of the civil to the military power, teaching the needed lesson that the soldier is the servant, tary power, teaching the needed lesson that the soldier is the servant, and not the master, of the people, who pay his wage, the drone in the human hive, to be dispensed with when he becomes troublesome to the workers. It means the preservation of the autonomy of the States, and the right of the people therein to regulate and administer their local affairs, without interference from any quarter. Lastly, it means oblivion of all the bitterness of the past, security for the present, hope for the future.

shape, and reduce their intellect to the measure of those of a Flat-head Indian.

One more objection and I am done. It is alleged on the republican side that it is a measure to make Tilden President, and on the demoside that it is a measure to make Tilden President, and on the democratic side that it is a measure to make Hayes President. Can a greater tribute be paid to the absolute fairness of this legislation? For myself I frankly declare that I do not know, and have not allowed myself to speculate upon the result, except that both candidates cannot come in; that the one who has been lawfully elected will be inaugurated, and that, while the dangers of civil war will thus be averted, the Constitution, and the respect for it in the popular mind, which is essential to the preservation of that great charter of our rights and liberties, will not be weakened or destroyed.

The passage of this measure of peace and conciliation will fitly close the great events of the first century of the Republic, and inaugurate that era of peace and prosperity which, if our free institutions can be maintained, will mark the second century of our existence as the most maintained, will mark the second century of our existence as the most marvelous period in the history of the human race. Let it be re-membered that the establishment of our Government was contemmembered that the establishment of our Government was contemporaneous with the birth of chemistry, the invention of the steamengine, and the declaration by Adam Smith of these principles of exchange between nations, which have revolutionized the commerce of the world, and made it possible for mankind to realize hereafter the doctrines of "liberty, equality, and fraternity" for which enthusiasts have dreamed, and men have waited through the weary ages, erying out of the depths "How long, O Lord, how long?" With peace and freedom assured, the great problem of the relations of capital and labor, will find its solution in a land which has been endowed with a wealth of resources beyond the wildest dreams of avarice, whereof the proper development and the just distribution will leave no man the proper development and the just distribution will leave no man, who is willing to labor, without the means of living a life worthy of the high destiny for which humanity was intended by the Great Author of its being. To this great end, the men who record their votes in favor of this measure will surely contribute, and be remembered, with everlasting gratitude, as statesmen who preferred country to party, order to anarchy, constitutional government to civil strife, and steady progress in civilization to the premature decay and needless destruction of the only nation with whom rests, so far as human judgment can see, the present hope of the oppressed sons of toil, from whatever clime they may turn their weary gaze to this land of promise, with the unceasing prayer, springing from countless souls, "Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces."

Mr. WILLIS. My colleague yields to me that I may read a telegram which I have just received, and which is pertinent to the discussion of the present bill:

NEW YORK, January 25, 1877.

Hon. BENJAMIN A. WILLIS, House of Representatives:

House of Representatives:

The committee on memorial to Congress of citizens of New York, presented by you to the House of Representatives, unanimously unite in congratulating you upon the passage by the Senate of the electoral commission bill, and beg leave to express the hope that the House of Representatives will speedily relieve the anxieties of the country by the passage of the bill as it comes from the Senate.

WM. E. DODGE, Chairman.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT, Secretary.

I am much obliged to my colleague for his courtesy.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Monroe.]

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House now take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the debate continue this afternoon until the expiration of the hour of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hewitt.] The Chair understands that gentleman to yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Monroe.]

New York, [Mr. Hewitt.] The Chair understands that gentleman to yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Monroe.]

Mr. Monroe. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Springer. I think unanimous consent might be given that the gentleman from Ohio shall occupy his ten minutes after the recess and that the House adjourn now.

The SPEARER. The Chair thinks that the House had better make use of all the time it possibly can. There are more than seventy gentlemen who desire to be heard.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Speaker, I have sincerely desired to lend my support to some bill to regulate the counting of the electoral vote which should relieve Congress and the country of solicitude and give assurance of satisfactory results. When the joint committee of the two Houses was appointed, I hoped to be able to vote for such measures as they should agree in recommending. Certainly, the pathe two Houses was appointed, I hoped to be able to vote for such measures as they should agree in recommending. Certainly, the patience, the industry, the ability, and the patriotism exhibited by the committee, justified the expectation that they would present some plan, if it were at all practicable, upon which all could unite. And now I deeply regret that I cannot vote for the measure which has been reported. I have given it much careful and candid consideration, but have encountered difficulties which have proved insuperable.

1. In discussing this bill, the first question which presents itself is, what are its relations to the Constitution?

The twelfth article of the amendments declares that the electoral what are its relations to the Constitution?

The twelfth article of the amendments declares that the electoral votes "shall be counted." This language both imposes a duty and grants a power. There must then be somebody—some man, or body of men—upon whom the obligation is laid, to whom the power is granted. We cannot conceive of a command which is addressed to no one, of a grant of power made to no one. There are but three parties named in the Constitution in connection with this grant of power. These are the Vice-President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives. Hence the power to count the vote, which we have agreed exists somewhere, must be found in one or more of these. There is no pretense whatever that the power has been granted to other parties outside of these. To which of them then does the power belong ?

Upon this question, there have been three theories, which have received such a degree of favor as to entitle them to notice.

According to the first of these, the Vice-President is to count the electoral vote. This means not merely that he is to receive the cercleetoral vote. This means not merely that he is to receive the certificates, retain the custody of them, and open them in the presence of the two Houses, of which he is to act as the presiding officer. This theory further holds that the Vice-President is the final authority upon disputed questions. He alone decides what are, and what are not, votes to be counted, and, having completed the count, he declares what number of votes has been received by each candidate, and which of the candidates, if any, has a majority of the votes of all the electors appointed.

I do not propose to discuss the merits of this theory here—to inquire I do not propose to discuss the merits of this theory here—to inquire whether it is right or wrong. It is sufficient for the purposes of my argument to state, what is well known, that it is a theory which is firmly held, not only by many great lawyers in the country, but by a considerable number of members of this House—especially upon this side of the House. They may be entirely mistaken, but they honestly believe that the Constitution grants to the Vice-President the power to count the electoral vote in the sense here explained. To such members of the House it is a matter of the greatest practical moment to inquire what has become of their cherished constitutional doctrine—one which they believe they have sworn to support in the doctrine—one which they believe they have sworn to support—in the measure now before the House. I was about to say that this doctrine is entirely ignored in the bill of the committee. But this would trine is entirely ignored in the bill of the committee. But this would be a very inadequate and incorrect statement of the case. The bill absolutely and irrevocably deprives the Vice-President of all power to ascertain and decide what are the lawful electoral votes of a State. If the Constitution confers any such power upon the Vice-President, it is wholly abrogated by this measure, which permits him to perform only the humblest clerical duties. If he has this power, what right has this House—what right has Congress to give it to another? How can members of Congress who hold this theory regard this bill otherwise than as unconstitutional? It attempts to repeal what is to them a portion of the Constitution. How then are they to vote for it? to vote for it?

to vote for it?

It may be said that this theory is an extreme one, that it is held only by a comparatively small number of members on this side of the House, and that hence it will not stand much in the way of the passage of the bill. But, if I mistake not, other doctrines, held in other parts of this Hall, are equally inconsistent with the proposed plan. The second of the three theories of which I was to speak, is to the effect that the two Houses of Congress, under the Constitution, are to count the electoral vote, but in the sense that no electoral vote can be received without the approval of both. According to this theory either House can, at will, reject the vote of any State. The power to reject is supposed to exist especially in the House of Representatives. This theory is held generally on the other side of the House. The chairman of the select committee on counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, recently submitted a report which declares:

That in the counting of the electoral votes, no vote can be counted against the

That in the counting of the electoral votes, no vote can be counted against the judgment and determination of the House of Representatives.

The doctrine is that the Constitution has vested in the House, without limit, this power over the votes of all the States. I regard this view as a very dangerous one. It is strongly disapproved on this side of the House, but it is as strongly held on the other, and to our friends there, a question is unavoidably raised as to the disposition the bill before us makes of this theory. The answer is that it plainly deprives the House of this supposed constitutional right. For instance, the commission may decide that the electoral votes furnished by the returning board of Louisiana shall be received and counted. When that decision is reported to the two Houses, the House of Representatives has lost its right, if right it had, to reject these votes on its separate "judgment and determination." It can reject only by concurrent action with the Senate. If the power to reject at will has been conferred upon the House by the Constitution, what right has the House, what right have both Houses, to delegate this power to others? What right has Congress, even with the help of the President, to annul any constitutional power of the House? And how can those who have so earnestly contended for this power of the House, sustain by their votes the measure now under discussion?

The last theory to be noticed is, that the Houses must count the out limit, this power over the votes of all the States. I regard this

The last theory to be noticed is, that the Houses must count the votes, but with the limitation that an electoral vote can be rejected only by the concurrent action of both. This doctrine is earnestly advocated by many members as containing an indispensable safeguard of the rights of the States. But it is disregarded by this bill. If the vote of a State is rejected by this commission, its decision must stand unless overruled by the concurrent action of both Houses. In this case, if either House continues in favor of rejecting the vote of the case, if either House continues in favor of rejecting the vote of the State, it cannot be received. It is difficult to see how those of us who have insisted that the maintenance of this doctrine is essential to the protection of the rights of the States, can support a bill which so entirely disregards it.

I pass to another topic wholly distinct from the question who is to do the counting. Can the person or body that counts go back of the returns from a State to ascertain how those returns were obtained, and to decide upon the legality of the methods which were employed? Many of us hold that the Constitution forbid this; that it is a plain invasion of the proper sphere of the State, and that neither the Vice-President nor one nor both of the Houses can do it. It is very prop-President nor one nor both of the Houses can do it. It is very properly urged that if it can be done in one case it can be done in another; that if the returns from Louisiana may be rejected, so may be those of Massachusetts, and that, let the precedent be once fully established, the rights of the States are wholly at the mercy of that person or body which shall count the electoral vote. The conservative principle which would protect the States from this danger, is disregarded by the bill. The commission is to judge for itself whether it may go behind the returns from a State, and, in any case where it may do so, it requires the concurrent action of both Houses to overle its decision. Certainly such a plan cannot be supported by those rule its decision. Certainly such a plan cannot be supported by those who hold that, not even Congress, by the concurrent, affirmative action of both its Houses, can set aside the regular returns which the duly authorized officers of a State may forward.

Mr. Speaker, I felt much gratified, when the very able report of the joint committee was read to the House, to hear it stated in a portion of that report that "the law proposed is inconsistent with few of the principal theories on the subject." Subsequent examination has, however, convinced me that the committee, in their earnest desire to however, convinced me that the committee, in their earnest desire to do the country a great service, had not sufficiently considered this point. I cannot resist the conclusion myself, and I think I have proved that the bill conflicts with most of the principal theories on the subject which have obtained in this House. The practical difficulty is that we are asked to vote for the bill which thus sharply conflicts with our cherished constitutional theories. Whoever may be charged with disregard of constitutional convictions, the charge certainly cannot be made against those who in obedience to such convictions refrain from voting for this very propular measure.

certainly cannot be made against those who in obedience to such convictions refrain from voting for this very popular measure.

2. A grave objection to this bill is found in the use which it proposes to make of the judges of the Supreme Court. It is commonly reported that the four gentlemen referred to in the bill are selected with some reference to supposed political antecedents, with the intention of giving to each of the two great parties precisely equal advantages. These four are to choose a fifth, and in case of a vacancy by death, or otherwise, the remaining justices in filling it, are to have regard to "the impartiality and freedom from bias sought by the original appointments." Now all this is quite in accordance with the spirit of fairness by which the committee were evidently governed in all their work. We honor their motives, but we may well question the soundness of the policy which assigns to judges of the Supreme Court this representative, political relation. The position is a painful and embarrassing one. It exposes them to the possibility of bitter denunciation in case they should fail to meet the expectation of political parties. It impairs that unquestioning confidence which the whole people have heretofore reposed in the judges of their highest tribunal. Let this bill become a law, and hereafter appointments to the Supreme Bench will be closely scanned with reference to their political characters. Bench will be closely scanned with reference to their political character, and partisan fidelity will gradually become a condition of being placed in this high office. The same heated political contests would soon be carried on in regard to the appointment of our highest judges which now exist in connection with the election of governors and members of Congress. The bill provides, that nothing in it shall be held to impair the right of any one to prosecute his claim to the office of President or Vice-President before the courts of the United States. But there would certainly be small encouragement to any defeated candidate to contest his election before a court a majority of feated candidate to contest his election before a court a majority of whose judges may already have virtually decided against him in the tribunal established by this measure. It would seem as if the right of a candidate would have been in this way about as effectually im-of a candidate would have been in this way about as effectually impaired as it could be by anything short of absolute destruction.

3. There are other objections to this bill, but I must not detain the House by dwelling upon them. It is true that this is a temporary expedient—that it passes out of existence with the occasion which produced it. But its influence as a precedent, will be more lasting, and will, I fear, be fraught with dangerous consequences. Let Congress announce to the country, by passing this bill, that it has abandoned the course pursued by the fathers—that there is no established and permanent method of making the electoral count—that it may provide new legislation for each contested presidential election as it shall arrive, and contested presidential elections will multiply upon our hands. There will be more double returns from the States; more Oregons and more Louisianas. What chronic condition of political hands. There will be more double returns from the States; more Oregons and more Louisianas. What chronic condition of political faction and disorder might follow upon this, no man can say. But rather than incur the risk of entering upon it, I would prefer that we should undertake to count the electoral vote in the old way, and trust to the good sense, the moderation, and the patriotism of Congress and the country for a peaceful and satisfactory result.

Mr. SPRINGER. I believe the agreement is that the House now take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening, when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] will occupy the remaining fifteen minutes of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hewitt,] and that then the debate shall continue until the House may take another recess.

If there is no objection, I would like to call up a joint resolution for concurrence in an amendment of the Senate providing that the stitched copies of the compilation in reference to counting the electoral vote be bound in cloth.

EVENING SESSION.

The House re-assembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. Hooker as Speaker pro tempore.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

The House, according to order, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor to propose on the 24th day of July last for the adoption of the House the following resolution:

Whereas the head of each Executive Department of the General Government is an officer of the people, receiving liberal compensation from the public Treasury for the performance of official labors which are presumed to require his entire time and undivided attention: Therefore,

*Resolved*, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that the performance by such officer of the duties of chairman of a partisan committee having in charge the management and prosecution of a political campaign is inconsistent with the relations that exist between him and the whole people whose salaried servant he is; is incompatible with the faithful, impartial, and efficient discharge of the ardnous duties and responsibilities that attach to the exalted position of head of an Executive Department and member of the Cabinet; is at war with every rational idea of civil-service reform, and as such challenges in the strongest terms public criticism and condemnation.

While this proposition received, as the record shows, the sanction and approval of many of the most thoughtful and considerate men of this body, it did not meet the concurrence of a majority. I believed then, as I think now, that there should have been a unanimous expression of censure touching the unseemly spectacle then presented for the first time in the history of the country, of a high Cabinet officer assuming the rôle of manager of a political campaign and subjecting himself to the temptation to abuse his high functions to subserve the mere purposes of party. This expression of disapproval, in my judgment, became imperative, as it became manifest that he had been placed in that position so that the patronage and power of the Administration might be rendered more efficient factors in the result of the then approaching presidential election. Said Mr. Benton:

When laws are executed by civil and military officers, by armies and navies, by courts of justice, by the collection and disbursement of revenue, with all its train of salaries, jobs, and contracts, we behold the working of patronage and discover the reason why so many stand ready in any country and in all ages to flock to the standard of power wheresoever and by whomsoever it may be raised.

The patronage of the Government, which at its origin was founded upon a revenue of $2,000,000, had reached at the date of Mr. Benton's report twenty-two millions, and was regarded by the illustrious men who signed that report as constantly tending to sully the purity of our institutions and to endanger the liberties of the country. We have now reached a period in our history when our annual collections and disbursements amount to more than one-half billion, and the objects of natronage have expended and multiplied in a corresponding deof patronage have expanded and multiplied in a corresponding de-gree, until their influence upon our popular elections is simply incal-culable. A fair expression of an enlightened public will at the ballotbox is rendered difficult, if not impossible, when a President who wields this vast patronage so mistakes the character of his high office as to speak of himself as "the representative of a party," and when one of his advisers and Cabinet counselors can be guilty of the indecency of abdicating his high functions in the face of the world for the part of a scheming partisan. A learned American jurist, speak-ing of the radical and dangerous change that is going on in the execu-tive department, if not in the Government itself, describes in terse phrase some of the alarming symptoms. Says Judge Campbell:

phrase some of the alarming symptoms. Says Judge Campbell:

A body of active, alert, trained, and disciplined politicians have been found whake politics a trade, and who subsist upon the partialities, benefactions, expenditures and corruptions, of the Government. To accomplish their aims they have brought the Government directly into the management and control of elections, and the powers of the Government to accomplish the ends of party ambition at the ballot-box. The Department of Justice, through its marshals, sends battalions of deputies throughout any State when a contest is close. The Secretary of War sends the standing army for the same purpose, under a pretense of preserving peace. Instances have occurred of details from the Army to do clerical work for party committees and of officers regulating the order of a political meeting. A Secretary of the Interior takes upon himself the office of comptroller-general of the presidential campaign and the President himself has thrown off all the reserve and all the decorum which heretofore has governed the conduct of that officer in such an election. The mighty evils of influence, intrique, cabal, corruption, and circumvention are aggravated by the menaces of violence and the conversion of the Army into a body of janizaries to enforce the will of the chiefs of the party.

Who will say, Mr. Speaker, that our present complications would exist—subjecting to deadly peril our political system, and exciting alarm and apprehension throughout the country—if madness and folly had not brought the Government itself directly into the management and control of elections, and the power of Government to the accomplishment of partisan ends at the ballot-box? To this criminal interference, in my judgment, with the ballot-box in the three doubtful States, all our present woes may be traced. If the Secretary of the Interior did not know that these States had been secured to his candidates by agencies that could not miscarry, why should he so confidently assert the day following the election that each of them had chosen republican electors and that the election of the republican nominee was assured? Why did he claim the success of the recan nominee was assured? Why did he claim the success of the republican ticket, when the country generally accepted the election of Mr. Tilden as a fact? His confidence, Mr. Speaker, was placed in that new factor in American elections, the returning board, and in the conviction that whatever the people of those States might do, a compliant returning board could and would undo. Whatever the people might determine, that board could undetermine. Whomso-ever they might elect, that board could reject. His bulletin following the election was an evidence of his implicit trust in the fidelity of these hoards and the certainty of their adherence to his pre-pression. of these boards, and the certainty of their adherence to his pre-arranged plans. The returning boards, heard from at last, vindicated their claim to the Secretary's confidence. They certified to the country the election of twenty-one electors—needed to elect the republican ticket; and the question is now presented for some tribunal to settle, shall the verdict of the returning boards stand as the will of the people under the Constitution and laws, and as such be executed?

THE RETURNING BOARDS AND THE BALLOT

The ballot, Mr. Speaker, is the instrument by which the citizen gives expression to his will. When cast into the ballot-box, the only question, as I conceive, that can arise in a free government is, Did the law authorize such a vote; did the voter have the necessary qualifications as to age, residence, &c., and was the ballot such a one as is authorized by the law of the State? No question, it seems, can rightfully arise as to whether he voted otherwise than as he desired, for I take it that the presumption that the ballot he cast express his will is conclusive upon him and upon the whole world. He is estopped to deny this presumption; and if he cannot for himself, what power on earth can deny it for him? Shall it be said, sir, that some man styled a supervisor or commissioner can make a statement on affidavit of three citizens that "riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influence" led the citizen to vote otherwise than as he desired? And shall a set of men called a returning-board presume to say to this voter, "It is true, sir, you were of lawful age and residence; all is regular about the time, place, and manner of your voting; but we have some affidavits before us that convince us that you did not vote the ticket of your choice. You voted for certain candidates; these affidavits convince us that you wanted to vote for certain other candidates, and would have done so had you voted according to your feelings. We will not have done so had you voted according to your feelings. We will not count your vote for those certain other candidates, as we think would be just and proper, (in which opinion we are glad to have the concurrence of the visiting brothers,) but we will see for you that your vote is not counted at all. Don't worry about this; for although you may at the time of voting have thought, and although you may think now, that you wanted to vote as you did, we are satisfied that you felt so on account of the 'riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, and bribery' that prevailed; and if none of these existed, we are sure there were some 'corrupt influences' at work that led you to feel that way. Don't talk to us about your wanting to vote that way. A colored man could never want to vote against his party. He is a registered republican voter, and is conclusively presumed to be a republican. The color of his skin puts a perpetual estoppel upon him. He can't be heard to say that he is not a republican, and never does say so unless he is bull-dozed. Our business here is to counteract the work of the bull-dozers and mar all their well-laid schemes. We intend to see that no amount of bulltheir well-laid schemes. We intend to see that no amount of bull-their well-laid schemes. We intend to see that no amount of bull-dozing can secure your vote to the common enemy, and we are exceedingly sorrowful, along with the visiting republicans, that the law does not allow us to count you as having voted on the other side."

Not only, Mr. Speaker, does it seem to me that the ballot is the best and only evidence of the will of the qualified voter, and that it is conclusively presumed to express his will, but there is another presumption equally important and well established in our system, namely, that those who absent themselves and do not vote are presumed to be indifferent as to the result of the election. What an absurdity in our system is the introduction of an agency with authority to inquire as to how men would have voted if they had voted at all; as to what would have been the result if everybody had voted. Every to what would have been the result if everybody had voted. Every man in contemplation of law does vote who wants to vote, and to go into an inquiry as to the will of the absentees is to ignore the election and remit the government of the State to the tribunal making the inquiry. It does in fact become the elective body, invested to as high a degree with the appointing power as the President of the United States. While in such a system there is nothing conclusive in the ballot, nothing presumed from the absence of the voter, it is consoling to know that somewhere there is a presumption upon which we may rest. We reach it at last in the absolute infallibility of that tribunal. Its judgment, we are told, cannot be impeached. It may suppress thousands of votes or it may coolly and deliberately transfer the votes of thousands of freemen from one candidate to another, so give that candidate a majority of 4,000 who was in a minority of 8,000 at the ballot-box, and there is no remedy anywhere on earth or among men either to the disfranchised voter or to the outraged candidate. The finding of the tribunal imports absolute verity and can nowhere be reviewed.

I am reminded here, Mr. Speaker, that this anomaly in our free institutions, this power above the ballot, this court or tribunal authorized to collect the public will in some other way than by the ballot, this wicked device of wicked men to perpetuate a power thrust into their hands by the executive power of this nation, is no improvement upon the machinery devised soon after the war in my own State to perpetuate a minority rule. I recur to a melancholy period in the history of Tennessee, when the executive of the State was authorized history of Tennessee, when the executive of the State was authorized by statute to disfranchise entire counties by proclamation; which power he did time and again exercise. No candidate in sympathy with the opposition to the executive could calculate with any certainty upon receiving any vote; for the governor could, the very eve preceding election, by a tyrannous edict wipe out the franchise in any county. If by any omission or oversight such candidate should receive a majority of votes, the power could still be exercised and his competitor counted in, as was often done. The people obtained relief at last through a civil revolution, which was resisted at every stage by that minority. And thus was an end put forever to a most iniquitous system of oppression, which could have peaceful way among no people.

system of oppression, which could have peaceful sway among no people not held down by the application or dread of actual force.

I trust, sir, that the day is not far distant, whatever may be the issue of our present complications, when an enlightened national sentiment will demand the elimination from our political system of a power higher than the ballot, that assumes to proclaim what the publications is the statement will be able to the system of the proclaim what the publication is the system of t power higher than the ballot, that assumes to proclaim what the public will ought to have been, instead of declaring what it actually was; that presumes to collect it from rumor and ex parte testimony, if indeed it may be called such, and that passes in review upon the judgments of the people and is itself not subject to review. The mills of the gods are slow, but they are sure. Nothing so anti-republican, so much at war with the whole theory of popular institutions, has ever appeared in American politics, and for the credit of those institutions its departure should not be long delayed. Let it go at once, and "stand not upon the order of its going." An invention that helps the weak to govern the strong, the few to rule the many, the ignorant to command the wise, and the vicious and vile to dominate the virtuous and decent, is better suited to other countries and peoples virtuous and decent, is better suited to other countries and peoples than ours. And if, indeed, Mr. Speaker, "riot, tumults, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences" should occur to affect the freedom of the ballot, let the law prevent by punishing them. If such law cannot be enforced, then it becomes evident that either the government is that of a minority or of a majority incapable through ignorance or corruption of administering republican government.

Though it be conceded, Mr. Speaker, that it is competent for a State and not at all in conflict with the spirit and genius of popular instiand not at all in conflict with the spirit and genius of popular institutions to provide a tribunal and vest it with power to ascertain the public will in some other way than by the ballot—which is, I take it, the power of this returning board—this limitation ought in reason and law to exist, that its power and jurisdiction shall be exercised in good faith. Its fraudulent or corrupt exercise would vitiate its findings, which surely there should be power somewhere to review and remedy. If it be assumed that the returning board itself is vested with the power of appointing electors, that the ballots previously cast are so many nullities, and that no appointment is made until the board announces its decision, the reply to that is, then, the State of Louisiana did not appoint her electors on the day prescribed by law, which is the Tuesday after the first Monday in November, but on some other day a month afterward. Such a position is fatal to the action of the returning board. The appointment of the electors must be made returning board. The appointment of the electors must be made on the day prescribed by law, and the State of Louisiana appointed hers upon that day or she did not, in legal contemplation, appoint at

Now, sir, as to whether this anomalous jurisdiction over the ballot and to whether this anomatous jurisate to nover the ballot is repugnant to republican government or not; as to whether the tribunal ever had under the law the powers claimed and exercised by it; as to whether it exercised that jurisdiction fraudulently and corruptly; as to whether its judgments, however unjust, are conclusive upon the to whether its judgments, however unjust, are conclusive upon the people of Louisiana and upon the country, are some of the great questions by which we are now confronted. Discussions thus far in either branch develop irreconcilable differences of opinion, and bring into painful prominence the absolute necessity for the organization of some tribunal with jurisdiction to settle them. The Constitution declares that "the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted." Anybody can count, the President, the tellers, or a page; but who can decide what are votes, for they only are to be counted?

One conclusion may be said, Mr. Speaker, to have been evolved from the consideration and discussion of this subject thus far by the country: the framers of the Constitution never clothed the presiding officer of the Senate with jurisdiction of this mighty inquiry. He shall not decide what are States and what are not, for only States can vote. He shall not decide whether electors were appointed or not in accordance to the direction of the Legislature of a State, for a State can vote only through electors so appointed. He shall not decide whether certain votes are in accordance to the constitution and and acts of Congress passed in pursuance thereof, for only such can be counted. He shall not decide whether the certificate opened is genuine and true, or a false and fraudulent representation of a vote. In short sir, he shall decide no question that is necessary to the determination of the grand final inquiry, is it a vote? To confer so vast a jurisdiction by implication merely upon the President of the Senate is to my mind an amazing absurdity. So vast a power could never have been left by the framers of the Constitution to mere implication. Where then does such necessary jurisdiction reside ? In my judgment, Where then does such necessary jurisdiction reside? In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, in just such tribunal as Congress may see proper to organize and vest with it; for I take it that the legislative powers may do whatever is necessary to carry into effect the requirement "the votes shall then be counted." It may not only do, but it is its solemn binding duty to do whatever may be necessary by legislation to carry into effect this plain constitutional duty. When it shall be determined what are the votes, then the duty to count will be an easy one—and one that the President of the Senate may perform without objection from early quarter. from any quarter.

Mr. Speaker, the question now presented to the conscience and judgment of this body is "shall such a tribunal be established?" That the exercise of this transcendent jurisdiction shall be admitted That the exercise of this transcendent jurisduction shall be admitted to the President of the Senate and its creature, against all the precedents in all the past history of the country, against that principle of justice and right and decency that no man shall sit as judge in a cause in which he himself is directly interested, against the reason and spirit, if not the letter, of the supreme law—that this vast jurisdiction shall be conceded to him must not be demanded, and if demanded cannot be yielded. Shall the Houses themselves exercise it? In ordinary times and under ordinary circumstances they might do so, as they have done in all time past. Heretofore, it must be remembered, that while there have been disputed votes offered it mattered little as to the disposition of the controversy, for a settlement either way had no effect upon the result. Now for the first time in our history the result depends upon votes that are in dispute, and the great office of Chief Magistrate of the nation, with its vast powers and vast opportunities, hangs upon the issue of the controversy. It is, in my judgment, now utterly impossible for the Houses to agree. The absolute certainty, now so generally confessed, of a disagreement between them presents the emergency that must be provided for. Here is the casus omissus in the Constitution and the laws. There is no umpire to settle the dispute on the one side or the other. If I could bring my mind to the belief that a disagreement between the Houses would be such a failure of any one capilidate to receive a majority of the votes. to the President of the Senate and its creature, against all the prece mind to the belief that a disagreement between the Houses would be such a failure of any one candidate to receive a majority of the votes as to vest jurisdiction in this House to elect, the path of duty might become plainer. But, sir, if the two Houses may count, how can jurisdiction ever come to the one to elect a President or to the other to elect a Vice-President until the two Houses that are to count, declare a con-

a Vice-President until the two Houses that are to count, declare a constitutional failure by the colleges?

I know, sir, with what ability and earnestness it has been urged by some partisans that this House itself may judge of the contingency upon which it may proceed to elect; but to my mind the claim has as little reason or constitutional sanction to rest upon as the claim of power for the President of the Senate. I see no power, sir, in either House to elect until they agree that the contingency provided for in the Constitution has arisen. And does any sane man believe they will ever agree upon such a decision? It seems now, sir, utterly improbable that there can ever be any concurrent judgment that "no person has received a majority of the electors appointed," upon which judgment only could our right to elect the President and that of the Senate to elect a Vice-President be predicated.

Foreseeing then a disagreement in the count, should it be attempted by the Houses; foreseeing a disagreement on the proposition that

Foreseeing then a disagreement in the count, should it be attempted by the Houses; foreseeing a disagreement on the proposition that there is a constitutional failure by the colleges; foreseeing the perils to the peace to the country that would follow an assumption by the President of the Senate of the unauthorized power, claimed in certain quarters for him, we can see the rock that lies in the channel, menacing the ship of state and her precious cargo. In the language of an accomplished Senator, "if we drift we shall strike it; if passion steer we shall run upon it." Duty and patriotism demand that sails be set now, so as to avoid it and that too before we make too near approach. It may be too late when we shall have tried and failed to agree upon a count. It will be too late when the House shall have assumed the power to choose a President, and when the President of the upon a count. It will be too late when the House shall have assumed the power to choose a President, and when the President of the Senate shall have declared another elected. It may be too late when there are rival claimants for that high office, each of them supported by a body of zealous and unreasoning partisans, not a few of whom are incapable of realizing the unutterable, the supreme folly and madness of civil war. I should hesitate long before accepting the responsibility of rejecting the only measure now before us which seems to present a hope of an amicable and peaceable adjustment of our complications. I should hesitate long before setting up my own judgment upon questions of constitutional power against that of some of the eminent gentlemen who have prepared and recommended this measure to us. We may not be able to free ourselves from dispositions to look at and speculate upon the probable action of this commission; and while doing so myself, sir, with that confidence that a righteous cause inspires, I shall commit, so far as I may by my vote, that cause to this tribunal, assured that in its success the country will find peace and prosperity, and in a defeat it will at least find comparative repose.

Mr. SPRINGER obtained the floor and said: I yield ten minutes to my colleague, [Mr. STEVENSON.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, a few evenings ago the citizens of the city in which I reside assembled in great numbers, without regard to party, without reference to political differences, and adopted the resolutions which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

At a large meeting of citizens of Bloomington, Illinois, without regard to party, held on the evening of January 22, 1877, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas, from the closeness of the late presidential contest and the deplorable condition of the public affairs in the three contested States of the South, honest differences of opinion exist as to who was really elected President and Vice-President of the United States;

And whereas grave doubts also exist as to the proper constitutional method of counting and declaring the electoral votes, each party, with rare exceptions, favoring that plan most conducive to its success;

And whereas to remove the doubts and to calm a popular excitement which has seriously menaced the public tranquillity a congressional conference committee, consisting of fourteen of the most prominent and influential members of the two Houses of Congress, and divided equally by party lines, have, with almost perfect unanimity reported to the two Houses a compromise plan, popularly known as the conference bill, which, for fairness and impartiality, commends itself to the favor of a grateful people: Therefore,

*Resolved*, That we hail with the liveliest emotions of pleasure this great national peace-offering as comprehending not only a just and proper solution of our existing troubles, but affording, in all reasonable probability, the only feasible plan at all likely to be adopted to ward off impending dangers and restore peace and confidence to our distracted country.

*Resolved*, That the members of the congressional committee who framed and agreed upon the patriotic conference bill are entitled to the everlasting gratitude of the American people.

of the American people.

[Mr. STEVENSON addressed the House. His remarks will appear the Appendix.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield fifteen minutes to my colleague, [Mr.

CAULFIELD.]

Mr. CAULFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the question before the House in a partisan spirit. The question which we have to decide is not one that addresses itself to one party or the other. It addresses itself to the members of this House and of the Senate as a legal question. We are to discuss it with the lights which the Constitution itself throws around it. I care not what passion may have been aroused by the recent election. I care not whom the voice of these two Houses, when assembled for the counting of the electoral votes, may declare the President and Vice-President of the United States. I for one am anxious only that the Constitution and the laws shall be carried out in the declaration of that vote. I address myself to this body to-night as I would address myself to the Supreme Court if I were arguing a case before that tribunal.

I address myself to the simple legal questions that belong to the proposition now before the House.

The question is, what is the Constitution of the United States in regard to the election of President? The question is, how are we under the Constitution of the United States to decide who has been elected President and Vice-President? There seems to be a doubt in the minds of some gentlemen of this House and of the Senate as to the minds of some gentlemen of this House and of the Senate as to whether the Constitution contains sufficient power for the purpose of declaring whether A B or C D has been elected President of the United States. It may be that the weakness of my intellect is not able to grasp this great question, but I confess that for one with my humble ability I can see no difficulty whatever in the question. The Constitution has not made in detail all the laws that govern this country. The Constitution is simply the fundamental basis upon which the laws of this country are made. The Constitution is to be carried out by Congress. When the Constitution prescribes a power existing in the one House or the other, or in both Houses, it leaves to the one House or the other, or to both Houses together to designate how that power shall be carried out. power shall be carried out.

The Constitution says in regard to the counting of the electoral

The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each; which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit scaled to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted

What power is given to the President of the Senate? The power to open the certificates. Who is this President of the Senate? Is he a member of the Senate? Is he not originally prescribed by the Constitution as the Vice-President, who is not a member of the Senate? Constitution as the Vice-President, who is not a member of the Senate? When the Senate and the House meet together the President of the Senate, who is or may be the Vice-President of the United States, has no more power under the Constitution to preside over that body than the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The Constitution does not prescribe who shall preside over this joint meting. The two Houses meet with their respective powers. While I am willing to admit that the House is not a House of Representatives unless presided over by its Speaker, nor is the Senate a Senate unless presided over by its presiding officer, (the Vice-President of the United States or President of the Senate,) still when they meet together they are co-equal and co-ordinate branches of the legislative department of this Government. But the President of the Senate has no more right to preside over these two joint bodies than the Speaker of the House. Who, then, is to preside? This question must be settled by law. The question must be settled either by legislative act of the two Houses or by the two Houses themselves when they meet in joint session; and when those two Houses meet together any member of either House has the power to rise in his place, in the absence of law or a joint rule, and move that the Speaker of the House shall preside over the deliberations of the joint bodies. What power, then, has the Vice-President or presiding officer of the Senate if this is done? When this act is done, when the two Houses decide that the Speaker of the House shall preside, the Vice-President has no more power in these two joint bodies than if he were not a member, as he is not, of either of them, except to open the certificates.

Shall it be said that the man who is not even elected to preside by the vote of the two Houses together shall decide who shall be the President and Vice-President of the United States? The only power prescribed to him, if the Speaker of the House is chosen to preside over the deliberations of these joint bodies, is that he may take a seat at some member's desk if accorded to him by the member, or some other seat provided for him at the time, and open the certificates of electors the only power which the Constitution prescribes to him. And other seat provided for him at the time, and open the certificates of electors, the only power which the Constitution prescribes to him. And will it be said that he who has no other power than this, even under the joint action of the two Houses, shall have the power to declare who has received the majority of the electoral votes, and declare who is the President, when he himself is not even the presiding officer of the two bodies when they meet together in joint session? The only power he has to declare the vote comes from the joint resolution of the two Houses, or by some law such as we have here before us now for

But I have been amazed, Mr. Speaker, at the doubt which seems to surround this question in the minds of my fellow-members. What doubt is there? The Constitution itself provides a solution, if there is any doubt. Does the Constitution prescribe the mode and the means of carrying out all the provisions of the Constitution? Not at all. It simply announces the law and leaves the Legislature of the nation to prescribe the means of carrying out the provisions of the Constitution. What is the provision of the Constitution? The provision of the Constitution is that the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open the certificates and the votes shall then be counted. How shall the votes be counted? According to law. Who shall make the law? The Congress of the United States, which has power to provide for carrying out all the provisions of the Constitution. Where is that power found? The power prescribed to Congress is "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." What powers, then, have been vested in any department or officer thereof? The power has been vested in these two Houses when they meet together—to do what? To count the votes. How shall they be counted? In the mode prescribed by law, in the mode prescribed by that law by which the Constitution says that "all the powers herein vested shall be carried out by such laws as may be necessary for carrying them into execution."

What law then is necessary to carry into execution this power of counting the vote? Any law prescribed either by rules of the two Houses when they meet together or by a legislative enactment of the two Houses. The two Houses when they meet can prescribe the mode by which the vote is to be counted, or before they meet they may prescribe it by precisely such a law as we have before us to-day for our consideration. When gentlemen say that this law is unconstitutional. I sak them to point out in what respect it is unconstitutional.

our consideration. When gentlemen say that this law is unconstitutional, I ask them to point out in what respect it is unconstitutional when the Constitution says that "all powers herein vested shall be carried out by such laws as Congress itself shall enact."

What is the power of these two Houses in the question before us? The power to count the votes. How count the votes? Either by a joint rule of the two Houses, or by a law enacted for that purpose. The twenty-second joint rule has been heretofore followed as a precedent for some time. Before that, resolutions were adopted either by the two Houses, or at a meeting of these two Houses when they got together. But the Congress has the power to prescribe the mode of counting the vote under the Constitution. counting the vote under the Constitution.

It is said that this is a causus omissus in the Constitution. It is no causus omissus any more than any other power prescribed by the Constitution is causus omissus, because it does not point out the manner of carrying it into execution. The power of carrying into execution the mode of counting the vote by the two Houses when they assemble together is vested in the two Houses either by joint resolution or by an enactment in the form of a statute such as is offered to us here to-day. When it is said that the powers of the two Houses are ns here to-day. When it is said that the powers of the two Houses are abridged by this bill because a member can object to the decision of the joint tribunal only by obtaining the concurrence of four members of his own and five members of the other House, I admit it struck me at first with a good deal of force, as an abridgment of the constitutional rights of the American Representative. But, Mr. Speaker, when the two Houses meet together, they do not meet together for legislative purposes. They meet together for a single purpose, pointed out by the Constitution; not to enact any law, but for the purpose of carrying out a provision of the Constitution or a law already enacted.

And if Congress has the power to say how this vote shall be counted when the two Houses meet together, then they have the right to prescribe any mode whatever that they choose for the counting of this

I have not been able, Mr. Speaker, after a careful examination of of the law which is now before us for consideration, to discover one solitary objection that makes it obnoxious to the Constitution of this country. And I believe that the law which we have before us to-day is a safe and judicious law for the present exigencies in which we are placed. I do not say that I would be willing that this law should govern us for all time to come; but I say that in the absence of all laws upon the subject it is probably the best that could be devised for the present emergency. But my time is drawing to a speedy conclusion. I shall vote for this bill because I believe it will settle the vexed questions which are now threatening the peace of this nation. I see a nation burdened with debt, a prostrate commerce, an agitated and anxious people, fearful of the future of our Republic, looking hopefully to us for an assurance that we shall do all in our power to perpetuate the magnificent heritage which our fathers have left us. Their voice is magnificent heritage which our fathers have left us. Their voice is for law and for peace. To me it is potential. As one of their representatives I shall obey their bidding. I shall yield to their demands, not simply for the mere purpose of acquiescing, but because their demand is reasonable, just, and patriotic. Let us then adopt this measure of peace; let us revive the drooping hopes of our people; let us send hope and joy and love on the switt wings of lightning throughout the bread expresses of our peiple in the bread expresses of our people. send hope and joy and love on the swift wings of lightning throughout the broad expanse of our nation, and let the hoarse voice of dissension be forever hushed in our glorious land. Let the temple of liberty be re-opened; let the arms of the Republic be suspended from its inner walls; let the hearts and voices of a grateful people swell in choral anthem through its lofty dome, and from its highest altar let the white-winged angel of peace go forth with golden trumpet to proclaim the peace of God to all men of good will through the present and all future generations of this great Republic.

But I close, Mr. Speaker, with saying that the power to declare how this vote shall be counted rests in the House and in the Senate, either by joint rule when they meet together or by a legal enactment which shall become a law and remain a rule until repealed by the which shall become a law and remain a rule until repealed by the

which shall become a law and remain a rule until repealed by the ordinary legislation of Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK.]

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, the succession to the chief magistracy has ever been a prolific source of fierce contests in human governments; often resulting in political convulsions and the disasters of civil were of civil wars.

The framers of our Federal Constitution, admonished by these dangers, sought to guard against their occurrence by providing for the election of a President and Vice-President under as few and as easily understood provisions as were deemed practicable. The plan adopted was to have these officers selected by electors appointed in such manner as the Legislatures of the several States shall direct, subject to certain conditions and limitations imposed by the Constitution and authorized to be prescribed by Congress.

It was expected that the importance of the duty to be performed by the electors would secure the selection of men conspicuous for their intelligence and public virtue. How far the plan has been marred by political contests transforming the electors from their position of responsibility for the selection of wise and patriotic men for these exalted and honorable positions to that of mere machines, directed by political parties, it is not deemed important here to inquire.

Whatever the departure from the course expected to be pursued in the election of a President and Vice-President, the conditions imposed by the Constitution and the limitations prescribed by Congress are of by the Constitution and the limitations prescribed by Congress are or equal binding force; and when not met by those performing any functions pertaining to the right and duty of electing a President, the omission becomes proper to be considered as to its influence on the vote or votes affected by it. I do not doubt that Congress may rightfully inquire into the action of a State in selecting or appointing electors, and the acts and character of the electors appointed, to the extent of the limitations of the Constitution and the laws passed in pursuance

It is believed to be as equally within the cognizance of and incumbent upon Congress to maintain and enforce all legislative and political rights and duties under the Constitution and laws as it is for the judicial tribunals of the Federal Government to enforce all rights and penalties cognizable by and arising or incurred under the Constitution and laws of the United States. I think the power of the judicial department of the Government furnishes, in the reason of its existence, an analogy for the exercise of power by a co-ordinate department of the Government in maintaining rights and enforcing duties that pertain to that department.

The modes of exercising the power claimed may be, and probably ought to be, prescribed by Congress, and undoubtedly it would be better that all necessary regulations should be provided in advance of and unprejudiced by a pending emergency. But I am not willing to admit that Congress is impotent to protect itself and the country against violations of the Constitution and the laws in the attempted or pretended exercise of functions which become effective only by the acquiescence of Congress.

Whatever difficulty might exist as to the exercise of the power by reason of a failure to have provided therefor by appropriate legislation is entirely removed by the pending bill reported by the select committee on counting the electoral votes, &c. The provisions of the bill now before us seem ample for the consideration and determinabill now before us seem ample for the consideration and determina-tion of all questions that may arise on the counting of the votes, and the tribunal contemplated to be created is as little objectionable as any now probably attainable. I leave the special presentation of its provisions to the able gentlemen who have prepared and reported it. This House, I think, will not hesitate in giving it favorable consider-ation. Should it, however, from any cause fail to become a law, Congress, or either House thereof, has the inherent power of prevent-ing the consummation of a fraud or the violation of the Constitution when attempted to defeat the rights of the people to have the Chief Magistrate of the Government elected as directed by the Constitution and laws passed in pursuance thereof.

Magistrate of the Government elected as directed by the Constitution and laws passed in pursuance thereof.

Whatever may be the opinion entertained by others, as to the right of Congress to inquire into the regularity and legality of the election of electors, as provided by the laws of the States respectively, outside of and unaffected by the conditions imposed and authorized to be imposed by the Constitution of the United States, I am not unmindful of the constitution of the work in the great importance of care imposed by the Constitution of the United States, I am not immindful of the gravity of the subject or of the great importance of carefully guarding against partisan zeal or the promptings of a conviction that great wrongs have been committed, leading to an encroachment on the unrestricted right of a State to appoint electors of President and Vice-President, subject only to an observance of the conditions imposed by the Constitution and the limitations prescribed by

The second clause of the first section of article 2 of the Constitution provides as follows:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

The third clause of the same article provides that the electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves, and the fourth clause authorizes Congress to determine the time of choosing electors and the day on which they shall east their votes.

These clauses contain the compact between the States then forming the Federal Union and others that might become members of it as to the election of the President and Vice-President, binding on all and each, all being entitled to have the conditions and stipulations observed and carried out. They are the conditions on which each State is entitled to cast a certain number of votes for President and Vice-President. The State that fails to observe these conditions must be deprived of her electoral vote in whole or in part, as the act must be deprived of her electoral vote in whole or in part, as the act of omission may reach all or any number of them. For instance, if a State entitled to several electors appoints a Senator or Representative in Congress, or a person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, such person so attempted to be appointed an elector would not be authorized to act as such because of the constitutional inhibition, and that vote would be lost to the State. So if the Legislature of a State failed to take any action, either to appoint or provide for the appointment in any manner of electors, no other branch of the State government could do so, and consequently the State could have no voice in the election of a President and Vice-President could have no voice in the election of a President and Vice-President. Or when the Legislature directs that the electors shall be elected at a different time and that they shall cast their votes at a different time from that prescribed by Congress for both these events, or when the Legislature undertakes to have electors selected in a manner in contravention of the clauses of the Constitution referred to, or of any other provisions of the Constitution, such action would be as if not

And again, the Legislature of a State exists in virtue of the constitution of the State, is amenable to it, and is utterly without power to give legal effect to any act in violation or contravention of the provisions of the State constitution under which the body acts and to which it owes its existence. Such an act would be merely as the act of private citizens, and not that of the Legislature of the State. As directed, it shall appoint the electors as before cited, subject to the conditions prescribed.

Without looking further into these conditions, let us examine into the constitution and several acts of the State of Louisiana with reference to elections, and especially the selection of electors of President and Vice-President, and see whether the acts of the Legislature of that State on this subject are of a character consistent with the provisions of the State constitution, and also the Constitution of the United States.

The existing constitution of the State of Louisiana was adopted or ratified by the people on the 13th of April, 1868, and certain amendments not affecting the questions to be considered were adopted on the 7th of November, 1870. Under it the general elections are held on the first Monday of November every two years.

An act "relative to elections in the State of Louisiana," &c., was approved and put in force on the 19th of October, 1868, statute 218. This act is incorporated in the revised statutes in force on and after the 1st of April, 1870, sections 1379 to 1435.

In 1871 nothing was enacted in regard to elections. An act "to regulate the conduct and maintain the freedom and purity of elections," &c., was approved on the 20th of November, 1872, statute 15, Warmoth being governor and Pinchback lieutenant-governor and president of the senate, by which a board of returning officers was provided for and William P. Kellogg became governor de facto of the State. I hold that this act attempted to confer judicial powers on its creatures and was, therefore, utterly unconstitutional.

It provides as follows:

It provides as follows:

SEC. 2. That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning officers.—Stat. of 1872, page 15.

Once elected by the senate this returning board is a corporation, with perpetual succession; self-renewing, self-perpetuating. I find no provision of the law making it amenable to any department, tribunal, or officer of the State. The provision in regard to filling a vacancy is probably directory, not mandatory, for it is not said that there shall be no legal board without five members; and it is said that the provision of five that is these shall be a concern. I do not see that a majority of five, that is, three, shall be a quorum. I do not see what remedy there is by law if the board, reduced to three, should persistently continue so.

The five original members were to be elected by the senate "from

The five original memoers were to be elected by the senate "from all political parties," but nothing in the act requires the member of the board who may be appointed to fill a vacancy to be of the same political party with his predecessor. Even to the senate the law is merely directory, and its violation of the direction can neither be punished nor remedied.

The powers of the board are, in the first instance, ministerial only: to compile the statements from all polls or voting places where there has been a fair, free, and peaceable registration and election. But when there comes to it a statement of a supervisor or commissioner, when there comes to it a statement of a supervisor or commissioner, in form required by section 26, and based on certain affidavits, then the board is to "investigate the statement of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any such poll or voting-place;" and, if "convinced that these did not materially interfere with the freedom and purity of the election" there or "did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the result of the election," "then, and not otherwise," it is to canvass and compile that vote. (Same statute, section 3.) But if not fully satisfied the returning officers are to examine further testimony and to have nower to send for persons and papers; and, if after such examination power to send for persons and papers; and, if after such examination they are "convinced" that the riot, &c., did so materially interfere or prevent, then they are not to canvass or compile that vote, but to exclude it from their returns. (Same, section 3.) Nothing in the law requires the action of the board to be public and in open day. They may meet in secret and examine witnesses in secret, inquisitorially. It is only provided that any candidate interested in the result "shall be allowed a hearing" before these officers if he applies within the time allowed for forwarding the returns of the said election. (Same, section 3.)

These returning officers are to meet within ten days after the closing of the election and continue in session until the returns have been

In these returning officers are to meet within ten tays after the closing of the election and continue in session until the returns have been compiled. "The presiding officer is to open the statements in the presence of the returning officers." They may exclude all other persons. (Section 2.) And these returns made and promulgated are prima facie evidence in all courts and before all officers until set aside by due judicial procedure upon contest for an office. (Section 2.)

Special jurisdiction is thus given to these persons to adjudicate as to the facts whether there was rioting, tunult, &c., and whether either or part or all of these did actually prevent registration or voting by a number of the voters "sufficient to materially change the result of the election;" and therefore, as the Supreme Court of the United States has several times held as to the decisions of the registers and receivers of land offices as to the existence or non-existence of the facts necessary to entitle to a pre-emption, their finding and decision as to the facts of tunult, riot, intimidation, &c., and their sufficiency so to change the result, are final, and cannot be reviewed or the facts re-inquired into by any judicial tribunal. They are to be "convinced" that the facts are so or not so; and if they are "convinced" that conviction is final. No court can say they were not convinced that conviction is final. No court can say they were not convinced or that they ought not to have been. They need give no reasons, they need hear no arguments; they are not required to hear argument. How a candidate shall be "allowed a hearing" is not defined; no rules in regard to the manner of receiving evidence are prescribed; no notice of its taking need be given to any one; it may be wholly ex parte. They are not required to sit with open doors. They need not even let it be known where they meet. They can meet anywhere in New Orleans, in a private dwelling or in a gambling-house; and they may if they see fit steal under cover of midnight into the place where the rights of the people are to be assassinated.

Andrew Fletcher, of Saltoun, said, in one of his speeches in Parlia-

One would think of all men law-givers should be of the most undoubted probity, and that selfish ends and disingenuity should have no place in their assemblies.

Nothing is more hateful than a treacherous duplicity and a pretense of fairness merely delusory and intended to defraud. Everything which seems to be fair in this act of legislation is merely specious, insincere, and deceptive.

The board is to be at first composed of persons from all political parties, but it is not provided that it shall continue so. A vacancy occurring should be filled with one from the same political party as the last tenant, but it is not promised that it shall be, and those who are to elect cannot be made to elect at all. A person interested as a candidate is to be allowed a hearing, but there is no promise that the hearing shall be full or fair. The returning officers are to hear testimony, but it is not provided that they shall do this publicly, or that there may be cross-examination or opportunity for rebuttal, or previous notice to any one in all the world. Their conclusions are to be considered prima facie correct, and may be gone behind in a formal proceeding to contest; but their findings as to the material facts are final and it cannot be shown that they ought not to have been convinced. To sum all up in a word, they can truly plead they had ample warrant inal and it cannot be shown that they ought not to have been convinced. To sum all up in a word, they can truly plead they had ample warrant in the letter of the law for doing all they have done and for abundant sharp practice besides. There is no limit to the amount of villainy which the law makes possible and permits.

It has been said to be "the common method of all governments now received in the world to allow almost everything that tends to the corruption of manners, and then to restrain those corruptions; a work," it is added, "far beyond the power of the longest experience and greatest prudence." The act in question is a resort to one of those permicious practices that tend to destroy public liberty. It and greatest prudence." The act in question is a resort to one of those pernicious practices that tend to destroy public liberty. It proposes to legalize the ill-designs of inveterate knaves, never boldly attempted to be carried into effect by legislation in a republic until it is declining to its fall. It was most truly said by Fletcher that "a government is not only tyranny when tyrannically exercised, but also when there is no sufficient caution in the constitution that it may not be exercised tyrannically." "All governments," he said, "are tyrannical which have not in their construction a sufficient court tyrannical which have not in their construction a sufficient security against arbitrary power."

This act is tyrannical because it intrusts arbitrary power to five men or a less number, to be exercised without power of control or security against abuse in any quarter. It puts it in their power ar-bitrarily to annul the votes of whole parishes and cities, and so makes the right of suffrage of all the citizens depend upon their favor, their caprice, their interest, their irresponsible will. It is, therefore, not only violative of the rights of men; it not only makes the elective franchise and title to office, both of which are property, exist or disappear at the pleasure of four or five men having perpetual succession, but it makes the government of the State a tyranny and not republicant even even in form can even in form.

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.—Constitution of the United States, article 4.

This board, not elected by the people, is above the courts of justice, has fraudulently imposed a government on an unwilling people of a State, and now attempts to make a President for the United States.

A tribunal so constituted and so perpetuating itself must be often corrupt and always dangerous. It is invested with judicial powers, the judicial powers of a star-chamber or inquisition. Three of them constitute a quorum, and it is only necessary that two of these should be "convinced" that certain allegations of matters of fact are true, and that these facts materially changed the result of an election in a parish or in the State, to empower them to declare as not given the votes of whole parishes. Their decision is equally final if they falsely pretend to be convinced, and whether they are or pretend to be convinced by much or little evidence, or by none at all, or against the overwhelming weight of evidence clashing with their private in-terests or their allegiance to the factions whose instruments they are.

The constitution of the State of Louisiana contains the following provisions:

Returns of all elections for members of the General Assembly shall be made to the secretary of state.—Title 2, article 46.

Each house of the General Assembly shall judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its members.—Article 34.

The qualified electors for representatives shall vote for governor and lieutenant-governor at the time and place of voting for representatives; the returns of every election shall be sealed up and transmitted by the proper returning officer to the se-retury of the State, who shall deliver them to the speaker of the house of representatives. * * * The members of the General Assembly shall meet in the house of representatives to examine and count the votes.—Title 3, article 48.

No judicial powers, except as committing magistrate in criminal cases, shall be conferred on any officers other than those mentioned in this title, except such as may be necessary in towns and cities, and the judicial powers of such officers shall not extend further than the cognizance of cases arising under the police regulations of towns and cities of the State.—Title 4, article 94.

This title 4 is judiciary department, and the officers mentioned in

This title 4 is judiciary department, and the officers mentioned in it are judges of the supreme, district, and parish courts, justices of the peace, attorney-general, district attorneys, sheriffs, and coroners, consequently "no judicial powers" could by law be "conferred on" the returning officers created by a law subsequent to the adoption of this constitution of 1868, and so far as the act of 1872 attempts to invest the returning officers with any judicial powers it is absoluted with and word. absolutely full and void.

The privilege of free suffrage shall be supported by laws regulating elections, and prohibiting under adequate penalties all undue influence thereon from power, bribery, tumult, or other improper practices.—Title 6, article 103.

But the creation of a returning board is an invention not contemplated by or within the letter or spirit of this article. The objects for which the Constitution is made are declared to be: "To establish for which the Constitution is made are declared to be: "To establish justice;" but the invention of a returning board, irresponsible, and with power of final decision upon pretended ascertainment of certain facts, is a device to establish injustice, because it is a device in the interest of party. "To insure domestic tranquillity;" but the device of such a returning board is a device to create perpetual discontent, dissension, and civil discord. "To promote the general welfare;" but such a device will constantly be made the means to promote private interests and the interest of party, at the expense of the general welfare. "To secure the blessings of liberty;" but such a device is calculated, and may not unjustly be said intended, to establish a despotism of party, and to nullify, when private or party interest may require it, the will of the lawful majority expressed at the polls. It is not an engine fit to be employed in a republic, and its certain result is to inflict the curse of political bondage and servitude on the people, and not to secure to them the blessings of liberty.

I think it is very clear that, as to members of the Legislature, the governor, and the lieutenant-governor, no such agency as a returning overnor, and the lieutenant-governor, no such agency as a returning board could be interposed between the primary returning officer and the General Assembly, and that, if it could, it could not be invested with any other functions than that of merely compiling the votes as received by them. Even this I think is not warranted by the Constitution, which evidently means by the words "returns" and "proper returning officer" the returns made by the officers who actually superintended the elections at the various polls, and those officers only. The General Assembly is to "examine and count" the votes for governor and lieutenant-governor, and this excludes the idea that some other person or body is to count them previously and report the result. To "examine and count" the votes they must have the original returns, as each House must have them to judge of the elections and returns as each riouse must have them to judge of the elections and returns of its own members.

The act of 19th of October, 1868, (acts of 1868, page 222, Revised Acts of 1870, page 277,) required the supervisors of registration within two days after the closing of the polls in each parish to go to the court-house of the parish and there, in the presence of at least two witnesses and of as many other persons as might attend, "to compile the returns sent in by the commissioners of election at the several presents of the parish and the parish that the parish the parish that the parish the parish that the parish that the parish that the parish the parish that cincts, to make public proclamation of the result, and make due return thereof to the secretary of state, making out triplicate returns, and sending two of these, one by mail and one by the next most speedy mode of conveyance, to him, and depositing the third in the office of the clerk of the district court." (Sections 24 and 25 of the act; sections 1402 and 1403 of Revised Statutes.)

The governor, secretary of state, and a district judge were to "proceed to ascertain from the returns the persons elected Representatives in Congress," (act, section 30; Revised Statutes, section 1408.) Elections for electors of President and Vice-President were to be "held tions for electors of President and Vice-President were to be "held and conducted in the manner and form provided for general State elections," (act, section 32; Revised Statutes, section 1410.) And all the preceding provisions of the act, except as to the time and place of holding election, were to apply in the election of all officers whose election is not otherwise provided for," (act, section 33; Revised Statutes, section 1411.) And by section 8 of the act, power to inquire into the question in any case whether a fair, peaceable, and full vote had been anywhere prevented by riot, tumult, acts of violence, or armed disturbance, was conferred upon the district judges, to be exercised upon notification by the governor, based upon certificate to that effect by the commissioners of elections or supervisors of registration for the parish or district; and upon their finding the governor could "disregard the returns." And provisions were made for a fair and full hearing by the judges of those who might deny the correctness of the statements of the commissioners or supervisor, and full consideration of all evidence offered on both sides, (Revised Statutes, section 1386.) Now by article 82, title 4, of the constituand full consideration of all evidence offered on both sides, (Revised Statutes, section 1386.) Now by article 82, title 4, of the constitution it is provided that "no duties or functions shall ever be attached by law to the supreme or district courts, or the several judges thereof, but such as are judicial," and therefore, unless these functions wherewith the district judges were invested by the act of 1868, re-enacted in 1870, were judicial in their essence, they could not be invested therewith, and these provisions of section 8 are null and void.

They were the same powers, essentially and actually in all respects. which were in 1872 conferred upon the returning officers. They are judicial in their nature and essence, were properly conferred on the district judges, and could not be conferred on the returning officers. It has been all the time claimed by Senators that the action of the returning board of Louisiana is final, because it is invested with judicial powers, however the case may be in Florida or South Carolina. And these powers and functions being judicial, the law conferring them on the returning board is as absolute a nullity as it it had never been enacted, proposed, or dreamed or thought of.

The constitution of Louisiana, article 93, title 4, provides that "the judicial power shall be vested in a supreme court, in district courts, parish courts, and justices of the peace." And section 38 of the act and 1416 of Revised Statutes provided that the commissioners of elections should receive the ballots of all legal voters offering to vote, deposit them in the box, keep duplicate lists, open the box immediately after closing the polls, count the votes with open doors, "and make duplicate returns of the number of votes polled for each candidate, and deliver one of them to the deputy sheriff or other officer in attendance, to be conveyed by him to the returning officer or officers of the parish." These provisions conform to and carry out the provisions, letter and Inese provisions conform to and carry out the provisions, letter and spirit, of the constitution. They were sufficient and they were fair. If nothing more than that had been desired they would have continued to be the law. No good motive can be conceived of for their abrogation by the act of 1872.

To enact the law of 1872 it was necessarily openly and flagrantly to violate the constitution; and the result of this violation is that, as the eighth section of the act of 1868 was repealed by the act of 1872, the judges ceased thereby to be invested with the special powers conferred on them; and these powers were not transferred to the returning officers, because, they being, in their nature and essence, judicial, the constitution expressly forbade it, and made these officers incapable to take and incompetent to exercise them. There is, then, no tribunal or officer or board of officers in Louisiana invested with the functions of inquiring whether a return ought to be disregarded the functions of inquiring whether a return ought to be disregarded or the votes of a precinct or parish excluded, because of the existence of the facts for which this could be constitutionally done. Or, if the eighth section of the act of 1868 is not repealed by that of 1872, because so much of the latter as was intended to supplant the former is unconstitutional, and therefore to all intents and purposes null, then the judges have not acted, and no returns have been constitutionally impeached or excluded. The returns as made by the supervisors of registration upon compilation or "consolidation" of the lists transmitted to them by the commissioners of election at the polls cannot be impeached, because no tribunal or officer or board is constitutionally invested with power to inquire into the facts for which by law the returns of actual count of votes can be disregarded or excluded. It is the returns received by the returning board that are final, impeachable only in a formal contest in the manner prescribed by law. The House of Representatives knows and the country knows what the vote was according to the actual returns; and as the action of the returning officers and their exercise of judicial powers in excluding and casting aside of returns, the basis of their action being their ascertainment by judicial inquiry the basis of their action being their ascertainment by judicial inquiry of certain facts and their being "convinced" by these facts proven that the tumult, riot, bribery, acts of violence, &c., were sufficient "materially to change the result" was absolutely null because forbidden by the Constitution, this action may be collaterally impeached anywhere, and must be treated everywhere as never having been had. All that they could constitutionally do was to compile the votes actually cost and returns whereaf were made in due form and with actually cast and returns whereof were made in due form and with sufficient authentication. All that the returning officers can con-stitutionally do is to see what returns are regular and made in due form, and to compile or consolidate these and to certify the result. If there is any way of escaping these conclusions I cannot see it. The constitution of 1868 has not been amended so that judicial powers could be conferred on the returning officers, and the question seems to me to have absolutely but one side. It is not conceived how the most acute and dextrous lawyer can make an argument now the most acute and dextrous lawyer can make an argument against these conclusions. No officers except those specially mentioned in title 4 of the constitution can by possibility be invested with any judicial powers or functions. The powers conferred on the district judges by the eighth section of the act of 1868 were judicial, because no other than judicial powers and functions could be conferred on them. The powers conferred on the returning board are the same powers, and therefore are judicial powers; and, being judicial, cannot be conferred on them or exercised by them. What chicanery of dialectics can answer this? alectics can answer this?

In the few minutes of my time remaining, I would offer a few observations on the clauses of article 12 of amendments to the Constition, that is:

Which lists they—the electors—shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

Now, sufficient reason for having the lists of the votes placed in the hands of the President of the Senate is found in the expediency of having matters of so great importance intrusted to the custody and care of some one of the highest trust and confidence; and the President of the Senate, from the position conferred upon him by the votes of the people, or of the Senators, would very naturally command that confidence and perfect belief that, without mutilation or change, he would produce all the certificates received by him, "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives," and "open all the certificates." This is the only duty required of him. When he has performed that, he has met the only requirement and exercised the only power expressly directed to be done by him. But it is maintained that by reason of this grant of power he is authorized to go further, and exercise another and very different power, that of counting the votes. The two powers are very different power, that of counting the votes. The two powers are very different in character. The first is ministerial only; the second requires the exercise of discretion, judgment, determination of probably both law and facts. The first directs him "to open all the certificates." He has no right to stop short of "all the certificates." At present there are, I believe, forty-two certificates of electoral votes from the different States that have been delivered to him, and now in his possession; four more than can rightfully be counted by any authority. To hold that he may examine, judge, and determine which of the thirty-eight, or a Now, sufficient reason for having the lists of the votes placed in the less number, shall be counted, is to derive this higher grade of power by implication from the first and lower grade of a mere ministerial power, which he may do without any aid of additional power from any other source. Such a mode of deriving power would violate all rules of construction and stand unsupported by a precedent. Any other officer, the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Senate, or any like official commanding trust and confidence, might with equal propriety have been selected to discharge the ministerial duty devolved on the President of the Senate; but neither they any more equal propriety have been selected to discharge the ministerial duty devolved on the President of the Senate; but neither they, any more than the President of the Senate, would have ex officio possessed the functions necessary to perform the other and higher power of counting the votes. Investigation might become necessary in order to determine whether one or even all the conditions imposed by the Constitution had been complied with. He has no power, and none has been vested in him, to determine whether the votes have been given by a State or given for one qualified to hold the office of President whether he be alien or native born, of the required age or length of resither he be alien of native born, of the required age of length of residence; and so of any other question that might become necessary to be decided on the provisions of the Constitution. In point of fact the precedents relied on in support of this power of the President of the Senate to count the votes, because having heretofore been done by him—in every instance, even the first, the votes have been counted by tellers appointed by the respective Houses, or by their authority expressly given. The tellers were the agents or officers of the respective Houses, and the President of the Senate, in declaring the result thus obtained, acted merely as the presiding officer of the two deliberative obtained, acted merely as the presiding officer of the two deliberative bodies, conformable to previous arrangement agreed upon by both Houses. The clause "and the votes shall then be counted" contains Houses. The clause "and the votes shall then be counted" contains a grant of power, and not being specifically directed to be exercised by any other department of the Government, it devolves on the legislative department to give effect to and see that it is properly carried out and performed. Whatever methods or instrumentalities may be deemed proper for its execution Congress alone has the power to provide, within the limitations bounding the powers of Congress. The bill under consideration proposes to do this, in aid of and advisory but still subordinate to the ultimate decision of Congress. To admit the inability of Congress for want of power to provide for the employment of suitable agencies to properly and peacefully determine the ment of suitable agencies to properly and peacefully determine the questions of difference in the present exigency would be to declare the Government deficient in a particular essential to its existence. To fail to do so would be a humiliating reflection on the patriotism

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, we have just passed through one of the most trying ordeals of republican governments, namely, the election of a Chief Magistrate. Unfortunately for the peace of the country, the contest still remains undecided in the popular mind. The friends of each of the candidates are quite as earnest at this time in asserting that the candidates of their choice have been elected, as they were prior to the election confident that they would be elected. Whatever may be the merits of these respective claims, it cannot be doubted that the peace of the country is seriously threatened in view of the apparently irreconcilable differences that exist. As the 4th of March approaches, the complications seem to increase, and the respective political parties seem more than ever determined to insist upon the inauguration the complications seem to increase, and the respective political parties seem more than ever determined to insist upon the inauguration of their own candidates. This condition of public affairs has produced in the country a general feeling of insecurity and uncertainty as to the future. The business interests are suffering materially in consequence of the threatening aspect of the presidential contest. Thousands and hundreds of thousands of our laboring-people, in the midst of a winter of unusual severity, are without employment, and many of them are reduced to the condition of absolute want. Merchants, bankers, manufacturers, as well as the masses of the people, have held meetings in all parts of the country for the purpose of counseling together as to the best means of relieving present embarrassments and of averting political complications. No new business enterprises are being started; existing enterprises are being contracted, wound up, or forced into bankruptcy. Capital is unemployed, and ordinary business collections are made with difficulty. During the past year there have been over nine thousand business failures in the country, an increase in number of thirteen hundred and fifty as compared with the year 1875, and the total liabilities of those who failed during the two years last passed have reached nearly four hundred millions of dollars. The failures during the past four years have been nearly twenty-eight thousand, and their total liabilities have reached nearly eight hundred millions of dollars. This strain on the business of the country cannot continue much longer without producing universal harkrupters and financial min. Political complications and nearly eight hundred millions of dollars. This strain on the business of the country cannot continue much longer without producing universal bankruptcy and financial ruin. Political complications and the fear of strife and tumult, if not of civil war itself, have greatly aggravated financial embarrassments and increased business failures. The people, without regard to party, and especially the representatives of the great business interests of the country, are looking to Congress for relief. Shall we prove ourselves worthy of the great trusts which have been committed to our care? Can we not rise above the prejudices of party above the above the prejudices of party, above the passions of the hour, above individual opinions or preferences, and bring about a speedy, honorable, and peaceful settlement of the presidential contest?

Mr. Benton, in concluding his Thirty Years' View, said he had seen the capacity of the people for self-government tried at many points, and always found equal to the occasion. But, said he:

Two other trials now going on remain to be decided, to settle the question of that capacity. 1. The election of President; and whether that election is to be governed by the virtue and intelligence of the people, or to become the spoil of intrigue and corruption. 2. The sentiment of political nationality; and whether it is to remain co-extensive with the Union, leading to harmony and fraternity, or divide into sectionalism, ending in hate, alienation, separation, and civil war.

Our Government has already passed safely through the second of these trials. Sectionalism and civil war have done their worst, and yet they have not shaken the confidence of our people or of the world in the capacity of the American people for self-government. But we are now confronted with that which Mr. Benton and other great statesmen who have preceded us have regarded as the most danger-ous ordeal of republican government. Shall the election of our Chief Magistrate be governed by the virtue and intelligence of the people,

or become the spoil of intrigue and corruption

or become the spoil of intrigue and corruption?

A disputed succession has ever been a fruitful source of strife, of war, and bloodshed. No other cause has produced more devastation and ruin than this one. The contests in England between the houses of York and Lancaster, and the hundred years of European war, growing out of the absurd claim of Edward III of England to be king of France, should remind us of the dangerous ground upon which we are now standing. Of all wars those which have grown out of disputed was according have been the most sanguingary and long continued. The successions have been the most sanguinary and long continued. The dangers that now threaten us have been predicted often by the statesmen of the past, but unfortunately no adequate legislation has been devised heretofore to meet such an emergency. On the one hand, it is contended that the President of the Senate may count the electoral votes and declare the result, and that he will do so in the absence of legislation is claimed by his friends as a duty under the Constitu-tion. This pretension—for such it is—is utterly repudiated by the majority of the members of this House, and I believe that this majority would regard such a proceeding as revolutionary, and as having no validity whatever. The inevitable result of these grave differences, unless harmonized by legislation, is that Mr. Hayes would be proclaimed President at one end of the Capitol, and Mr. Tilden at the Who can contemplate such a condition of things without other. Who can contemplate such a condition of things without trembling for the future of the country?

In view of these grave and alarming complications, it becomes the duty of the Representatives of the people in this House and in the Senate to use their utmost endeavors to bring about an honorable and peaceful adjustment. All pride of opinion, all party prejudices, all selfish ambitions must be buried out of sight, and a pure and unselfish patriotism, such as inspired the founders of the Republic, must guide and control all our actions. The Senate and House of Representatives have appointed special committees to consider the grave questions at issue and report such measures as may be deemed necessary to meet the present difficulties. A bill has been prepared and reported to the two Houses. It is accompanied by a report recommending its passage, which is signed by thirteen of the fourteen members of the joint committees. Having been a member of the House committee, and having concurred with all my colleagues of the House in recommending the passage of the bill, it may not be amiss for me to explain in detail the various features of the measure, and to give my reasons for supporting it.

The bill reported and now under consideration provides in the first The bill reported and now under consideration provides in the first section for the manner of counting the electoral votes where there is but one return from the State. As to such votes, when objections are made, the two Houses separate, and unless both Houses concur in rejecting the vote or votes objected to, such vote or votes shall be counted. In the second section of the bill provision is made for counting votes from a State where two certificates, or double returns, are made. These double returns, together with the objections thereto and all papers accompanying the same, shall be submitted to a commission, consisting of five justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, five Senators, and five Representatives. Four of the justices are indicated in the bill by reference to the circuits to which they are assigned, and these are to choose another from their associates who shall constitute the fifth judicial member of the commission. are assigned, and these are to choose another from their associates who shall constitute the fifth judicial member of the commission. The venerable senior associate justice (Mr. Clifford) is named as the president of the commission. The five Senators and Representatives are to be appointed by the respective Houses by a viva voce vote. This commission is authorized to consider these double returns, and the objections thereto, and all papers accompanying the same, with the same powers now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together. The decision of the commission, or of a majority thereof, shall be in writing, and the counting of the votes shall be in accordance therewith, unless it shall be otherwise ordered by the concurrent action of the two Houses. The other sections of the bill merely provide for the meetings of the two Houses and the mode of procedure therein during the counting and the deliberations mode of procedure therein during the counting and the deliberations of the commission.

It will be seen that these provisions are based upon the assumption It will be seen that these provisions are based upon the assumption that the Constitution imposes upon the two Houses of Congress the duty of counting the electoral votes, and of ascertaining and declaring the result. Two tellers are to be appointed by each House, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates, or papers purporting to be certificates, of the electoral votes, which certificates are to be acted upon by the two Houses as the bill provides. But from the moment the President of the Senate opens and presents the certificates to the tellers he loses all further control over them. He cannot even read the contents of the packages, as this duty is assigned to the tellers, and hence he cannot know anything of their contents, and can make no announcement of the result, except as thereunto authorized and directed by the two

The provision of the Constitution in reference to the count of the electoral vote is as follows:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

The words "and the votes shall then be counted" have perhaps caused a greater diversity of opinion that any other phrase in the Constitution. By whom the count shall be made is not expressly stated. But if it is deducible by necessary implication it is as much a part of the Constitution as if the words were expressly given. But there can be no implied power to do anything under the Constitution where there is no implied power to do anything under the Constitution. there can be no implied power to do anything under the Constitution unless there is some power expressed which cannot be carried out without doing something else which is not expressed. For instance, Congress has express power "to borrow money." But there is nothing said in the Constitution about the power of Congress to establish a Bureau of Printing and Engraving. Yet it is just as constitutional to print and engrave bonds as it is to borrow money. Where an express power is given or duty imposed all other powers necessary to carry it into effect are implied. What then is the expressed power or duty of the President of the Senate in reference to the count? He "shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all certificates." That is all that is expressed in the Constitution except that he is to receive them. If he has any other duty to open all certificates." That is all that is expressed in the Constitu-tion except that he is to receive them. If he has any other duty to perform it must be implied or it must be something that is necessary or proper to be done in opening the certificates. But there is no power to count the votes implied from a power to open the certifi-cates. Hence we may infer that the counting is to be done by the Senate and House of Representatives, as they are there as organized bodies for some purpose. And such implication is strengthened, if not abfor some purpose. And such implication is strengthened, it not assolutely confirmed, by a subsequently expressed power imposed upon the two Houses, namely, the power of the Senate to choose a Vice-President and of the House to choose a President if no person has received a majority of the votes of all the electors appointed. The two Houses could not know this fact unless they had first counted the votes, as the Constitution requires them to proceed immediately to perform this duty.

The Constitution has lodged the power to count the votes somewhere, as it is evident they cannot count themselves. It is important then to know what has been the practice of Congress, or the two Houses thereof, in counting the votes for President and Vice-President. Upon a careful examination of these precedents it will be seen that there has been but one course pursued. The President of the Senate has never counted the votes, on any occasion, but, on the contrary, the two Houses have uniformly exercised this power, by the appointment of tellers and by resolutions and joint resolutions directing the manner in which it should be done.

In the convention which framed the Constitution the question as to who should count the votes received little or no attention. the greater portion of the time in which the convention sat the sub ject was not before the body, as the plan of electing a President through the electoral-college system was not reported until late in the session. The convention assembled on the 14th of May and concluded session. The convention assembled on the 14th of May and concluded its labors on the 17th day of September. After long discussion and the consideration of various propositions the whole subject-matter was referred to a special committee of five; which committee, on the 6th of August, reported "a draught for a Constitution," which consisted of twenty-three articles. This draught was the basis of future action, and contained the main features of the Constitution as it was finally agreed upon. But the appendments made afterward were many and and contained the main features of the Constitution as it was finally agreed upon. But the amendments made afterward were many and some of them exceedingly important. The tenth article provided for the election of a President by the Legislature or Congress, by ballot, who should hold his office for seven years and be ineligible for re-election. There was to be no Vice-President. The Senate was authorized to elect one of its own members to preside over that body. Subsequently, on the 4th day of September, Mr. Brearly reported from a special committee certain additions and alterations, among which were the various features of the electoral-college system. But in this draught the Senate was left in complete control of the count of the electoral votes, the provision on this subject being as follows: the electoral votes, the provision on this subject being as follows:

The President of the Senate shall, in that House, open all the certificates, and the votes shall be then and there counted.

It was also provided that in case there was no election by the people through the electoral colleges, then the Senate was authorized to elect the President by a per capita vote.

These provisions were objected to on the ground that they gave the Senate too much power in the election of a President. Hence the proposition to open the certificates "in that House" was amended so proposition to open the certificates "in that House" was amended so as to require this to be done "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives," and the votes were then to be counted. The power to elect the President was also taken away from the Senate and given to the House of Representatives.

Much stress has been placed upon a provision in the resolutions which were transmitted by the convention to the Congress of the Confederation, together with the Constitution. The resolutions constituted what is commonly called a schedule, and gave directions for bringing the Constitution into effect. The provision in question rebringing the Constitution into effect. The provision in question related to the organization of the Senate prior to the announcement of the election of President and Vice-President. Without this provision in the schedule, there might have been some doubt as to who was authorized to preside before and during the count; hence the clause in the schedule which has been so much quoted and so little understood, namely:

That the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President.

The resolution containing this clause was merely advisory. The language of the resolution is this:

Resolved. That in the opinion of this convention that, as soon as the conventions of nine States shall have ratified this Constitution, the United States in Congress assembled should fix a day on which electors should be appointed, &c. And that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President.

The resolution, therefore, merely expressed the opinion of the con-

And it seems that this recommendation was followed by the Congress; for it appears in the record of the first session of the Senate that the Senate, as soon as a quorum appeared, "proceeded to the choice of a President for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States." This appointment was for a specific purpose in purpose of the recommendation of the the votes for President for the Sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States." This appointment was for a specific purpose, in pursuance of the recommendation of the resolutions of the convention, and the temporary office expired as soon as the result of the election was announced. All this temporary appointee could do was "to open and count the votes." He was not the President of the Senate for any other purpose. Neither was he the presiding officer of the two Houses. His duties were wholly ministerial. He could not ascertain whether the votes were legal or illegal. And it is to be observed that the Senate and the House of Representatives supervised this very count, the Senate having appointed one teller and the House two "to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared." Let us suppose that, at this first election, one of the States had, without intending to violate the Constitution, but as an act of gratitude, voted for General La Fayette, who was not a citizen of the United States. Or, let us suppose that in some of the States a reaction had set in, and that the party favoring the Constitution had been defeated in the election party favoring the Constitution had been defeated in the election for presidential electors, and that the electors, in order to show their opposition to and contempt for the republican form of government just set up, had voted for George III for President of the United States. Would such votes have been counted? According to the procrustean theory that the President of the Senate alone has the right to open and count the votes, and that he must count them as he right to open and count the votes, and that he must count them as he finds them, these votes for George III would have been entered on the Journals and counted. But this would have been not only unconstitutional but preposterous. There is something more implied in "counting the votes" than mere arithmetic. The arithmetical part could be done by the clerk. And if such duty had been imposed upon the Secretary of the Senate at the first election there would have been required denial of right and duty on the part of the two been no implied denial of right and duty on the part of the two Houses there assembled to supervise the counting in a judicial way and to direct the Secretary what votes to count and what not to count. At every count of the electoral votes from the first election count. At every count of the electoral votes from the first election of President down to the present time, one teller has been appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House for the purpose of counting or adding up the votes. If the Constitution had read: "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and there shall then be appointed three tellers, one by the Senate and two by the House of Representatives, for the sole purpose of counting the votes for President and Vice-President," the practice would have been precisely what it has been at every election. But who would say that these tellers by virtue of such appointment held in their hands the power of determining in case of double returns or other disputed questions who should be the President of the United States? The power would still reside in the two Houses of Congress, as it now power would still reside in the two Houses of Congress, as it now does, to ascertain what are the constitutional votes of the State, and to direct their tellers what votes to count and their presiding officer what announcement to make as the result. The presiding officer of a legislative body is sometimes denominated the "mouth of the House." The appellation of Speaker comes down to us from the earliest parliamentary history, from which it appears that he "was to express the will of the Commons, and to speak for them, in all proceedings of the Parliament in which they were allowed or required to participate." Mr. Cushing, in his Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, (section 294,) thus defines the character and duties of this official:

The presiding officer, though entitled on all occasions to be treated with the greatest attention and respect by the individual members, because the power, and dignity, and honor of the assembly are officially embodied in his person, is yet but the servant of the House, to declare its will, and to obey implicitly all its commands. He is selected and appointed to the trust of presiding officer in the confidence, and upon the supposition, of the conformity of his will to that of the assembly.

A part of his duties are "to decide in the first instance, and subject to the revision of the House all questions of order that may ject to the revision of the House, all questions of order that may arise or be submitted to his decision." The right of appeal from the decision of the presiding officer has never been denied, except where the rules expressly provide otherwise. In fact all the duties of a presiding officer are such, and such only, as are imposed upon him by the assembly over which he is to preside, or by the Constitution or laws of the land. He does nothing by implication; and in all cases of doubt he is to submit the question to the House, and be governed by its orders. Mr. Calhoun, being Vice-President and ex officio President of the Senate, decided in 1826 in effect that as President of the Senthe Senate, decided in 1820 in effect that as President of the Senate he had no power of preserving order or of calling any member to order for words spoken in debate, upon his own authority, except in so far as he was authorized by the rules of the Senate. Speaker Lenthall, of the House of Commons in the reign of Charles I, had a keen sense of the duties and dignity of his position.

When that ill-advised monarch-

Says Mr. Hatsell-

came into the House of Commons, and having taken the speaker's chair, asked him "whether any of the five members that he came to apprehend were in the house; whether he saw any of them; and where they were?" made this answer: "May it please Your Majesty, I have neither eyes to see nor tongue to speak, in this place, but as the house is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am here; and humbly beg Your Majesty's pardon that I cannot give any other answer than this to what Your Majesty is please to demand of me."—2 Hatsell, 242.

Presiding officers in this country might well learn their proper func-Presiding officers in this country might well learn their proper functions from Speaker Lenthall's heroic example. He recognized higher obligations to the house, whose servant he was, than to the king, whose subject he was. His eyes could not see, nor could his tongue speak, except as the house was pleased to direct. His becoming modesty was in striking contrast with the extraordinary powers claimed by some as belonging to the presiding officer of the Senate. Suddenly, and for a specific purpose, as revolutionary as it is unconstitutional, that temporary official is clothed with kingly powers and prerogatives. He is exalted by certain newspapers and interested placemen into the grand returning board of the nation. All the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States are to be sent to him. He, it is claimed, should open the certificates, count the votes, and declare who is elected. His count is to be final and his declaration subject to no review. There is a kind of kingly prerogative in this sublime assumption. But how absurd are all such pretensions to authority and superiority in the person of one who is but the creature of law and the servant of the Senate and the people.

In the year 1792, before the second presidential election occurred, an act was passed relative to the election of the President and Vice-President. Section 5 of this act provided as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That Congress shall be in session on the second Wednesday in February, 1793, and on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, and the said certificates, or so many of them as shall have been received, shall then be opened, the votes counted, and the persons who shall fill the offices of President and Vice-President ascertained and declared agreeably to the Constitution.

agreeably to the Constitution.

This act or the portion of it I have cited has never been repealed and is to-day the law of the land. (See Revised Statutes, 1874, section 142.) This law is a fair legislative interpretation of this subject. It requires that Congress should be in session on a particular day and for a particular purpose. That purpose was "to ascertain and declare agreeably to the Constitution" the persons who shall fill the offices of President and Vice-President. In this no duty is assigned to the presiding officer of the Senate. He is not even mentioned. The statutes require four specific things to be done: first, to open the certificates; secondly, to count the votes; thirdly, to ascertain who are Vice-President who reside in the same State; that they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, as is now required by the twelfth amendment; that they shall sign and certify the respective lists.

The Constitution further requires that the persons voted for as President and Vice-President shall be natural-born citizens of the United States; that they shall have attained the age of thirty-five years, and been fifteen years resident within the United States. All these facts the law requires Congress to "ascertain" agreeably to the Constitution. But mark the language of the law further:

The persons who shall fill the offices of President and Vice-President [shall thene] ascertained and declared agreeably to the Constitution.

This covers the contingency of there being no election by the people through the electoral college. If no person voted for as President shall have a majority of all the electors appointed, then the House of Representatives shall choose by ballot from the three highest the President. And if no person voted for as Vice-President shall have a majority of all the electors appointed, then the Senate shall choose from the two highest the Vice-President. All these things must be "ascertained" by Congress, "agreeably to the Constitution." The law, then, as it now stands, and as it has stood since 1792, expressly empowers Congress to ascertain these facts and to declare "the persons who shall fill the offices of President and Vice-President." But suppose Congress fails by reason of a disagreement between the two suppose Congress fails by reason of a disagreement between the two Houses to ascertain all these facts and declare by joint or concurrent action who has been elected by the electors? Now such facts have not been ascertained and they are, in the contemplation of law, as unknown as if there had never been an election.

Upon a careful examination of the precedents, it will be seen place. Upon a careful examination of the precedents, it will be seen that Congress has followed the provisions of this statute at all subsequent elections. An examination of those precedents will throw much light upon this subject, and will not fail to point to a correct solution of the great question which now agitates the minds of all the people of this country, namely: What are the powers, prerogatives, and duties of the two Houses of Congress in reference to counting the electoral vote? And whether the pending bill is in accordance with the Constitution and established precedents?

ing the electoral vote? And whether the pending bill is in accordance with the Constitution and established precedents?

At the second presidential election, in 1793, the House initiated the subject of the count on the 5th of February by appointing a committee of three, one of whom was James Madison, "to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to ascertain and report the mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President, and of notifying the persons who shall be elected of their election." This resolution was concurred in by the Senate, and a committee of three appointed for that purpose. On the 11th of February each of these committees reported to the respective Houses "the mode of examining the votes" in the presence of the two Houses. The two Houses were to assemble in the Senate Chamber at twelve o'clock of that day; one Senator and two Members of the House were appointed tellers on the Senator and two Members of the House were appointed tellers on the part of the two Houses; the result was to be delivered to the Presipart of the two Houses; the result was to be delivered to the President of the Senate, who should announce the state of the vote and the persons elected, and a list of the votes cast should be entered on the Journals of the respective Houses. All this was done agreeably to the resolutions of the two Houses of Congress. A joint committee was then appointed to wait on the President-elect and notify him of his unanimous re-election to the office of President of the United States. It is important to consider what the Vice-President, who was the President of the Scate dwing this second equat of the Scate should be president of the Scate should be entered on the Journal of the Scate should be entered on the Journal of the Scate should be entered on the Journal of the Scate should be entered on the Journal of the Scate should be entered on the Journal of the Scate should be entered on the Journal of the Scate should be entered on the Journal of the Journal the President of the Senate during this second count of the electoral vote, did. The official record is as follows:

The two Houses having accordingly assembled, the certificates of the electors of the fifteen States in the Union, which came by express, were, by the Vice-President, opened, read, and delivered to the tellers appointed for the purpose, who, having examined and ascertained the votes, presented a list of them to the Vice-President, which list was read to the two Houses, and is as follows.

Here follows the table of the votes cast by each State. dent of the Senate opened, read, and delivered the certificates to the dent of the Senate opened, read, and delivered the certificates to the tellers, who, having examined and ascertained the votes, presented a list of them to the Vice-President. There is no pretense here that the counting of the votes was any part of the duty of the President of the Senate. John Adams was the Vice-President at the time. He is noted for his strict adherence to the letter of the law and to all the formalties of official requirement.

At the third election, in 1797, John Adams, being then Vice-President, was elected President, and it became his duty to preside at the time the votes were counted in his own election. On the 31st of Janutime the votes were counted in his own election. On the 31st of January, 1797, there was appointed in the Senate, and on February 1, in the House, a committee of three, "to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President," almost in the exact words of the resolutions at the previous count in 1793. Tellers were appointed and they acted in precisely the same manner as at the previous election. The certificates of the electors were read by the Vice-President, and he then gave them to the Clerk of the Senate, who read the report of the electors. "All the papers were then handed to the tellers, who noted the contents, examined and ascertained the number of the votes, and presented the list to the Vice-President, John Adams, who then addressed the two Houses, as follows:

Adams, who then addressed the two Houses, as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives: By the report which has been made to me by the tellers appointed by the two Houses to examine the votes, there are 71 votes for John Adams; 63 for Thomas Jefferson; 29 for Thomas Pinckney; 30 for Aaron Burr; 15 for Samuel Adams; 11 for Oliver Ellsworth; 7 for George Clinton; 5 for John Jay; 3 for James Iredel; 2 for George Washington; 2 for John Henry; 2 for Samuel Johnston; and 1 for Charles C. Pinckney. The whole number of votes are 138; 70 votes, therefore, make a majority; so that the person who has 71 votes, which is the highest number, is elected President, and the person who has 68 votes, which is the next highest number, is elected Vice-President.

The President of the Senate them eat down for a superior of the Senate them eat down.

The President of the Senate then sat down for a moment, and rising again thus

The President of the Senate then sat down for a moment, and rising again thus addressed the two Honses:

In obedience to the Constitution and law of the United States and to the commands of both Houses of Congress, expressed in their resolution passed in the present session. I declare that John Adams is elected President of the United States for four years, to commence with the 4th day of March next, and that Thomas Jefferson is elected Vice-President of the United States for four years, to commence on the 4th day of March next. And may the Sovereign of the universe, the Ordainer of civil government on earth, for the preservation of liberty, justice, and peace among men, enable both to discharge the duties of these offices conformably to the Constitution of the United States with conscientious diligence, punctuality, and perseverance. (See Counting the Electoral Vote, page 15.)

The Adlicate situation in which the Vice-President was placed in

The delicate situation in which the Vice-President was placed, in being required to announce his own election, will explain his evident embarrassment and account for his fervent prayer in behalf of the the persons elected. But this short speech is valuable for the precedent which it establishes in reference to the prerogatives and duties of the President of the Senate in respect to the count of the electoral vote. Mr. Adams did not count the vote. He said:

By the report which has been made to me by the tellers appointed by the two louses to examine the votes, there are 71 votes for John Adams, &c.

And his announcement of the persons elected is equally significant. He said:

In obedience to the Constitution and law of the United States and to the commands of both Houses of Congress, expressed in their resolution passed in the present session, I declare that John Adams is elected President of the United States, &c.

He learned officially the number of the votes cast from the tellers, and his announcement was made in obedience "to the commands of both Houses of Congress."

But this important precedent is sought to be perverted by those who, at this late day, are claiming the right of the President of the Senate to count the votes, by reference to the certificate of election which was issued to Thomas Jefferson, who was elected Vice-President. In this certificate it is stated that the President of the Senate did "open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors. This was an error, for the record shows that the President of the This was an error, for the record shows that the Fresident of the Senate did not count the votes or examine them in any way. The form of this certificate was taken from that used at the first election in 1789, and is in the exact words thereof, except where changes of place and names are required. It was merely the official form evidently prepared by the clerks to notify the person elected of his election, and cannot be cited to contradict the record of the proceedings as they actually occurred. A similar error occurred in 1793, at the second election, when the Secretary of the Senate, following the form used at the first election, announced to the House that "a President of the Senate is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and Senate is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States." The truth was that no such and vice-resident of the United States." The truth was that he such election took place, and that the Vice-President actually presided at the counting of the votes of the two Houses, and his right to preside at the joint meeting was derived from the concurrent resolution of the two Houses, and was not by virtue of his being the presiding officer of the Senate.

PRECEDENTS FROM 1801 TO 1865.

The uniform practice of the two Houses of Congress in counting the electoral votes from 1801 to 1865 has been substantially as follows: A joint committee has been appointed prior to the day fixed by law for the count, which committee was authorized "to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President and Vice-Presid dent, and of notifying the persons who shall be elected of their elec-tion." The appointment of one teller on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House was always made prior to the joint meeting. With four exceptions the joint meetings have always been held in the Hall of the House of Representatives. The joint committees have reported resolutions fixing the hour of the meetings and authorright the President of the Senate to preside and announce the state of the vote. The certificates were uniformly opened by the President of the Senate and then handed to the tellers, who read and tabulated the same and handed the result to the presiding officer for announce-

At the count in 1817 objection was made to counting the votes of Indiana on the ground that the State had not yet been admitted into the Union. The two Houses separated, and the resolution to reinto the Union. The two Houses separated, and the resolution to reject the votes of Indiana was indefinitely postponed by the House; the Senate was notified of the fact, and the two Houses again reassembled and the count was continued. There was not the faintest suggestion at that time, however, that it it was not the prerogative of the Houses to decide what votes should be counted.

In 1821, the joint committees appointed "to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President," anticipating an objection to the counting of the vote of Missouri, on the ground that that State had not been admitted into the Union, reported a resolution, as follows:

reported a resolution, as follows:

Resolved. That if any objection be made to the votes of Missouri, and the counting or omitting to count which shall not essentially change the result of the election, in that case they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of Missouri to be counted, the result would be, for A B for President of the United States,—votes. If not counted for A B for President of the United States,—votes. But in either event A B is elected President of the United States. And in the same manner for Vice-President.

This resolution was adopted, and the vote of Missouri was counted or not counted, as the case may be, inaccordance with this resolution. It was at all events the action of the two Houses, and no one then pretended that this action interfered with the prerogatives of the President of the Senate.

President of the Senate.

In 1837, precisely similar proceedings occurred in reference to the vote of Michigan. The joint committee, however, submitted on this occasion, in addition to the usual mode of proceedings at the joint meeting, a report in reference to the ineligibility of electors. The Senators on this committee were Felix Grundy, Henry Clay, and Silas Wright; and on February 4, 1837, Mr. Grundy submitted the report of the committee. This report took strong ground against the election of persons as electors who held offices of trust or profit under the United States, and urged the adoption of suitable legislative provisions to ascertain and determine upon the qualifications of electors. The report also held that: also held that:

This provision of the Constitution excludes and disqualifies deputy postmasters from the appointment of electors, and the disqualification relates to the time of the appointments; and that a resignation of the office of deputy postmaster after his appointment as elector would not entitle him to vote as elector under the Constitution.

No action was taken on this part of the report, and the vote of Michigan was disposed of as was that of Missouri in 1821.

In 1857 objection was made to counting the votes of Wisconsin, on the ground that the electors did not meet on the day required by law. A violent snow storm occurred in that State about the time for the meeting of the electors, so that they were prevented from reaching the capital of the State in time to cast their votes on the legal day. They met, however, on the succeeding day, voted, and forwarded the result to Washington. The tellers appointed by the two Houses made a written report of the facts, and the vote of Wisconsin not changing the result, whether counted or not, the announcement of the vote was made in accordance with the tellers' report. In the discussion of the two Houses at the time there was a general review of the precedents and exhaustive arguments on the power of review of the precedents, and exhaustive arguments on the power of the two Houses, the prerogatives of the President of the Senate, and the rights of the States to participate in the election of a President and Vice-President. The final determination of the question seems to have been embraced in the following colloquy, which constitutes a part of the proceedings at that time:

Mr. Letcher. * * * I desire so far as I am concerned now, as a Representative of the people, to present my objection to the reception of this vote.

The Presidence Officer. The presiding officer considers that debate is not in order while the tellers are counting the vote.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose, Mr. President, the proper way would be for the tellers to report the facts to the convention of the two Houses and let them decide.

The Presiding Officer. The presiding officer so considers.

PRECEDENTS FROM 1865 TO 1873.

In 1865 the following joint resolution was adopted:

Whereas the inhabitants and local authorities of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee rebelled against the Government of the United States, and have continued in a state of armed rebellion for more than three years, and were in said state of armed rebellion on the 8th day of November, 1864: Therefore were in said state of armed rebenium on the components of the United States of fore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the States mentioned in the preamble to this joint resolution are not entitled to representation in the electoral college for the choice of President and Vice-President of the United States for the term of office commencing on the 4th of March, 1865; and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from said States concerning the choice of President and Vice-President for said term of office.

President Lincoln signed this joint resolution, and sent to the two Houses his message, explaining his action, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives:

The joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the electoral college" has been signed by the Executive in deference to the view of Congress implied in its passage and presentation to him. In his own view, however, the two Houses of Congress, convened under the twelfth article of the Constitution, have complete power to exclude from counting all electoral votes deemed by them to be filegal; and it is not competent for the Executive to defeat or obstruct that power by a veto, as would be the case if his action were at all essential in the matter. He disclaims all right of the Executive to interfere in any way in the matter of canvassing or counting electoral votes, and he also disclaims that, by signing said resolution, he has expressed any opinion on the recitals of the preamble or any judgment of his own upon the subject of the resolution.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 8, 1865.

The committee to whom was referred the subject of ascertaining and providing a mode for canvassing and counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, February 6, 1875, reported for adoption what has since been known as the twenty-second joint rule. This rule, in effect, provided that the vote of no State should be counted when objected to except by the concurrent action of both Houses of Congress. Its provisions were evidently intended to be permanent, for the electoral vote was counted under it in 1865, 1869, and 1873, without its re-adoption by either House. It was taken for granted that it continued in force until rescinded.

In 1869 it was doubted whether the vote of Georgia should be counted, as there was a dispute as to whether that State had complied with the reconstruction acts. A resolution was passed providing that the electoral votes of that State for President and Vice-President should be counted hypothetically, in almost the identical words of the resolution for counting the votes of Missouri in 1821. When the two Houses met objection was made to counting the vote of Georgia, and the two Houses separated. The Separate resolved to of Georgia, and the two Houses separated. The Senate resolved to adhere to the resolution to count the vote hypothetically, and the House resolved to reject it. The President of the Senate, in the joint convention, decided that the vote should be counted hypothetically as provided by the concurring resolution of the Houses.

It is scarcely necessary to cite individual opinions of Senators and Representatives in Congress on these various occasions relative to the power of the two Houses to count the vote. But a few brief ex-tracts will serve to illustrate the general current of authorities on this question.

Henry Clay, of Kentucky, (February 4, 1821,) said:

The two Houses were called on to enumerate the votes for President and Vice-President. Of course they were called to decide what are votes.

John Randolph, of Virginia, (February 4, 1821,) said:

For what purpose do they [the two Houses] assemble together, unless it be to determine on the legality of the votes.

Senator Robert Toombs, of Georgia, (February 11, 1857,) said: It is our duty to count the votes, and to decide what are votes.

Senator A. P. Butler, of South Carolina, (February 11, 1857,) said: Let him add up the votes and announce the result to me. I am one of the judges, or why do you call me there.

Senator John A. Logan, of Illinois, (February 25, 1875,) in discussing the merits of the Morton bill, and advocating its passage, said:

The mere addition of the number of votes, done merely as a clerical duty by these persons, certainly is subject to the supervision of the two Houses of Congress, the same as, for instance, in many States where the State constitution refers the counting of the votes for governor to the house of representatives and the senate of the State. They are to count the vote; that is the language of several of the State constitutions. But the vote is never actually counted by the Legislature; it is counted in their presence by the secretary or clerks, as may be. But the meaning of it evidently is that they count the vote. The clerks merely are those persons designated by the bodies to count the vote. Should they make a miscount of the vote there in the presence of the two houses, the two houses would have jurisdiction over it certainly. Hence it certainly means the counting of the vote by the two Houses of Congress, although the mere enumeration of the number is done by persons who are selected for that purpose. * * * The idea is that the two Houses count the vote. Of course they designate some person to do the mere ministerial office of counting the vote and making the addition, but it is in fact constructively done by the two Houses. Now, if you put in the words "by them," they refer to the men selected as the persons to make the count, and leaves them the persons to count the Votes, instead of the construction that the Constitution certainly bears, that the Houses count the votes.

Senator MORTON, of Indiana, (March 16, 1876.) advocating the pas-

Senator Morron, of Indiana, (March 16, 1876,) advocating the passage of his own bill, said:

sage of his own bill, said:

We could, without doing any great violence to the Constitution, adopt either of these constructions. Each is possible under the language. The Constitution says:

"The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted."

It does not say who shall count them; it leaves it open to inference that they shall be counted by the two Houses on the one hand or by the President of the Senate on the other. I will assume, for the sake of the argument, that you can give to it either construction. I will assume that it is open to both views. Then the question comes, which is the more reasonable, which is the better, which is the safer of the two; to adopt that construction which gives this great power to one man, the President of the Senate, who may be counting the votes for himself, as it has turned out six times in our history, or would it be safer to leave it to the determination of the two Houses of Congress, representing the States and the people of the ware open to adopt either one of these constructions, I say the latter is the safer; it is the more reasonable; it is in conformity with the spirit of our Government and of popular institutions. I then adopt the latter construction.

Senator BOUTWELL, of Massachusetts, (March 13, 1876,) discussing

Senator Boutwell, of Massachusetts, (March 13, 1876,) discussing the same bill, said:

Almost always, I think, when the subject has been discussed, the question has been presented whether Congress is to count the votes; and by Congress I mean the two Houses met in convention, according to the terms of the Constitution. Our best answer to that is the fact that, from the first convention that assembled until the last, the two Houses in convention always did count the votes. A teller was appointed by the Senate, two tellers by the House. The votes, or certificates, or returns, whatever they are called, were handed by the Vice-President, after he had opened them, to the tellers. The tellers were the organs, the instruments, the hands of the respective Houses. The votes were counted by the tellers, and, being counted by the tellers, they were counted by the two Houses; and, therefore, there never has been any difference of practice, and no different practice could have arisen under the Constitution. The two Houses in convention have from the first until now counted the votes.

Senator Epmunds of Vermont. (February 25, 1875.) said:

Senator EDMUNDS, of Vermont, (February 25, 1875,) said:

No; all the President of the Senate shall do is to open the package; and the votes shall then be counted.

Senator Garret Davis, of Kentucky, (February 2, 1865,) said:

This power to count the presidential votes is certainly vested by the Constitution somewhere. It is vested in the two Houses. The manner in which the count shall be made is not prescribed by the Constitution. Then comes in the general power given to Congress to pass all laws necessary and proper to execute any of the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government or in any department or officer thereof.

Senator Douglas, of Illinois, in 1857, when the Wisconsin return was under consideration, protested against even "the tellers authenticating the certificate until the two Houses had passed upon it as being a true count." He said the convention should not be dissolved until the two Houses had passed upon the certificate and decided whether it should be counted or not.

It is needless to continue citations of such authorities. The almost unbroken current has been, from the foundation of the Government down to the late presidential election, that the President of the Senate had no function to perform save to open the certificates, and that the two Houses alone had the power to count the votes.

Several important attempts at legislation on this subject have been made, but unfortunately none of them have been successful. I desire to call the especial attention of the House to the important measures considered by Congress in 1800, in 1824, and in 1875–76.

THE BILL OF 1800.

The small majority by which John Adams was elected over Thomas The small majority by which John Adams was elected over Thomas Jefferson, and the danger of serious contests in reference to disputed elections, caused members of Congress to endeavor to remedy by legislation any difficulties that might subsequently arise. John Ross, a Senator from Pennsylvania, offered in the Senate, January 23, 1800, a resolution creating a committee "to consider whether any, and what, provisions ought to be made by law for deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States, and for determining the legality or illegality of the votes given for those officers in

An important debate ensued. Senator Brown, of Kentucky, was of the opinion that Congress had no right to legislate on the subject, and suggested an amendment to the Constitution as the only means of reaching the desired end. Senator Ross defended his resolution, and thought Congress should legislate upon the subject.

Said he-persons should claim to be electors who had never been properly appointed, should their vote be received? Suppose they should vote for a person to be President who had not the age required by the Constitution, or who had not been long enough a citizen of the United States, or for two persons who were both citizens of the same State; such cases might happen, and were likely to happen, and is there no remedy? What a situation would the country be in if such a case was to happen?

Senator Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, who was a member Senator Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, who was a member of the Federal convention, spoke at length on the subject. He maintained that Congress had no right to meddle with the question, as the whole subject was intrusted to the State Legislatures, and that they must make provision for all questions arising on the occasion. Senators Dexter, of Massachusetts, and Livermore, of New Hampshire, both contended for the constitutionality of the proposed measure, and the latter read many of the directions in the Constitution as to the appointment of presidential electors:

Is it possible Said he-

that the gentlemen can suppose all these may be violated and disregarded, and yet that it is nobody's business to interpose and make provision to prevent it?

Senator Baldwin, of Georgia, who was also a member of the Federal convention, thought no legislation by Congress was necessary; "that all the difficulties which had been suggested were as safely left to the decision of the assemblies of electors as of any body of men that could be devised; and that the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, when met together in one room, should receive the act of the electors as they would the act of any other constitutional branch of the Government, to judge only of its authentication, and then to proceed to count the votes, as directed in the second article of the Constitution."

the second article of the Constitution."

The resolution of Senator Ross was adopted, and aspecial committee, consisting of Messrs. Ross, Lawrence, Dexter, Pinckney, and Livermore, was appointed to consider the subject and to report by bill or otherwise. On the 14th of February, 1800, this committee reported a bill prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States. This bill consisted of fourteen sections, and its various provisions are of the utmost imof fourteen sections, and its various provisions are of the utmost importance at this time as legislative interpretations of the power and duties of Congress in counting the electoral vote. And a careful study of this bill of 1800, and the votes and proceedings of Congress thereon, will throw much light on the pending bill reported by the joint committee of the two Houses.

The first section provided for a grand committee consisting of six Senators and six Representatives, chosen by each House by ballot, and the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court. To this grand committee was to be referred according to subsequent sections of the mittee was to be referred, according to subsequent sections of the bill, all the returns of the election, and the committee were required to take an oath to "impartially examine the votes given by the elect-ors of President and Vice-President, together with the exceptions and petitions against them, and a true judgment give thereon according to the evidence." The committee was authorized to send for persons, papers, and records, and "to punish contempts of witnesses refusing to answer as fully and absolutely as the Supreme Court of the United States may or can do in causes pending therein."

A motion was made in the Senate to strike out the first ten sections of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof a preamble and one section. This preamble recited this fact:

And the Constitution of the United States having directed that "the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted," from which the reasonable inference and practice has been that they are to be counted by the members composing said Houses, and brought there for that office, no other being assigned them; and inferred the more reasonably as thereby the constitutional weight of each State in the election of those high officers is exactly preserved in the tribunal which is to judge of its validity; the number of Senators and Representatives from each State, composing said tribunal, being exactly that of the electors of the same State.

The section of the bill provided for a joint convention of the two Houses; and if any vote was objected to, the members present were to decide by yeas and nays, without debate, "whether such vote or votes were constitutional or not." This preamble and section were not adopted; but on the motion to strike out the ten sections (a division of the question having been called for) the yeas were 10 and nays 15. Among the affirmative votes were Baldwin, Langdon, and Pinck-

Mr. Charles Pinckney then took the floor and spoke at great length in opposition to the bill. His speech is printed in the House compilation of the proceedings and debates of Congress in reference to counting electoral votes, (page 692.) He advanced the doctrine that the "right of determining on the manner in which the electors shall vote, the inquiry into the qualification, and the guards that are necessary to prevent disqualified or improper men voting, and to insure the votes being legally given, rests and is exclusively vested in the State Legislature." But he declared that it was the duty of Con-State Legislature." But he declared that it was the duty of Congress to count over the votes in a convention of both Houses, and that Congress had no agency in the election except merely in counting the votes. Notwithstanding the opposition of Messrs. Pinckney and Baldwin, the bill passed the Senate by a vote of 16 to 12. Before the bill passed the Senate it was amended in several important particulars. The Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court was dropped from the grand committee, and the Senate was to nominate three of its members to the House, one of whom the House should choose as the chairman of the committee. The grand committee of thirteen were empowered to examine and finally to decide disputes relative to elections of President and Vice-President. Section 8 of this bill, as it passed the Senate, contains a complete recognition of the constitutional authority of Congress over the whole subject. It is as follows:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted. That the grand committee shall have power to inquire, examine, decide, and report upon the constitutional qualifications of the persons voted for as President and Vice-President of the United States, upon the constitutional qualifications of the electors appointed by the different States, and whether their appointment was authorized by the State Legislature or not; or made according to the mode prescribed by the Legislature; upon all petitions and exceptions against corrupt, illegal conduct of the electors, or force, menaces, or improper means used to influence their votes, or against the truth of their returns, or the time, place, or manner of giving their votes: Provided, always, That no petition or exception shall be granted or allowed by the grand committee which shall have for its object to draw into question the number of votes on which any elector in any of the States shall have been appointed.

The bill was sent to the House in this shape, and was referred to a special committee of which John Marshall, afterward Chief-Justice, was chairman. He reported the bill back to the House, with important amendments. The grand committee was to consist of four Senators and four Representatives, and they were merely to investigate and report all the facts to the two Houses. And it was then provided:

So soon as this report shall have been made and entered on the Journals, the Senate and House of Representatives shall meet at such place as may be agreed upon for the purpose of counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

When a State was called, if the vote were objected to, "then each House shall immediately retire without question or debate to its own apartment, and shall take the question on the exception without debate, by ayes and noes." If the two Houses should concur in rejecting any vote such vote should not be counted. But unless both Houses concurred in rejecting any vote or votes, they were to be counted. Mr. Albert Gallatin moved an amendment to the effect that, instead of the two Houses retiring to vote separately on exceptions, the question should be immediately put as in joint convention, and taken by yeas and nays and decided by a majority of the members of both Houses then present. This amendment was lost by the very close vote of yeas 44, nays 46. After several ineffectual efforts to amend the bill, the Body struck out, by the decisive vote of 52 to 37. (House compilation on Counting the Electoral Vote, page 27.)

The bill having gone to the Senate again for concurrence in the amendments, that body struck out, by a vote of 15 to 11, the word "rejecting" and inserted the word "admitting" in lieu thereof, so as to require both Houses to concur in admitting the disputed vote, instead of rejecting it. With this amendment the House amendments were concurred in, and the bill again went to the House for its But the House refused to concur in this amendment, by a vote of yeas 15, nays 73. The Senate refused to recede, and the House adhered to their disagreement. Hence the bill was lost. But the fact of its passage by both Houses with all the provisions recognizing the constitutional right of Congress to go behind the certificates, and to count or reject any votes cast, constitutes the most valuable precedent in the legislation of Congress on this important subject. This was only eleven years after the organization of the Government under the Constitution, and several of the members of Congress at that time were also members of the Enderal convention, and ernment under the Constitution, and several of the members of Congress at that time were also members of the Federal convention, and many of them had been members of State Legislatures when their States ratified the Constitution. And it is also worthy of remark that no one of the persons who spoke, or of the amendments offered, pending the debate on this bill, gave the slightest indication that the President of the Senate had anything to do with the count except to open the certificates, and deliver them to the tellers appointed by the two Houses, and then they were to be entirely in the control of Congress.

the certificates, and deliver them to the tellers appointed by the two Houses, and then they were to be entirely in the control of Congress. If the Constitution had conferred any power upon the President of the Senate in reference to the count, here would have been the opportunity for the strict constructionists to have asserted that constitutional right, and some speech, protest, or amendment would have been made by those who framed the instrument or were their contemporaries. There is an entire absence of the assertion of the modern doctrine of constitutional authority in the President of the Senate to count the votes. The days of constitutional interpretations to ern doctrine of constitutional authority in the President of the Senate to count the votes. The days of constitutional interpretations to suit the exigencies of political parties had not yet come, and were not even predicted by the alarmists of that period.

But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call especial attention to the vote of the House of Representatives in 1800 on the bill in reference to disputed presidential elections. On the 9th of May of that year the House took yet he Senate appropriate the property which received experiences. House took up the Senate amendment which required concurrent action to admit a vote after the decision of the grand committee, instead of concurrent action to reject, as the House had passed the bill. Mr. Robert Goodloe Harper and Mr. James A. Bayard opposed the Senate amendment, as it materially changed the principle of the bill, by putamendment, as it materially changed the principle of the bill, by putting it in the power of either House to reject the vote of a State. "This," they said, "was contrary to the former will of the House after mature deliberation." The yeas and nays were taken on this Senate amendment, and it was overwhelmingly defeated, receiving but 15 votes in its favor to 73 in the negative. Among the negatives were such distinguished statesmen as James A. Bayard, Albert Gallatin, Edward Livingston, Nathaniel Macon, John Nicholas, Thomas Pinckney, and John Randolph. This decisive vote furnishes a most important precedent in favor of the provisions of the conference committee's bill, which require concurrent action of the two Houses to reject an electoral vote

The next most important precedent on this subject is that which is The next most important precedent on this subject is that which is embraced in the bill of 1824, which was reported in the Senate of the United States by Mr. Van Buren. That bill was passed in the Senate without opposition. It was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, which consisted at that time of Martin Van Buren of New York, John Holmes of Maine, Horatio Seymour of Vermont, Isham Talbot of Kentucky, and Ethan Allen Brown of Ohio. Among the Senators at that time were Rufus King, Nathaniel Macon, Thomas H. Benton, and others equally distinguished, as will be seen by the following list of Senators who were members of the Eighteent Conlowing list of Senators who were members of the Eighteenth Con-

The bill was passed by the Senate without a division. It then went to the House of Represensatives and was referred to the Judiciary Committee, of which Daniel Webster was chairman, and Philip P. Barbour of Virginia, William Plumer of New Hampshire, Hutchins G. Burton of North Carolina, William L. Brent of Louisiana, and R. M. Saunders of North Carolina were the other members. By that it was unanimously reported to the House with the recommendation was unanimously reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass. Owing to the late period of the session no action was taken upon it. But if gentlemen will examine the sections in that bill, as given on page 59 of the House compilation of precedents, they will find that the bill of 1824 contains substantially the provisions of the bill now under consideration in reference to returns from States where but one return is received.

The bill then was taken by the joint committees as the basis for the first section of the bill now under consideration; and it had the sanction of some of the greatest men of this country who have gone before us; so that in reference to this measure it may be safely affirmed that the wisest statesmen of the country have voted in favor of the substance of its chief provisions and have recognized their propri-ety and constitutionality.

The next important precedent upon this question is found in the The next important precedent upon this question is found in the bill of Senator Morron, of Indiana, which was introduced in the last session of the Forty-third Congress and passed the Senate at the first session of this Congress. That bill passed the Senate after a most exhaustive discussion and as able as was ever given to any measure in the Congress of the United States. That bill is printed on page 459 of this compilation and the first section of it is substantially the first section of the bill under consideration. When that bill was upon its passage it received the votes of nearly every republican Senator and was only opposed by democratic Senators upon the ground that there was no provision made in the case of double returns to save the vote of a State if one House voted to receive one return and the other House voted to receive the other. In this contingency the vote of the State would be lost, and it was to save every vote of every State that another effort was made to perfect that bill at the last session.

The action of Congress on the Ross bill of 1800, the Van Buren The action of Congress on the Ross bill of 1800, the Van Buren bill of 1824, and of the Morton bill of 1875-76 constitute precedents fully establishing the authority of Congress to pass the first section of the joint committees's bill, now under consideration. And the precedent goes even further than the first section of the bill. In 1800, the bill as reported by the special committee of the Senate, Messrs. Ross, Lawrence, Dexter, Pinckney, and Livermore, created a grand committee, consisting of six Senators and six Representatives, chosen by ballot, and the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, which grand committee, it was provided in the bill. United States, which grand committee, it was provided in the bill, should "have power to examine and finally to decide all disputes relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States." It is true that the bill did not pass the Senate in this shape, It is true that the bill did not pass the Senate in this shape, but there is no speech reported or word uttered against this provision by any Senator on the ground that it would be unconstitutional to create such a grand committee with the Chief-Justice as President thereof.

There was an amendment moved to the Morton bill by Senator Frelinghuysen, March 14, 1876, which referred disputed or double returns, in case the Houses differed as to which should be counted, to the Speaker of the House, the President of the Senate, and the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court, whose decision should be final. Upon moving this amendment, Senator Frelinghuysen said:

This is a judicial question; a question of law and fact; but judicial, whether of fact or law; and it seems to me that there is a propriety in referring it to the presiding officer of the judicial department. It is true that it is judicial, and yet it is political in its nature. The Constitution has imposed certain duties upon the presiding officer of the Senate, and the presiding officers of the Senate and of the House are competently associated with the Chief-Justice. If it be said that nothing will result excepting the loss of the vote of one State unless we make this arrangement, the loss of one State is a great loss; it is an organic loss; it is a loss that may change the character of the whole election; it is a loss that the people of this country would not quietly submit to. It seems to me it is very important that before we pass this bill we should make such arrangement as will secure the vote of every State, for thereby we may avoid civil war.

This amendment of Senator FRELINGHUYSEN having made the decision of the Chief-Justice and the Speaker of the House and President of the Senate final, was opposed in the Senate by those who held that the two Houses ought to have the final decision of the question as well as by those who thought it inexpedient to refer so important a question to the decision of one man, the Chief-Justice. The amendment was not adopted, but it received the votes of the following Senators, namely:

Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conkling, Dawes, Ferry, Frelinghaysen, Hamlin, Howe, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Paddock, Robertson, Sharon, West, and Windom—20.—House compitation, Counting Electoral Votes, page 599.

Among these affirmative votes are the names of at least five Senators who voted against the bill under consideration when on its passage in the Senate this morning, and among them will be noticed the name of the Senator from Indiana, who has opposed this bill because he says it is unconstitutional.

These precedents would seem to remove all constitutional objection to the creation of the commission proposed in the second section of this bill.

But it is objected to this section that there is a delegation to a com-But it is objected to this section that there is a delegation to a com-mission of power which rightly belongs to the two Honess. And the well-recognized maxim of the law, Delegata potestas ann potest delegare, is cited against such assumed delegation of power. Sir, there is no delegation of power in this bill. There is a reference of certain questions to a joint committee of the two Houses, who will be assisted in their efforts by five members of the Supreme Court. This high commission is authorized to consider and report to the two Houses in reference to double or disputed returns received by the President of the Senate from any State. The commission will find which are the true returns or certificates of the State. After that report has been made the return takes its place upon the same basis with the single returns and is to be counted, unless both Houses vote to reject it.

So that all that this commission does is to make out a prima facie case for the two Houses to act upon in the case of double returns. There is no delegation of legislative power. The counting of the vote or votes is the act of the two Houses. It is our act; and this mode of counting the votes is made effectual and is only authorized by the consent of the two Houses in the passage of this bill. The counting which is authorized becomes the act of the two Houses when they make this bill a law.

I hold that there must be concurrent action of the two Houses to count a vote. And those who contend that there must be concurrent action to count may well support this bill; for the mode of counting, and hence the counting itself, is done by the concurrent action of the two Houses in the passage of this bill. But those who hold that no vote can be rejected without concurrent action of both Houses may also support this measure, because the rejection of a vote can only be accomplished by concurrent action. There is no casus omissus in the Constitution on this subject. It has lodged the power and duty of counting the electoral vote in the two Houses, and Congress may by law regulate the mode or manner of exercising this power and performing this duty. The Constitution having vested in the two Houses the power to count the electoral votes, Congress may pass all laws necessary for carrying into effect this power. This bill, therefore, may be passed without any violation of the letter or spirit of the Constitution, but in the strict enforcement of its expressed provisions.

The other sections of the bill relate merely to the details of getting

The other sections of the bill relate merely to the details of getting together and voting upon the various questions that may arise.

What are the advantages of this measure? We have now double returns from four States of the Union, and it is charged that in some of those States gross frauds have been committed by the returning boards in making their returns of the electoral vote. Are you not willing to virtually take an appeal from these returning boards and submit your case to a tribunal which is the highest and most impartial that can be devised under our form of government—a commission consisting of five members selected by this House from the Representatives of the people; five selected from the Senators representing the sovereign States of the Union, and five selected from the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States on account of their eminent learning, unimpeachable integrity, and supposed impartiality in all cases? We propose to let these distinguished statesmen and jurists consider a question which it is claimed on the other side has been passed upon and decided irrevocably by a returning board the legality of which is questioned, and the integrity even of whose members is seriously doubted by a great portion of the American people. An appeal from the Louisiana returning board to this high tribunal is like stepping from the diminutive mole-hill to the sublime heights of Mont Blanc. It is transferring the case from the very lowest order of adjudication to the very highest that our Government can create.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that either of the presidential candidates ought to be perfectly willing to submit his case to this tribunal. I believe that any American citizen charged with crime against the Government would be perfectly willing to submit his liberty, his property, and his life to this tribunal. If we would be willing to submit to such a tribunal everything that we hold dear on earth, we should be willing to submit also to its decision this question whether our candidates for the Presidency have been elected by the people. I believe that the decision will be impartial, that it will be just, and will meet the approval of the American people.

There can be but little difference between requiring this decision to be final unless rejected by the two Houses and making it final when concurred in by both Houses, because, sir, no political party can afford to go before the country after rejecting the finding of this tribunal. It will be effectual and final, no matter whether it is submitted to the concurrent action of both Houses or whether it is to stand unless rejected by both. I believe that the bill will pass and that it will be hailed by the people of this country as an assurance that this great question is to be settled in accordance with law, in accordance with justice, and in such a manner as will give satisfaction to all the people of this country.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.
Mr. LAWRENCE. Is there anything in the report of the committee which holds that this bill authorizes an appeal from the returning boards of the States?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is it the purpose of the bill to have the commission revise the decisions of the returning boards of the States?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have not used the word "appeal" in a tech-

Mr. LAWRENCE. In what sense then was it used?
Mr. SPRINGER. I will explain the sense in which it was used.
It is said that the returning board had not authority of law to do what they did. They may have had or they may not have had. This matter will come before a tribunal which is authorized to consider that question with all the powers that the two Houses would have to consider it, whatever those powers are. The commission itself is the judge of its own powers in the premises; and in considering that question it will consider it just as members of this House might consider it, just as Senators might consider it in making up their judgment as to whether they will vote to approve the findings of the commission or to reject them. The commission's powers are not defined, from the fact that it was impossible to go into a definition of them. They take the case just as the representatives of the people take it—for what it is worth and upon the law as they may understand the law.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does the gentleman say that the powers of the commission are not defined; that they are left undefined?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do.
Mr. LAWRENCE. Is that question left to them to determine?
Mr. SPRINGER. They are to enter upon these questions with all the powers of the two Houses acting separately or together.

Mr. HOAR. With an appeal from their judgment to that of the two House

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir; as my learned and distinguished col-league on the committee suggests, with an appeal from their judg-ment to that of the two Houses acting in their capacity of Senate and House of Representatives, these bodies being after all the final arbiters of each case

This measure is not a compromise. No litigant compromises any of his rights by submitting his case to an honorable arbitration. of ms rights by submitting ins case to an informatic arctifation. It is a fair, a constitutional, and a peaceful method of settling a serious political complication. Let us pass it unanimously. The people without regard to party favor it. The business interests of the country demand it. It will re-assure all hearts. It will firmly establish the capacity of the American people for self-government. We have already set a good example to the world in the peaceful arbitration of a great international dispute with Great Britain. Let us settle our domestic differences with like honorable and peaceful methods.

When this measure becomes a law, as it surely will, there will be a feeling of relief all over the country. A great threatening calamity will have been averted. The revival of trade and commerce will be assured; the hum of industry will again be heard in the land; and our posterity will realize the fact that Peace bath her victories No less renown d than war.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLARD. Mr. Speaker, the astute Hannibal, after his defeat Mr. WHLLARD. Mr. speaker, the astute Hannidal, after his deteat at Zama, encouraged his remaining few and dispirited soldiery to wait for another opportunity to renew the warfare against Rome by applying to that republic the observation that "no great nation long remains quiet." He judged truly that all political communities of extended scope are liable to agitation and are never free from the elements of conflict and disturbance. This, Mr. Speaker, is the lesson of history. Every nation passes from one crisis to another, and great nations meet eventful periods in quick succession. They need constant oversight, and are never safe unless real statesmanship is at the Accordingly it is not remarkable that to-day the American Republic confronts a new danger. The peril of yesterday, for escaping which our felicitations are scarcely concluded, is succeeded by another which certainly has this importance, that almost from the foundation of the Government its prospect has excited the apprehensions of the wisest of our statesmen, and the crisis we now encounter has ever hung like a lowering cloud with an omen of tempest in the horizon of our political sky. That we on the occasion of its impending outburst may rise to that measure of patriotic wisdom that all serious calamity may be averted, is the imperative demand of the hour; and it is to be hoped that the popular expectation in this regard shall not be doomed to disappointment, and that this Congress will meet the requirements of duty in such a way that not alone the storm may pass harmlessly by, but that the cloud itself, with all its ominous threatenings, may be made to disappear forever.

For nearly three months, Mr. Speaker, this nation has been drifting upon a dangerous sea and exposed to the threatening perils to which I allude. On the 7th day of last November the American people in the several States of this Union and the various election precincts, under the prescribed constitutional method, resorted to the usual mode of expressing their choice for President and Vice-President of the United States. On similiar occasions in our previous history, at least during the memory of the present generation, this choice of the people for their respective candidates had been rendered with such spicuous clearness that no doubt could arise respecting the validity of the title by which, to use the language of Washington, "a citizen was designated to administer the executive government of the United States." But in the instance now presented it has been otherwise. Hardly had the two great parties of this country been permitted to take breath from the anxiety and exertion incident to the presidential campaign, and especially to election day, before they were roused into new and increased excitement by the doubts thrown around the election in three States of the Union. These three States, by a singular, but perhaps not wholly unfounded coincidence, are Latin in their origin, and one of them, in which the chief dispute exists, is still largely Latin in the character and spirit of its people; though I wish, sir, that it should be distinctly understood that I say this with no reproach upon the people of those Commonwealths, for I recall the fact that the first colonists in my own State were also of Latin source and that many of her best and most distinguished citizens have a just pride in recognizing a Latin ancestry. But by those who search for the more remote influences and tendencies which culminate in historic events, this fact can hardly be overlooked and should serve to moderate the judgments of men who too frequently forget that wise, impartial, and just statesmanship imposes the duty of a more scrupuimpartial, and just statesmanship imposes the duty of a more scripulous care that no harm be done to the principle of self-government, and that no wrong be inflicted in the course which shall be pursued in relation to populations and communities where constitutional liberty as understood and cherished in other sections may not have received its full measure of growth.

The doubt thus thrown over the election created not alone that anxiety which would be apt to arise among those whose hopes and fears had been especially excited during a heated canvass, but there fears had been especially excited during a heated canvass, but there arose also another fear, a fear that, with even greater intensity than mere partisan feeling, pervaded the great body of the people of all parties. We had been able to point to the eighty-eight years of the history of our Government in its present form, and to justly boast that no Chief Magistrate of the Republic had taken the solemn oath of his high office under circumstances which should permit the suspicion that his inauguration to the Presidency was not justified by every sanction of constitutional right. During these eighty-eight years we had faced the criticism of Europe, had quieted the fears of our friends and had triumphantly silenced the sneers of our foes; and the thought that we were to enter upon the second century of our pational existence we were to enter upon the second century of our national existence by disclosing a chapter which should not alone bring discredit upon ourselves, but upon popular institutions, was a reflection which brought most minds to the conclusion that the preservation of the national character, in seeking a just and fair count of the electoral vote, was a duty which every American, of whatsover party he might be, was obligated to support and aid to the extent of his ability.

That any citizen should appear in the illustrious list of Presidents of this nation without a clear and undoubted title was a result which every patriot desired above all things to avoid and which he shuddered to even contemplate. As men thought of the impartial judgment which history must finally render to all human conduct and action, they could not endure that any President of this Republic should pass into the future memories of men with the stigma that he had not been rightfully placed in the succession of our Chief Magistrates. Sir, among the portraits of the doges of republican Venice, to be seen in one of the palaces of that once proud and imperial seat of the world's commerce, there is a vacant space in the list, a mere frame without a portrait, and hung in black, indicating the reprobation without a portrait, and hung in black, indicating the reprobation with which the people of successive generations regard the memory of him who filled that place in the succession. It is safe to assert that no considerable portion of either party in this country, though they might not have any similar reason to deprecate the acts of a Chief Magistrate as in that instance, can by any means desire that his accession to power and authority shall be associated with any mistrust of the lawfulness of the methods and agencies by which it is secured. Meanwhile another evil became apparent. The prospect of serious trouble in the settlement of the presidential succession caused an immediate arrest of industrial and commercial activity among the fortymediate arrest of industrial and commercial activity among the forty-five millions of our people. The hope that the cessation of political excitement at the arbitrament in November would result in the re-newal of business energy was blighted, and there ensued the most complete paralysis upon every department of production and trade that has ever been witnessed in our annals. Capital, sensitive and fearful, retired from nearly every theater of business enterprise, either hiding in apprehension from the looked-for storm or waiting for what-soever sphere might be opened for it in a future as yet wholly be-yond the conjecture of the wisest spacity and foregight. Labor withyond the conjecture of the wisest sagacity and foresight. Labor without employ has waited with a heroic patience for relief, a patience, sir, which demands recognition at our hands, and which is a proof of the abiding patriotism of the people and a lasting credit and honor to the nation. For nearly one-quarter of an entire year has business already been benumbed by the paralyzing touch of this presidential difficulty, and that, too, throughout the wide bounds of our extended empire. This fatal depression rests not upon one State or one section empire. This fatal depression rests not upon one State or one section alone, but upon all States and all sections. No city, no community, no sequestered spot, from the great Lakes to the Gulf, from one ocean to the other, is exempt. It weighs with irresistible impartiality upon the whole Union, and suggests to every one that, whatever may be our differences and contests in these legislative halls, however strongly may wage the strife of party conflict and dispute, the interests and hopes of the entire people are, after all, bound together by one common tie and are subjected, for weal or for wee, to one common destiny. Business, Mr. Speaker, is not separated by party lines. The industries, the commercial intercourse, the wide internal and even foreign trade the commercial intercourse, the wide internal and even foreign trade of the American people, are jealous of geographical and partisan dis-tinctions; while, as for distress and want, it is perhaps one of the most fortunate circumstances of our present situation that they are divided from competence and comparative abundance by no mere party discrimination. Republicans and democrats, the people of the North and the people of the South, those of the East and those of the West, the inhabitants of cities and the inhabitants of the rural sections, all trades and all classes experience how fully the public tranquillity is allied with personal prosperity and how unerringly political disturb-ance affects and impairs individual welfare.

There is no doubt that the irreconcilable difference in the positions toward which the two great parties of the country have of late been gravitating, in relation to the authority in which the Constitution vests the right to determine the electoral result, has had no little influence in exciting popular apprehension and in awakening fears for the public safety. Prominent leaders have not been wanting, in either of the rival political organizations, who assume conclusions which would severally secure the recognized selection of their candidates; and party opinion has for the past few weeks been rapidly concentrating around two opposing theories, one holding that the concentrating around two opposing theories, one holding that the President of the Senate alone is authorized to examine, adjudicate, and count the electoral vote; the other, that the House of Representatives, without the concurrence of the Senate, can determine whether an election has been made by the elective college, and proceed to make its choice of the candidates under the provisions of the Constitution. To prove these positions to be respectively untenable, in the judgment of a portion of the people, was by no means to silence the opposing voices which, clamoring for these respective views, were loud in their determination to urge them with something more than loud in their determination to urge them with something more than the logic of words and were already, with more or less earnestness, threatening an appeal to the "ultima ratio regum," the stern arbitra-

The menace of the situation has been increased by the unwarranted extent to which the rancor of party has been carried. Heedless of the warnings of the Father of his Country in the farewell address which he made to his countrymen, ultra partisans are demonstrating that he spoke with prophetic wisdom when he said:

Let me warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of party spirit generally. This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, repressed; but in those of popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

* * In governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest instead of warning it should consume.

Who can deny, sir, that the Republic has recently been led to realize the truth of these utterances of the most thoughtful, the most pruthe truth of these utterances of the most thoughtful, the most prudent, and the most moderate of all the great statesmen who are named among its founders? For either party, therefore, in this aspect of affairs, to push its favorite method to extremity, and to take the responsibility of deciding the question at issue, is to abandon all substantial hope of that fairness of decision which can alone meet the demands and quiet the fears of the country. Parties, like nations, are too apt to act on the principle that might makes right. When they desire a result, they readily devise an expedient for its accomthey desire a result, they readily devise an expedient for its accomplishment. And what adds to the evil is that unfortunate trait of all partisan conflict, that it becomes the effort of each party to force its rival into the most extreme positions and into measures fatal to the public welfare and to the maintenance of constitutional liberty; thus impressing with perpetual emphasis of example the lesson which more than twenty centuries ago the philosophic and eloquent Isocrates drew from his survey of Athenian parties and their contests. "In a Republic," he observes, "there are always at least two parties, each of which hopes that the other will misgovern the country as grossly as possible." He could hardly have found language more fitting to portray the aims of extremists to frustrate efforts and designs for the public interest.

At all times, Mr. Speaker, partisan differences should yield to the paramount requirement of the peace and safety of the Republic. Especially should this be the case when, as now, these differences are not concerning questions which vitally affect either the national existence or the liberty of the citizen. They are questions of importance indeed, for all questions of administration in a free government are important; but they are such as might well sink from sight if by remaining they shall afford the least possible chance that they may become the fatal rocks upon which republican freedom on this conti-nent may incur that disastrous and irreparable shipwreck which we all believe would be one of the greatest calamities that it would be possible to inflict upon mankind. Can it be the part of patriotism to listen to the uncompromising and unyielding clamors of party at this hour? Is it the voice of wise and true statesmanship, that what each party wishes to accomplish it should proceed to accomplish without regard to the consequences that may ensue? Must the differences of sections, which the national interest certainly requires should be adjusted as speedily as possible, and which I have believed to be in some particulars exaggerated beyond their real significance, must these differences become the means of our final overthrow? power of dispensing official patronage, important as it may be to the public welfare, be insanely crowded as the overmastering issue until it shall become the agency of national destruction? I trust not. It is to be hoped that both parties will pause before bringing the nation to the dreadful abyss. Let us at this time invoke the spirit of wisdom, which in the present instance certainly is the spirit of concord. Let us apply for our guidance, and for the inspiration of our purpose at the crisis which we have now reached, the patriotic counsel which was given for the moderation of British strife a century and a half since by that eminent advocate of freedom, the accomplished Boling-

It is time, therefore, that all who desire to be esteemed good men and to procure the peace, the strength, and the glory of their country, by the only means by which they can be procured effectually, should join their efforts to heal our national divis-ions, and to change the narrow spirit of party into a diffusive spirit of public

The bill under discussion, Mr. Speaker, is a measure designed to check this manifest tendency of parties to assume an attitude which must inevitably perpetuate the disquiet that now reigns throughout the country, and may perhaps introduce an era of agitation and discord whose dread results no man can undertake to predict. The bill is proposed in the exercise of that vigilance imposed by the admonition of Washington, to stifle, control, and repress the fire of party spirit now ready to burst into flame, and to prevent, if possible, the least chance that a conflagration may break forth for the ruin of the fairest political fabric ever reared for the liberty and happiness of man. It is to nip in the bud an evil which ruined every republic of ancient Greece; which prostrated every hope and blasted every effort for Roman freedom; which afterward disappointed every patriotic aspiration indulged for Venice, Florence, Genoa, and all the fair galaxy of communities in the Middle Ages, which braved foreign despotism only to succumb to civil commotion and disputes about the succession of power; and which, finally, on this continent, has made Mexico, in its conflicts and divisions, in its sudden revolts and countless revolutions, the very antithesis of that destiny which every American has been proud to anticipate for his own more fortunate The bill under discussion, Mr. Speaker, is a measure designed to American has been proud to anticipate for his own more fortunate country. If history had recorded the destruction of republican gov-ernment in a single instance by any other method than by the un-reasonable strife of parties; if it had shown a single other road to the ruin of free governments than this one alone, public apprehension, at this time might seem less groundless; but when we come near the gateway which all the teachings of history and all the warnings of our fathers assure us to be the sole and exclusive entrance to destruction, no patriot can hesitate in the adoption of some measure that shall prevent its being opened.

The advisability of the measure now proposed is enforced with the greater emphasis from the consideration that it appears to be the only one practicable for avoiding a recourse to unsafe expedients and the introduction of methods which in the future would prove detrimental, even if we should have the good fortune to escape serious trouble at the present. For the first time in our national history we are permitted to witness an absolute practical demonstration of the consequences of two conflicting claims of power under the Constitution to count the electoral vote. We see brought face to face assumptions of jurisdiction which place the settlement of disputes arising in presidential elections respectively in a single fragment of the Government. Doctrines are asserted which make the great depositories of legislative power in the nation completely powerless, and which oblige every department of authority to submissively bow to the dictation of the presiding officer of a single branch of the legislative body on the one hand or of a bare majority of either branch on the other. That either of these warrants of power was designed to be conveyed to the respective claimants by the framers of the Constitution, I cannot bring myself, for one, to believe; nor do I find any warrant for the conclusions thus urged, either in the language of the Constitution itself or in the earlier precedents of practice under it. Either by rule or by law the two great depositories of legislative power and authority in this nation have, under the Constitution, provided for every pro-cedure, for every regulation, for every scrutiny, for every adjudica-tion of the electoral vote, from the foundation of the Government to the present time. Unless under some provision of the Senate and House of Representatives previously agreed upon or virtually assented to, no step has been taken to proceed to that most high and solemn to, no step has been taken to proceed to that most high and solemn of all duties in our Government, to determine the person in whom the people have signified their wish to repose the chief executive power. In the absence of law, certainly, the jurisdiction qualified to make this high decision does not reside in any single fraction or part of the National Legislature, but in the whole of the two branches designated in the Constitution for its exercise. They are the sole judges and umpires if no law be provided, and if a law be provided it is only to regulate the power which the Constitution has assigned to them. The jurisdiction constitutionally resides in both Houses acting separately but together.

Now suppose it to be possible under the Constitution for either House to retain its reserve of power in the performance of the duty House to retain its reserve of power in the performance of the duty to count the vote, and to refuse to agree upon a proper method of adjusting the differences of judgment that might arise, and which in the present instance would be most certain to arise between them, would such a refusal be either patriotic or wise? Is the position to be assumed that the Senate and House of Representatives must in that case come to a dead-lock of judicial action, to the irrepressible conflict of divided judgment upon one of the most momentous questions that can be submitted to them, and that there is no way, either by mutual arrangement or by the forms of law, to escape the difficulty? For one, Mr. Speaker, I will say that I have too profound a reverence and too exalted an estimation of the wisdom and statesmanship of the founders of this Republic to believe that they ever intended to the founders of this Republic to believe that they ever intended to the founders of this Republic to believe that they ever intended to put any clause into the organic law of the nation which should compel the two Houses of Congress to defy each other's judgment, and forbid them to harmonize that judgment under the provisions of that great and solemn trust which is confided to Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

We come thus to the question whether the jurisdiction of the two Houses in this matter can be safely left unregulated by law at this

Houses in this matter can be safely left unregulated by law at this juncture. The difficulties which must inevitably be encountered without such regulation are clearly obvious; for the doctrine that a vote cannot be counted unless by the concurrent affirmative action of the two Houses of course implies that if that affirmative is not given both by the Senate and House of Representatives to the vote of a State then the vote of that State is lost. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have only to say in relation to that view that any method which tends to facilitate such a result and to make it a common occurrence in this facilitate such a result and to make it a common occurrence in this country is a practical evil which the highest demands of justice require us as far as possible to avoid. To stifle the voice of one of our republics in the hour when the Chief Magistrate of the nation is to be selected is a solemn responsibility which Congress should alone take under the safeguards of the deepest caution and in the exercise of the most watchful care. In a republican government, to disfranchise a single citizen legally qualified to vote is one of the highest crimes against liberty, but to disfranchise a whole people, the people of an entire Commonwealth is an act of immensely greater importance and entire Commonwealth, is an act of immensely greater importance and one which should only be permitted to occur in a contingency wherein such an act shall be justified as the conclusion of the most patient and impartial scrutiny which it is in the power of the nation to provide or of the human mind, in its clearest intellection and most unvide or of the human mind, in its clearest intellection and most unclouded judgment, to render.

The two Houses, and they alone, may decide upon returns and receive or exclude the vote of a State. If both agree in their judgment, the question is settled. But if they do not agree, unless some provision is made to the contrary, no judgment is rendered. The vote is neither received nor rejected and, like Mohammed's coffin, is suspended in midair, belonging neither to the shining ranks of the electoral list nor to those which have been cast out to be trodden under foot. The Constitution is not obeyed. The vote is not counted, nor, on the other hand, has there been a decision that the return made is not a constitutional vote. A great function of duty in the Government is practically for the moment annulled, or rather waits for the required exercise of its power and authority. Grant that the House ment is practically for the moment annufied, or rather waits for the required exercise of its power and authority. Grant that the House and Senate, being but two units, can neither give an affirmative nor negative judgment unless when they concur; grant that, as with the dunmviri of the Romans, difference is silence, and that to disagree is to do nothing; is it to be conceived that the framers of the Constitution supposed that there would be so little wisdom in the two Houses of Congress that they would not devise a method by which a judge. of Congress that there would be so little wisdom in the two rootses of Congress that they would not devise a method by which a judgment on so important a matter as the temporary disfranchisement of a sovereign State of this Union or the determination of the result of a presidential election would be unattainable by any of the processes of law, by any of these time-honored customs and regulations of justice which have been confided to the law-making power and which it is the confidence of the sayon the distribution of the sayon the distribution of the sayon. have for centuries been the distinguishing characteristic of the Saxon race? It is fair to infer that the fathers believed that in making the two Houses judges and umpires in a case which involved the succession of executive power and authority in this great nation, they also supposed that these bodies would not rashly and foolishly neutralize each other, but that, each preserving its independence to act and to judge, they would separately agree to provide some plan for avoiding not alone the nullification of all judgment of either House but also the nullification of the will of the people of one or more States of this Union, and perhaps even the nullification and reversal of the will of the people of one or more states of this union, and perhaps even the nullification and reversal of the state the nation in regard to the future administration of its affairs and the policy of its Government.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I have given my approval to the bill while it was under consideration in the committee and now give my cordial support to it in the House. I believe that while it may be regarded in one sense as the offspring of a great public necessity, it is also the natural outgrowth of the Constitution and a wise and just method for the adjudication and settlement of a most important ques tion. To provide by law for an equal scale of justice to weigh the evidence and determine the result of a contest in which the hopes of both parties in the nation are enlisted with almost unexampled earnestness, would appear to be the only means of adjudication wholly accordant with the genius and spirit of our institutions. Whether we look at the plain language of the Constitution or at the precedents we look at the plain language of the Constitution or at the precedents of proceeding under it, we can come to no other conclusion than that some such measure as this is the only one really consistent with the fairness, the candor, the intelligence, the dignity, and the self-control which characterize the people of the United States. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it is with a sentiment of pride that I contemplate the prospect of the peaceful adjudication of a question which in almost any other nation of the globe save our own, would have lift the height state. other nation of the globe, save our own, would have lit the lurid flames of civil war, that kind of war which leads to a losing result, whichever side may succeed.

The very spirit of the fathers breathes in the pacific measure now before the House. The memories of the great patriots of American history are again awakened by the resolves of an American Congress to so far relinquish the fervor of partisan zeal as to unitedly seek and bow before the shrine of equal and impartial justice. The Republic has in other periods demonstrated its greatness; it has won on other occasions the admiration of mankind for the successful example which it has afforded of self-government; it has hitherto wrested confidence from the unbelieving and extorted unwilling praise from every enemy of free institutions both at home and abroad; but the assertion may well be ventured that the peaceable and just disposal of the differences now existing among the American people will be regarded, wherever the light of the sun may rest, or an interest in human affairs may be felt, as the very highest proof that this nation has yet given, that the star of its destiny is forever ascendant, and that the future of the Republic is anchored upon the immovable foundations of justice and of law.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a correct determination of the question who shall count the electoral votes can only be had by a resort to the Constitution of the United States. It must be our guide. From it we gather that-

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted;—the person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President.

By whom are these votes to be counted? If it had been the intention of the framers of the Constitution to have the Senate or House of Representatives, or both combined, to count the votes, it would doubtless have been so expressed, and the mode of voting, either per capita or by States, would have been indicated. It was not so done, and presumably because such was not the intention. The President of the Senate is the party designated to receive and open the certificates; he is made the custodian of the certificates. On a certain day named by the act of 1792 he is to open them in the presence of day named by the act of 1792 he is to open them in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, when the votes shall then be counted. We repeat, by whom? Naturally, as at the very first count, by tellers, under the supervision of the President of the Senate. The words "shall then be counted" relieve the President of the arithmetical work of adding up columns of figures. If it had said "he shall count" as it said "he shall open" it might require the labor to be strictly performed by him in order to comply literally with the instrument; but the words "shall then be counted" justify the universal practice of counting them by tellers. The tellers do the work under his direction, and announce the result to him, not to the Speaker of the House or to the House and Senate. All other parties except the President of the Senate are utterly ignored. No business has ever been done in this body except to count the votes, and to this effect has been the ruling of all the Presidents of the Senate whenever an attempt was made to raise a side-issue.

In some States deeds and wills have to be signed in the presence of witnesses, but this attesting privilege gives to the witnesses no control over the contents of the instruments. In my State, Pennslyvania, capital executions are to be carried into effect by the sheriff "in the presence of twelve reputable citizens." It would be the height the presence of twelve reputable citizens." It would be the height of absurdity to contend that these citizens had a right to question the verdict of the jury or the sentence of the court. They are there to witness a fact and certify, if need be, that the death-warrant of the governor has been executed. Logically, the House of Representatives and Senators are present to certify to the opening of the certificates and the counting of the electoral votes. And this was Chancellor Kent's opinion. Hear him: on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of electors, in the presence of both Houses of Congress, opens all the certificates, and the votes are then to be counted. The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In case of questionable votes, and a closely contested election, this power may be all important; and I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Sente counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two Houses are present only as spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors.

The President of the Senate

To aid in the construction of the Constitution, if it is ambiguous, resort must be had to the contemporaneous views of its framers. first order, emanating in 1788 from the convention that formed the Constitution, directed the Senate to elect a President for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes. At the election for the first term, 1789, (George Washington, President, John Adams, Vice-President,) the following record occurs:

April 6, 1879.

The credentials of the members present being read and ordered to be filed, the Senate proceeded by ballet to the choice of a President for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States.

John Langdon was elected.

John Langdon was elected.

Ordered. That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sale purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed, in the presence of the House, to discharge that duty; and that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; submitting it to the wisdom of this House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose.

Mr. Ellsworth reported that he had delivered the message. Mr. Boudinot, from the House of Representatives, informed the Senate that the House is ready forth.

inttaing it to the wisdom of this trous, to appear the like purpose.

Mr. Budinot, from the House of Representatives, informed the Senate that the House is ready forthwith to meet them, to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the President and Vice-President of the United States.

The record of the proceedings continues thus:

The Speaker and members of the House of Representatives attended in the Senate Chamber; and the President elected for the purpose of counting the votes declared that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Whereby it appeared that George Washington, esq., was elected President, and John Adams, esq., Vice-President of the United States of America.

The President of the Senate made the following certificate of election :

Be it known that, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America being convened in the city and State of New York. April 6, in the year of our Lord 1789, the underwritten, appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes of the electors, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and a Vice-President; by which it appears that George Washington, esquire, was unanimously elected, agreeably to the Constitution, to the office of President of the United States of America. In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal.

JOHN LANGDON.

A similar certificate was given to the Vice-President. At the election for the second term, 1793, (George Washington, President, John Adams, Vice-President,) the following entry occurs:

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Otis, their Secretary:

Mr. Speaker: I am also directed to inform the House that a President of the Senate is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States, and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to attend with the House on that occasion.

Resolved, That Mr. Speaker, attended by the House, do now withdraw to the Senate Chamber for the purpose expressed in the said message.

At the election for the third term, 1797, (John Adams, President, Thomas Jefferson, Vice-President,) the following certificate was ordered to be transmitted to Thomas Jefferson:

dered to be transmitted to Thomas Jefferson:

Mr. Mason reported from the committee as appointed, and the report, being read was amended and adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be transmitted to Thomas Jefferson, esq., of Virginia, Vice-President elect of the United States, notification of his election to that office; and that the President of the Senate do make out and sign a certificate in the words following:

"Be it known that, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened in the city of Philadelphia on the second Wednesday of February, in the year of our Lord 1797, the underwritten, Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, did, in presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and for a Vice-President; by which it appears that Thomas Jefferson, esq., was duly elected, agreeable to the Constitution, Vice-President of the United States of America.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 10th day of February, 1797."

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

At the election for the fourth term, 1801, (Thomas Jefferson, President, Aaron Burr, Vice-President,) the following certificate was ordered:

February 18, 1801.

The Senate, having been notified by the House of the election of Thomas Jefferson as President of the United States, adopted the following resolution; which was ordered to be laid before the President of the United States:

*Resolved**, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be transmitted to Aaron Burr, esq., of New York, Vice-President of the United States, notification of his election to that office; and the President of the Senate do make out and sign a certificate in the words following, namely:

Be it known that, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America being convened at the city of Washington on the second Wednesday of February, A. D. 1301, the underwritten, Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for President; whereupon it appeared that Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, and Aaron Burr, of New York, had a majority of the votes of the electors and an equal number of votes; in consequence of which the House of Representatives proceeded to a choice of a President, and have this day notified to the Senate that Thomas Jefferson has by them been duly chosen President; by all of which it appears that Aaron Burr, esq., of New York, is duly elected, agreeably to the Constitution, Vice-President of the United States of America.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 18th day of February, 1801.

At the election for the sixth term, 1809, (James Madison, President, George Clinton, Vice-President;)

At the seventh term, 1813, (James Madison, President, Elbridge Gerry, Vice-President;)

At the eight term, 1817, (James Monroe, President, Daniel D. Tomppears on the ninth, none on the eleventh, and so on to the end.

In the record of proceedings in the election of Zachary Taylor, February 14, 1849, (Hon. George M. Dallas, Vice-President,) in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, after the returns from the State of Maine had been read, Mr. Stephens arose and suggested that the reading at length of the returns from each State in detail be dispensed with. The Vice-President stated that no motion was in order and no other mode of proceeding could be adopted than that pointed out by the Constitution of the United States, but that the tollers wight a bridge the record so far as to give merely the that the tellers might abridge the report so far as to give merely the results of the electoral ballotings of each State.

On the 11th of February, 1857, at the election for the eighteenth term, (James Buchanan, President, and John C. Breckinridge, Vice-President,) the presiding officer, Mr. Mason, used the following lan-

Pursuant to law and in obedience to the concurrent order of the two Houses, the President of the Senate will now proceed to open and count the votes which have been given for a President and Vice-President of the United States for the term prescribed by the Constitution to commence on the 4th day of March, 1857.

Senator Cass said:

I wish to submit a single remark to the President and to the Senate, for I do not consider that this convention can be addressed. We can take no vote. How are we to vote? Per capita or by States? Are we to vote as representatives of the people or representatives of States? If we cannot vote here we cannot discuss. The only thing which remains for us to do, if there are insuperable difficulties in the way, is to adjourn immediately to our respective Halls. By the present proceeding we are overturning the Government; we are making this a national convention.

The Presidne Officer. It is the opinion of the presiding officer that no vote can be taken by the two Houses thus assembled, and no motion calling for a vote is in order.

In 1800, Senator Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, in speaking of the intent of the framers of the Constitution, made this emphatic statement, namely:

Knowing that it was the intention of the Constitution to make the President completely independent of the Federal Legislature, I well remember it was the object, as it is at present not only the spirit but the letter of that instrument, to give to Congress no interference in or control over the election of a President. It is made their duty to count over the votes in a convention of both Houses, and for the President of the Senate to declare who has the majority of the votes of the electors so transmitted. It never was intended nor could it have been safe, in the Constitution, to have given to Congress thus assembled in convention the right to object to any vote, or even to question whether they were constitutionally or properly given.

Thus it appears that from the time the Constitution went into operation, to wit, on the first Wednesday of March, 1789, until the 6th of February, 1865, the uniform practice was for the President of the Senate, through the medium of tellers, to count the electoral votes. All attempts to change or vary this procedure utterly failed until the adoption of the twenty-second joint rule, now, thank Heaven! abrogated. Is this uninterrupted usage of seventy-six years, recognized as sound by the framers of the Constitution and its eminent expounders, now to be changed?

Under the Constitution the States are expressly authorized to determine the manner of choosing their presidential electors. In some States these were chosen by the State Legislatures; in others by districts, each district having one; and in others by the popular system now in vogue. These electors represent the States, the number being equal to the number of Representatives and Senators to which each State is entitled. The States enact laws regulating the manner in which these electors shall be chosen. Whether these laws are agreeable to Congress is wholly immaterial, nor is it indeed mandatory for the States to choose electors. If the laws are obnoxious, it rests with the Legislature to repeal the same. No authority is creit rests with the Legislature to repeal the same. No authority is created to go behind the returns of a canvassing board. Had the Constitution designed that the choosing of electors should be revised, the framers would have said so. Moreover a tribunal would have been indicated to try any issues of fact raised. This tribunal might have been the Senate or House or the two acting concurrently. No such tribunal exists by express power nor by implication; it is fair therefore to presume that none such was intended to be created.

To settle the difficulty growing out of the action of the canvassing board of Louisiana recourse must be had to the law of 1872, by which it was created. The following section indicates the duty of said board:

board of Louisiana recourse must be had to the law of 1872, by which it was created. The following section indicates the duty of said board:

Sec. 3. That in such canvass and compilation the returning officers shall observe the following order: They shall compile first the statements from all polls or voting-places at which there shall have been a fair, free, and peaceable registration and election. Whenever from any poll or voting-place there shall be received the statement of any supervisor of registration or commissioner of election in form as required by section 26 of this act, on adiabatt of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, which prevented, or tended to prevent, a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place, such returning officers shall not canvass, count, or compile the statements of votes from such poll or voting-places shall have been canvassed and compiled. The returning officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any such poll or voting-place; and if from the evidence of such statement they shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the result of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning officers shall canvass and compile the vote of such poll or voting-place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the result of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning officers shall be convinced that said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed d

From this it appears that the board exercised judicial authority. Whether it was properly exercised or not, is a point not be inquired of by Congress. All that even a court could do would be to quired of by Congress. All that even a court could do would be to compel them to act, leaving it to them to exercise their own judgment as to how to discharge their duty. From the facts they are to draw conclusions, and they, not Congress, must be the judges of the facts. Whether there were the violence, intimidation and terrorism which under the act justified them in excluding certain parishes, was their province to determine. Their decision is a finality and cannot be reviewed by Congress. It is the solemn action of the State of Louisiana, for the canvassing board is the creature of the State of Louisiana, if Congress can revise the action of the can-State, not of Congress. If Congress can revise the action of the canvassing board of Louisiana, it follows necessarily that it can travel into every other State in the Union and examine and revise and overturn all other canvassing boards. The supreme court of Louisiana says:

"No statute conferring upon the courts the power to try cases of contested elections or title to office authorizes them to revise the action of the returning board. If we were to assume that prerogative, we should have to go still further and revise the returns of supervisors of elections, examine the rights of voters to vote, and, in short, the courts would become in regard to such cases mere officers for counting, compiling, and reporting election returns. The Legislature has seen proper to lodge the power to decide who has or has not been elected in the returning board.
"It might have conferred that power on the courts, but it did not. Whether the law be good or bad, it is our duty to obey its provisions, and not to legislate."

But if it is necessary here to vindicate the correctness of this Lou-isiana canvassing board, it can easily be done. A thousand witnesses show intimidation, terrorism, fraud, and murder, such as are a disgrace to the nineteenth century. From the volume in my possession abundant evidence is furnished that the South has failed signally to carry into effect the fifteenth amendment. In no honest sense has the carry into effect the fitteenth amendment. In no honest sense has the South adopted the same. It is a dead article in the democratic creed. Universal suffrage was to be the twin-sister of universal amnesty. How universal! the suffrage has been, recent startling events must answer. Barbarians would blush to be charged with these inhuman crimes. No age, sex, or condition have been spared. These political crimes do not occur in the North. Here the right to vote is not abridged or depied to any citizen on account of race color or waveling. crimes do not occur in the North. Here the right to vote is not abridged or denied to any citizen on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Here Ku-Klux bands are unknown; here no masked rifle clubs armed disturb peaceful citizens, or shoot or murder white or colored on account of political differences. These organizations are to the manner born and are the outgrowth of that dogma, "This is a white man's government." Here let the affidavits, taken at random from the book now on my table containing the evidence of over one thousand witnesses, speak for themselves. I submit a few: over one thousand witnesses, speak for themselves. STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Orleans:

Parish of Orleans:

I, Louis K. Polk, was commissioner of election at the first ward poll in the parish of West Feliciana. About twelve minutes after the poll was opened a crowd of white men, about thirty-five in number, came up, there being a crowd of colored men at the poll. They pushed their way, and said, "Let the first ward club come in here and vote," using force to do so, and compelled the colored men to fall back from their position in line, where they were waiting their chance to vote. During the day a colored man came to the poll with a republican ticket in his hand, and the democrats asked him if he had a ticket. He told them yes, and showed them a republican ticket. They then took the ticket from his hand and tore it up, and said, "O, h-l, that is not the ticket." This was when he was at the box ready to vote. They then gave him a democratic ticket, and told him "that was the ticket he must vote."

vote. They then gave him a democratic ticket, and told him "that was the ticket he must vote."

About eleven o'clock in the day the democrats received information that the road was crowded with negroes coming into town to vote. They then mounted their horses and started away to prevent them from reaching the polls, swearing that they should not come there to vote the republican ticket, and after that no colored man reached the poll from that direction. During the past year the parish has been patrolled by armed men, who threatened the colored men, swearing that they should not vote the republican ticket; that they must come with the white people or they would make them leave; and since the election I know of about sixty colored men who voted the republican ticket who have been turned out of employment and notified to leave, and these men, being in fear of their lives, were compelled to quit the parish. Since the election a great many of my friends in the town of Bayou Sara, at Saint Francisville, have come to me and told me they had been compelled to vote the democratic ticket through fear of losing their lives and property. Some who had been turned away because they had refused to join the democratic club before election, and through fear voted the democratic ticket, were skapped on the shoulder by the democrats around the poll and told to come to them the next day and they would set them to work, and some of those who voted the republican ticket have been repeatedly cursed and threatened upon the streets since election.

republican ticket have been repeatedly cursed and threatened upon the streets since election.

On the Sunday before election there was a barbecue in the parish of Pointe Coupée, at the court-house at New Road. Myself, Senater Weber, and others went over to attend in the evening. There were a crowd of men on the river-bank. They were white men, armed with pistols. One went down to the ferry-boat inquiring for Senator Weber. The ferryman told him that Senator Weber had failed to reach the river before he left, and that he had left him over there. He then wanted to know if he did not intend to go back for him. The ferryman told him, "No; he did not intend to go back that night." They posted themselves upon the river-bank and watched every skiff that came over. I then got a skiff and recrossed the river and went to the post-office, where I met the band. I was looking for Senator Weber, fearing that he might go aboard the steamboat R. E. Lee, being convinced that these white men were hunting for him, and that if they met him they would kill him. I then went back to the lower part of Pointe Coupée, where I staid all night. The next morning I took a horse, and met Senator Weber and others who were coming toward the ferry landing, when I warned him of his danger, and then he went down to below the island, crossed over, and returned to his home through the wood. The first skiff which crossed the river from Bayou Sara Monday morning, six or seven white men, all armed, met the skiff, and inquired for Senator Weber. Not finding him, they wanted to know when he was coming over. They were evidently anxions and determined to find him, and I am convinced they intended to do him bodily harm. I have also heard them say that they would not quit bull-dozing until they had succeeded in doing away or getting rid of Senator Weber and his republican colleagues.

LOUIS K. POLK.

Subscribed and sworn before me November 15, 1876.
F. A. WOOLFLEY,
Commissioner United States Circuit Court, District of Louisiana.

13. Jared M. Harrill, planter in East Feliciana, seventh ward. He employs fifty co ored men. Has often been notified that he must attend democratic meetings and vote the democratic ticket or that he must leave the parish.

His hands were taken from their work and compelled to vote the democratic ticket.

He saw them. They told him they did it not from choice, but because they had

He saw them. They told him they did it not from choice, but because they had been vold that unless they did so they must leave the country.

Democrats would appoint a meeting and then ride through the country and notify all the colored and many white men that they must come. They came to him and expressed their nuwillingness. He told them that he could not protect them.

To intimidate me, the bull-dozers took one of the women in my house and whipped her nearly to death. They were armed with shot-guns and pistols; arrested him; threatened to hang him. He defled them. Then they broke into the house, took out the woman, stripped her, and beat her most to death. I armed myself to resist. They told me if I had any of them exposed or attempted to arrest any one they would hang me.

Such acts of violence were perpetrated on nearly all the white republican planters in my parish.

When summoned here, he was warned that he should be held accountable for his statements, and if he injured them he should be put out of the way.

4. William Hansberry, of poll 1, ward 8, parish of East Feliciana. He owns and works a large plantation there:

About four weeks before the election there was a democratic meeting. He attended to hear Governor Nicholls speak. After the speaking was over William Maxwell, a white democrat, asked him did he intend to vote for Nicholls, and told him he must, as the colored man who did not vote for him would be smitten from among us. You cannot be allowed to vote the republican ticket and live among us. Fearful, he joined democratic club and voted republican ticket. After he joined democratic club a body of white democrats called on him and said they heard he had been abused for it, and if he would tell them the parties they would get them at the risk of their lives. He told them he had never been disturbed.

Word was sent him by his son, who was also a voter, from the gentleman who told me I must vote democratic ticket to remember what he had said.

No republican ticket distributed to colored men. It was not allowed.

On November 7, 1876, the following vote was cast for electors:

Amite County, Mississippi.....

At the last election, 1874, there was cast:

	Demo- cratic.	Repub- lican.
East Feliciana West Feliciana East Baton Ronge Amite County, Mississippi, majority.	847 501 1, 556	1, 688 1, 358 2, 546 641

Deponent says the cause of this remarkable change was intimidation persistently practiced ever since the last previous election.

On October 7, 1875, a large body of men, on horseback, and armed with Winchesters and revolvers, came to Clinton, the county seat of East Feliciana Parish, (the French name for county.) while the court was in session.

They interrupted the court, threatened the judge, a white man, drove away the sheriff, a man of color, and, as he ran, shot him. They swore no colored man should hold office, and, for that reason, compelled the recorder to resign. The sheriff, wounded, escaped, and has since resided in New Orleans. The recorder did resign, and also fled the parish.

Since that time there has been no court there—no law and no protection. It is generally understood that unless a colored man joins a democratic club and votes that ticket he is not safe. He may be whipped, killed, or driven from the parish at the pleasure of these so-called regulators.

These "regulators," or "bull-dozers," have, since August, 1875, committed the following outrages in East Feliciana:

That month they killed Jerry Norman in church.

In September, 1875, they shot and killed Joseph Johnson, Samuel Smith, (!) a colored man, name unknown, on Channeey plantation. In September, 1875, they shot and killed Full Nelson, a colored boy. October, 1875, a colored man, name unknown, on Channeey plantation. In September, 1875, they shot and killed Full Nelson, a colored boy. October, 1875, a colored man, name unknown, and here a member of the Legislature, and a leader of the republicans in the parish, who had been driven away, was brought from Baton Rouge by the sheriff and a posse under an accusation believed to be false, that he had instigated a sister-in law to give poison to one Dr. Saunders. On the way the regulators attacked the posse, and Gair was literally shot to pieces. The same evening the girl, a wet-nurse to Dr. Saunders's sick wife, was seized and hung in the yard of the jail. Saunders is yet alive, strong an yet alive, strong and hearty. The real motive for the villainy was said to be halred of Gair as an infinential, zealous republican, and a revolution to be led by him. November, 1875, a colored man named P. Branch was shot and killed by this band near Shady Grove.

November, 1875, two colored men were killed by Gardner Blount, a white-leaguer. March, 1876, a colored man was shot and killed by them on Redwood plantation. November, 1875, Marshal Ryer and Webster Dyer were shot in Clinton and killed, and the sheriff and his posse endeavoring to arrest them were resisted and dispersed. Dr. T. T. Wood, a white man living on the plantation of Mrs. Woodward some miles northeast of Clinton, passed sentence of death, by banging, on two colored girls for stealing some clothes, and the sentence was executed by about one humfred armed and masked men.

A written statement embodying these facts, signed by about fourteen persons, was presented to General Augur. A detachment was ordered to Clinton a few weeks before election.

But two hundred colored men, whose names have been published, fied the parish. Many other murders and whippings occurred not here mentioned, and before the coming of the soldiers.

The habit of this band is to appear at night on horseback, armed with Winchester rifles and revolvers. They call on obnoxious persons, and by whippings and other means have inspired the colored people with terror.

Ex uno dicere omnes. The concluding words of the report submitted to Congress December 7, 1876, of the committee sent South by order of the President of the United States, are as follows:

mitted to Congress December 7, 1876, of the committee sent South by order of the President of the United States, are as follows:

There were in the State of Louisana on the day of the election 92,996 white registered voters and 115,310 colored, a majority of the latter of 24,314. It was well known that, if left free to vote uninfluenced by violence or intimidation, the blacks would be almost unanimously republican, and that with the white republican vote its majority would be about equal to that above indicated. The plan appears to have been to select for purposes of intimidation and violence as few parishes as possible, (for in forty or lifty-seven parishes where these were not employed the republican majority was 6,000,) but to select those in which the colored vote, as compared with the white, would be large unless unlawfully prevented; for in so doing it might be expected that should any majority they could thus obtain in such parishes be rejected, they would nevertheless attain their purpose by the suppression of a large republican vote.

In pursuance of this plan, five of the parishes selected in which the greatest violence and intimidation were practiced were East and West Feliciana, which border upon that portion of Mississippi in which murder and outrages oprevailed, during and preceding the election, as substantially to prevent any republican vote; East Baton Bouge, which borders upon the southern portion of East Feliciana; Morehouse, which adojions the State of Arkansas; and Omehit, which adjoins and lies directly south of Morehouse. The geographical position of these five parishes was well suited to the purpose to be attained; for it was casy for the members of the clubs to be formed therein, and who usually perpetrated their outrages with musiked faces, to pretend that they were committed by border ruffinas from Mississippi and Arkansas, where like outrages had been perpetrated. The location of these five parishes was not, however, better suited to the plan to be accomplished than over the first se of witnesses, were the means employed in Louisiana to elect a President of the United States. And when they shall succeed, the glories of the Republic will have departed, and shame and horror will supplant in the hearts of our people that love and veneration with which they have hitherto regarded the institutions of their and veneration with which they have hitherto regarded the institutions of their country.

The proof of violence and intimidation and armed disturbance in many other parishes is of the same general character, although more general and decisive as to the five parishes particularly referred to. In the others these causes prevailed at particular polling places, at many of which a republican vote was to a considerable extent prevented.

The members of the board, acting under oath, were bound by law, if convinced by the testimony that riot, tumult, acts of violence, or armed disturbance didmaterially interfere with the purity and freedom of election at any poll or voting-place, or did materially change the result of the election thereat, to reject the votes thus cast and exclude them from their final return. Of the effect of such testimony the board was sole and final judge, and if in reaching a conclusion it exercised good faith and was guided by an honest desire to do justice, its determination should be respected, even if upon like proof a different conclusion might have been reached by other tribunals or persons.

To guard the purity of the ballot; to protect the citizen in the free and peaceful exercise of his right to vote; to secure him against violence, intimidation, outrage, and especially murder, when he attempts to perform this duty, should be the desire of all men and the aim of every representative government. If political success, shall be attained by such violent and terrible means as were resorted to in many parishes in Louisiana, complaint should not be made if the votes thus obtained are denounced by judicial tribunals and all honest men illegal and void.

From the foregoing views it follows necessarily that I am opposed

From the foregoing views it follows necessarily that I am opposed to this novel tripartite judicial tribunal. It is a huge, unwieldy arbitration, reaching no final result, and craftily devised to develop the position of the adversary. It is a skirmish, not a battle. Undisguisedly it a partisan tribunal, a grand consolidated lottery, in which the highest gift of a free people is to be distributed by lot. It is not a court, for that is a place where justice is administered through judges selected for their learning, not their political bias. This tribunal has no parallel in history. The grand committee that was to be created by the bill in 1800 was to be headed by the Chief-Justice. For a reason quite obvious under the present bill the Chief-Justice is not named. Four judges are selected ostensibly by circuits, really on account of their well-known political bias. Those are equally divided account of their well-known political bias. Those are equally divided and they are to choose the fifth judge. How, is not indicated. If they cannot agree they must use the straw, the copper, or the dice. The relative position of the other members of the court taken from the Senate and House is painfully and shamefully patent. And by this tribunal a great constitutional question is to be settled.

Why not resort to the tribunal known to the law? No one queswhy not resort to the tribunal known to the law! No one questions the integrity and profound learning of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. The material facts are not controverted. Make a case stated. Let this be submitted and the decision, whatever it may be, will be acquiesced in by the great republican party. If this cannot be done then let us take the usual course pursued from the foundation of the Government, and let the party aggrieved take his legal remedy.

And this indeed has been contemplated under the present bill: SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be held to impair or affect any right now existing under the Constitution and laws to question, by proceeding in the judicial courts of the United States, the right or title of the person who shall be declared elected or who shall claim to be President or Vice-President of the United States, if any such right exists.

And the distinguished Senator, Mr. Edmunds, in explaining this feature of the bill, if it needed explanation, said:

So that we felt perfectly free, not only free but more than free, we felt it to be our bounden duty that no right should be affected in respect of the candidates of either of these great parties by the law that we pass, and that the right of A or B to this great office must be determined by the law as it stands on the date of the passage of this act.

Nothing, therefore, is gained to the public or to the parties by the passage of this bill. The decision of this tribunal is not final; it does passage of this bill. The decision of this tribunal is not final; it does not conclude, though it may greatly prejudice, the parties interested. The case does not come up de novo, as in ordinary appeals; it will have been passed upon by five of the nine judges who are to decide it, and it is hoping too much to expect that these judges, eminent and impartial and honest though they may be, shall be wholly unbiased in that which is a substantial rehearing of the same matter.

I oppose the bill, therefore: first, because it is unnecessary; second, because it is delegating to a commission that power which is given exclusively by the Constitution, either expressly or by implication, to the President of the Senate. I oppose the bill, thirdly, because it delegates legislation to a commission. Strictly speaking, it is a court. It determines the constitutional right to go behind can-because it delegates legislation to a commission. Strictly speaking, it is a court. It determines the constitutional right to go behind canvassing boards constituted under State laws. It is to receive petitions, depositions, and papers that may be competent and pertinent in such consideration. The oath of the judge requires him to examine and consider all questions submitted to the commission. It is to settle controverted facts and questions of constitutional law, and render a decision, which is substantially final, because it cannot be reversed without the concurrent action of both Houses. By the action therefore of this tribunal the original position of the Representatives is changed, so that the Gordian knot cannot be untied. Now we deal with the House, then with the Senate and House combined, and controlled by a foreign element not sanctioned or authorized under the Constitution as belonging to the legislative department. In a word, it is joining the legislative with the judicial department, designed to be kept distinct and separate by the framers of the Con-

The Representative must think and act for himself. He cannot ask any one on a complicated question to vote in his stead; he cannot indirectly delegate that power. His duty is ministerial and quasi-judicial. He can delegate the former, not the latter. He can say to a teller, "Add up the figures in this certificate." But whether the certificate and evidence connected with it are legal is a judicial question, which he must settle for himself. He is sworn to support the Constitution, and it is his duty to determine whether, under the law and the Constitution, such paper can properly be received as evidence. Now, this tribunal takes from Congress this judicial power.

4. As neither the Senate nor the House, nor both combined, can go

4. As neither the senate hor the House, nor onth other can go behind the returns made by canvassing boards, Congress has no power to confer that right upon the commission.

5. The bill is unconstitutional, as it comes in conflict with that provision of the Constitution which declares that "no Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be ap-pointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office."

6. If the Constitution needs a change in this particular, it must be effected by an amendment, not by a special law. This remedy, by article 5 of the Constitution, is expressly provided for, and was followed wherever the organic law was deemed defective. If the organic law is to be changed, let it not be done indirectly by a temporary expedient, but by an amendment to be approved of through the Legislatures of the several States.

The passage of this bill is urged to allay excitement. I fail to discover any excitement that is to be dreaded. The hundred thousand cover any excitement that is to be dreaded. The hundred thousand unarmed men that are to be brought here to bull-doze the Senate and House, I do not fear. It is a useless threat and can injure none but its partisan authors. Grave constitutional questions are to be settled by argument, not menaces.

"Big words do not smite like war-clubs, Boastful breath is not a bow string, Deeds are better things than words are, Actions mightier than boastings."

Nor do the bitter hard words of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Willis,] charging the republican party with being conspirators, terrify. I am surprised and mortified at his harmless slanders, and experience a feeling of astonishment that they should come from one whose kind and genial manners indicate that he has "sat at good men's feasts and lives where bells do knoll for church."

Out of Congress no excitement exists; here it seems to have been manufactured. The 8th of January was made infamous as intimida-tion day. Jackson's commemoration day was seized upon as a fit time tion day. Jackson's commemoration day was seized upon as a ni time to create partisan capital. In this a great wrong was done to the dead, for the memory of the honored dead should be a sacred trust with all the living. No, there must be no intimidation here or elsewhere. "Men must be permitted," as Tacitus said, "to think what they please and say what they think."

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, nothing but the gravity of this subject would induce me to make a speech in my present condition of voice. But I must attempt it and trust that the kindness of the House will enable me to be heard.

I desire in the outset to recognize whatever of good there is in this bill. It has some great merits which I cheerfully recognize. It is intended to avoid strife in a great and trying crisis of the nation. It is intended to aid in tiding over a great present difficulty, possibly a great public danger. It will doubtless bring out a result. And when it has brought out a result it will leave the person who is declared to be the elect of the nation with a clearer title, or rather with a more be the elect of the nation with a clearer title, or rather with a more nearly undisputed title, than any method that has yet been suggested.

These are certainly great results. At a time like this, no man should treat lightly a bill which may and probably will produce them all. Furthermore, I feel bound to say, if I were to speak of this bill only as a partisan—a word much abused just now—I should say that I am not afraid of its operation. The eminent gentlemen who are to compose the commission, eminent for their character and abilities, will, I have no doubt, seek to do and will do justice under its provisions. And therefore, believing as I do that Rutherford B. Hayes has been honestly and legally elected President of the United States, I confidently expect that this commission will find that to be the fact and will declare it. Should they find otherwise, all good men everywhere will submit to their decision.

But neither the wishes nor the fate of Mr. Hayes or Mr. Tilden should be consulted in considering this bill. I presume no one here is authorized to speak for either of these gentlemen on the question. I certainly am not. It is our business to speak for ourselves and for the people whom we represent.

Before considering the bill itself, I pause to notice one of the reasons that have been urged in its favor.

sons that have been urged in its favor.

We have been told to-day in this Chamber that there is danger of civil war if the bill does not pass. I was amazed at the folly which could use such a suggestion as an argument in favor of this or any measure.

The senate at Rome never deliberated a moment after the flag was hauled down which floated on the Janiculum Hill, across the Tiber. That flag was the sign that no enemy of Rome, breathing hot threats of war, had entered the sacred precincts of the city; and when it was struck the senate sat no longer. The reply to war is not words, but swords.

When you tell me that civil war is threatened by any party or When you tell me that civil war is threatened by any party or State in this Republic, you have given me a supreme reason why an American Congress should refuse, with unutterable scorn, to listen to those who threaten, or to do any act whatever under the coercion of threats by any power on the earth. With all my soul I despise your threat of civil war, come it from what quarter or what party it may. Brave men, certainly a brave nation, will do nothing under such compulsion. We are intrusted with the work of obeying and defending the Constitution. I will not be deterred from obeying it because somebody threatens to destroy it. I dismiss all that class of because somebody threatens to destroy it. I dismiss all that class of motives as unworthy of Americans.

On this occasion, as on all others, let us seek only that which is worthy of ourselves and of our great country.

Self-reverence, self-knowledge, self-control— These three alone lead life to sovereign power. Yet not for power, (power of herself Would come uncalled for,) but to live by law, Acting the law we live by without fear; And, because right is right, to follow right, Were wisdom in the scorn of consequence,

Let such wisdom and such scorn inspire the House in its consideration of the pending measure.

What, then, are the grounds on which we should consider a bill like this? It would be unbecoming in me or in any member of this Congress to oppose it on mere technical or trifling grounds. It should be opposed, if at all, for reasons so broad and so weighty as to overcome all that has been said in its favor, and all the advantages which I have here admitted may follow from its passage. I do not wish to diminish the stature of my antagonist; I do not wish to undervalue the points of strength in a measure before I question its propriety. It is not enough that this bill will tide us over a present danger, however great. Let us for a moment forcet Hayes and Till propriety. It is not enough that this bill will tide us over a present danger, however great. Let us for a moment forget Hayes and Tilden, republicans and democrats; let us forget our own epoch and our own generation; and, entering a broader field, inquire how this thing which we are about to do will affect the great future of our Republic; and in what condition, if we pass this bill, we shall transmit our institutions to those who shall come after us. The present good which we shall achieve by it may be very great, yet if the evils that will flow from it in the future must be greater, it would be base in us to flinch from trouble by entailing remediless evils upon our children. In my view, then, the foremost question is this: What will be the effect of this measure upon our institutions? I cannot make that inniry intelligibly without a brief reference to the history of the Conquiry intelligibly without a brief reference to the history of the Constitution and to some of the formidable questions which presented themselves to our fathers nearly a hundred years ago, when they set up this goodly frame of government.

Among the foremost difficulties, both in point of time and of magnitude, was how to create an executive head of the nation. Our fathers encountered that difficulty the first morning after they organized and elected the officers of their constitutional convention. The first resoelected the officers of their constitutional convention. The first resolution introduced by Randolph, of Virginia, on the 29th day of May, recognized that great question and invited the convention to its examination. The men who made the Constitution were deeply read in the profoundest political philosophy of their day. They had learned from Montesquieu, from Locke, from Fénelon, and other great teachers of the human race that liberty is impossible without a clear and distinct separation of the three great powers of government. A generation before their epoch, Montesquieu had said:

When the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person or in the same body of magistrates there can be no liberty, because apprehensions may arise lest the same monarch or senate should enact tyrannical laws to execute them in a tyrannical manner.

There would be an end of everything were the same man or the same body, whether of the nobles or of the people, to exercise these three powers, that of enacting the laws, that of executing the public resolutions, and of trying the causes of individuals.

This was a fundamental truth in the American mind, as it had long been cherished and practiced in the British Empire.

But there, as in all monarchies, the creation of a chief executive was easily regulated by adopting a dynasty and following the law of primogeniture.

But our fathers had drawn the deeper lesson of liberty from the inspirations of this free new world, that their Chief Executive should be born, not of a dynasty, but of the will of a free people regulated

In the course of their deliberations upon the subject, there were suggested seven different plans, which may be grouped under two principal heads or classes. One group comprised all the plans for creating the Chief Executive by means of some one of the pre-existing ating the Chief Executive by means or some one of the pre-existing political organizations of the country. First and foremost it proposed to authorize one or both Houses of the National Legislature to elect the Chief Executive. Another was to confer that power upon the governors of the States or upon the Legislatures of the States. Another, that he should be chosen directly by the people themselves under the laws of the States. The second group comprised all the various plans for creating a new separate instrumentality for making the choice.

At first the proposition that the Executive should be elected by the National Legislature was received by the convention with almost unanimous approval; and for the reason that up to that time, Congress had done all that was done in the way of National Government. It had created the nation, had led its fortunes through a thousand perils, had declared and achieved independence, and had preserved the liberty of the people in the midst of a great war. Though Congress had failed to secure a firm and stable Government after the war, yet its glory was not forgotten. As Congress had created the Union it was most natural that our fathers should say Congress shall also create the Chief Executive of the nation. And within two weeks after the convention assembled, they voted for that plan with absolute unanimity.

after the convention assembled, they voted for that plan with absolute unanimity.

But with equal unanimity they agreed that this plan would be fatal to the stability of the Government they were about to establish, if they did not couple with it some provision that should make the presidential office independent of the power that created him. To effect this they provided that the President should be ineligible for re-election. They said it would never do to create a Chief Executive by the voice of the National Legislature, and then allow him to be re-elected by that same voice; for he would thus become their creature.

And so, from the first day of their work in May to within five days of its close in September, they grappled with the mighty question. I have many times, and recently more carefully, gone through all the records that are left to us of that great transaction. I find that more than one-seventh of all the pages of the Madison Papers are devoted to this Sampson of questions, how the Executive should be chosen and made independent of the organization that made the choice. This topic alone, occupied more than one-seventh of all the time of the convention. the convention.

After a long and earnest debate, after numerous votes and reconsiderations, they were obliged utterly to abandon the plan of creating the Chief Executive by means of the National Legislature. I will not stop now to prove this statement by a dozen or more pungent gent quotations from the masters of political science in that great assembly, in which they declared that it would be ruinous to the liberry of the people and to the permanence of the Republic if they did not absolutely exclude the National Legislature from any share in the election of the President.

They pointed with glowing eloquence to the sad but instructive fate of those brilliant Italian republics that were destroyed because there was no adequate separation of powers; and because their senates overwhelmed and swallowed up the executive power, and, as secret and despotic conclaves, became the destroyers of Italian liberty.

and despotic conclaves, became the destroyers of Italian liberty.

At the close of the great discussion, when the last vote on this subject was taken by our fathers, they were almost unanimous in excluding the National Legislature from any share whatever in the choice of the Chief Executive of the nation. They rejected all the plans of the first group, and created a new instrumentality. They adopted the system of electors. When that plan was under discussion, they used the utmost precaution to hedge it about by every conceivable protection against the interference or control of Congress.

In the first place, they said the States shall create the electoral colleges. They allowed Congress to have nothing whatever to do with the creation of the colleges, except merely to fix the time when the States should appoint them. And in order to exclude Congress by positive prohibition, in the last days of the convention they provided that no member of either House of Congress should be appointed an elector; so that not even by the personal influence of any one of its members could the Congress interfere with the election of a President.

The creation of a President under our Constitution, consists of three

The creation of a President under our Constitution, consists of three distinct steps: First, the creation of the electoral colleges; second, the vote of the colleges; and third, the opening and counting of their votes. This is the simple plan of the Constitution.

The creation of the colleges is left absolutely to the States, within the five limitations I had the honor to mention to the House a few days ago: first, that it must be a State that creates it; second, that the State is limited as to the number of electors they may appoint; third, that electors shall not be members of Congress, nor officers of the United States; fourth, that the time for appointing electors may be fixed by Congress; and fifth, the date when their appointment is announced, which must be before the time for giving their votes, may also be fixed by Congress.

These five simple limitations, and these alone, were laid upon the States. Every other act, fact, and thing possible to be done in creating the electoral colleges, was absolutely and uncontrollably in the power of the States themselves. Within these limitations Congress has no more power to touch them in this work than England or has no more power to touch them in this work than England or France. That is the first step.

The second is still plainer and simpler, namely, the work of the coileges. They were created as an independent and separate power, or set of powers, for the sole purpose of electing a President. They were created by the States. Congress has just one thing to do with them, and only one; it may fix the day when they shall meet. By the act of 1792, Congress fixed the day as it still stands in the law; and there the authority of the Congress over the colleges ended.

There was a later act, of 1845, which gave to the States the authority to provide by law for filling vacancies of electors in these colleges, and Congress has passed no other law on the subject.

The States having created them, the time of their assemblage having been fixed by Congress, and their power to fill vacancies having been been fixed by Congress, and their power to fill vacancies having been regulated by State laws, the colleges are as independent in the exercise of their functions as is any department of the Government within its sphere. Being thus equipped, their powers are restrained by a few simple limitations laid upon them by the Constitution itself: first, they must vote for a native-born citizen; second, for a man who has been fourteen years a resident of the United States; third, at least one of the persons for whom they vote must not be a citizen of their own State; fourth, the mode of voting and certifying their returns is prescribed by the Constitution itself. Within these simple and plain limitations, the electoral colleges are absolutely independent of the States and of Congress. States and of Congress.

States and of Congress.

One fact in the history of the constitutional convention, which I have not seen noticed in any of the recent debates, illustrates very clearly how careful our fathers were to preserve these colleges from the interference of Congress, and to protect their independence by the bulwarks of the Constitution itself. In the draught of the electoral system reported September 4, 1787, it was provided that Congress "may determine the time of choosing and assembling of the electors and the manner of certifying and transmitting their votes."

That was the language of the original draught; but our fathers had determined that the National Legislature should have nothing to do with the action of the colleges, and the words that gave Congress the power to prescribe the manner of certifying and transmitting their votes were stricken out. The instrument itself prescribed the mode. Thus Congress was wholly expelled from the colleges. The Constitution swept the ground clear of all intruders, and placed its own imperial guardianship around the independence of the electoral colleges by forbidding Congress even to enter the sacred circle. No Congressman could enter; and, except to fix the day of their meeting, Congress could not speak to the electors.

These colleges are none the less sovereign and independent be-

Congress could not speak to the electors.

These colleges are none the less sovereign and independent because they exist only for a day. They meet on the same day in all the States; they do their work summarily, in one day, and dissolve forever. There is no power to interfere, no power to recall them, no power to revise their action. Their work is done; the record is made up, signed, sealed, and transmitted; and thus the second great act in the presidential election is completed. I ought to correct myself: the second act is the presidential election. The election is finished the hour when the electoral colleges have east their votes and scaled. the hour when the electoral colleges have cast their votes and sealed up the record.

Still there is a third step in the process; and it is shorter, plainer, simpler than the other two. These sealed certificates of the electoral colleges are forwarded to the President of the Senate, where they rest under the silence of the seals for more than two months. The Constitution assumes that the result of the election is still unknown. But on a day fixed by law, and the only day, of all the days of February, on which the law commands Congress to be in session, the last act in the plan of electing a President is to be performed.

How plain and simple are the words that describe this third and last step! Here they are:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

Here is no ambiguity. Two words dominate and inspire the clause: They are the words open and count. These words are not shrouded in the black-letter mysteries of the law. They are plain words, understood by every man who speaks our mother-tongue, and need no lexicon or commentary

need no lexicon or commentary.

Consider the grand and simple ceremonial by which the third act is to be completed. On the day fixed by law the two Houses of Congress are assembled. The President of the Senate, who, by the Constitution, has been made the custodian of the sealed certificates from all the electoral colleges, takes his place. The Constitution requires a "person" and a "presence." That "person" is the President of the Senate and that "presence" is the "presence" of the two Houses. Then two things are to be done. The certificates are to be opened and the votes are to be counted. These are not legislative acts, but clearly and plainly executive acts. I challenge any man to find anywhere an accepted definition of an executive act that does not include both these. They cannot be tortured into a meaning that will carry them beyond the boundaries of executive action. And one of these acts the President of the Senate is peremptorily ordered to perform. The Constitution commands him to "open all the certificates." Certificates of what? Certificates of the votes of the electoral col-Certificates of what? Certificates of the votes of the electoral colleges. Not any certificates that anybody may choose to send, but certificates of electors appointed by the States. The President of the Senate is presumed to know what are the States in the Union; who are their officers; and when he opens the certificates, he learns from the official resident of the field. the official record who have been appointed electors; and he finds their votes.

The Constitution contemplated the President of the Senate as the Vice-President of the United States, the elect of all the people. And to him is confided the great trust, the custodianship of the only official record of the election of President. What is it to "open the certificates?" It would be a narrow and inadequate view of that word to say that it means only the breaking of the seals. To open an envelope is not to "open the certificates." The certificate is not the paper on which the record is made; it is the record itself. To open the certificate is not a physical, but an intellectual act. It is to make patent the record; to publish it. When that is done the election of President and Vice-President is published. But one thing remains to be done; and here the language of the Constitution changes from the active to the passive voice, from the personal to the impersonal; to the trusted custodian of the votes, succeeds the impersouality of arithmetic; the votes have been made known; there remains only the command of the Constitution: "They shall be counted," that is, the numbers shall be added up.

No further act is required. The Constitution itself declares the

The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed.

If no person has such majority, the House of Representatives shall immediately choose a President; not the House as organized for legislation, but a new electoral college is created out of the members of the House, by means of which each State has one vote for President, and only one

To review the ground over which I have traveled, the several acts that constitute the election of a President, may be symbolized by a pyramid consisting of three massive, separate blocks. The first, the creation of the electoral college by the States, is the broad base. It embraces the legislative, the judicial, and the executive powers of the States. All the departments of the State government and all the voters of the State co-operate in shaping and perfecting it.

The action of the electoral colleges forms the second block, perfect in itself and independent of the state co-operate in the second block, perfect in the second block is the second block.

in itself and independent of the others, superimposed with exactness upon the first.

upon the first.

The opening and counting of the votes of the colleges, is the little block that crowns and completes the pyramid.

Such, Mr. Speaker, was the grand and simple plan by which the framers of the Constitution empowered all the people, acting under the laws of the several States, to create special and select colleges of independent electors to choose a President, who should be, not the creature of Congress, nor of the States, but the Chief Magistrate of the whole nation, the elect of all the people.

When the Constitution was completed and sent to the people of the States for ratification, it was subjected to the severest criticism of the ablest men of that generation. Those sections which related to the election of President not only escaped censure but received the highest commendation. The sixty-seventh number of the Federalist, written by Alexander Hamilton, was devoted to this feature of the instrument. That great writer congratulated the country that the convenment. That great writer congratulated the country that the convention had devised a method that made the President free from all pre-existing bodies, that protected the process of election from all inter-ference by Congress and from the cabals and intrigues so likely to arise in legislative bodies.*

The earliest commentator upon the Constitution, St. George Tucker, of Virginia, writing at the beginning of the present century, made this clause of the Constitution the subject of special eulogy, and pointed to the fact that all the proceedings in relation to the election of a President were to be brief, summary, and decisive; that the right of the President to his office depended upon no one but the people themselves; and that the certificates of his election were to be publicly opened "and counted in the presence of the whole National Leg-

These anthorities I have quoted show that, great as was the satisfaction of the people with the mode of choosing a President, there was still an apprehension that trouble would arise from Con-

*The mode of appointment of the Chief Magistrate of the United States is almost the only part of the system of any consequence which has escaped without severe censure or which has received the slightest mark of approbation from its opponents. The most plausible of these, who has appeared in print, has even deigned to admit that the election of the President is pretty well guarded. I venture somewhat further and hesitate not to affirm that, if the manner of it be not perfect, it is at least excellent. It unites in an eminent degree all the advantages the union of which was to be wished for. It was desirable that the sense of the people should operate in the choice of the person to whom so important a trust was to be confided. This end will be answered by committing the right of making it not to any pre-established body, but to men chosen by the people for the special purpose and at the particular conjecture. * * * They have not made the appointment of the President to depend on any pre-existing bodies of men who might be tampered with beforehand to prostitute their votes; but they have referred it in the first instance to an immediate act of the people of America, to be exerted in the choice of persons for the temporary and sole purpose of making the appointment. And they have excluded from eligibility to this trust all those who from situation might be suspected of too great devotion to the President in office. * * *

Another and no less important desideratum was that the Executive should be independent for his continuance in office on all but the people themselves. He might otherwise be tempted to sacrifice his duty to his complaisance for those whose favor was necessary to duration of his official consequence. This advantage will also be secured by making his re-election to depend on a special body of representatives, deputed by the society for the single purpose of making the important choice.—

**From the sixty-secenth number of the Federalist.*

† The electors, we perceive, are to assemble on one and the

gress, by the only avenue left open for its influence, namely, the contingency in which the House might elect. Every other door was shut and barred against the interference of Congress or any member of Congress.

THE BILL. Now, Mr. Speaker, contrast with the plan I have sketched, the theory of this bill. I have studied its provisions in the light of the Constitution; and I am compelled to declare that it assails and overthrows, to its very foundation, the constitutional plan. Congress, finding itself excluded from every step in the process of electing a President until the very last, from the mere fact that its presence is deemed necessary at the very last, from the mere fact that its presence is deemed necessary at the opening of the certificates and counting of the votes, takes occasion of that presence to usurp authority over the whole process from beginning to end. Coming only as an invited guest to witness a grand and imposing ceremony, this bill makes Congress the chief actor and umpire in the scene, and, under cover of the word "count," proposes to take command of every step in the process of making a President.

Recurring again to the illustration I have used, Congress, having a simple part to play in reference to the little block that crowns the pyramid, proposes to reach down through all the others and supervise the whole from apex to base; or, rather, it proposes to overturn the whole pyramid and stand it upon its apex, so that it shall rest, not upon the broad base of the people's will, but upon the uncertain and despotic will of Congress.

This is usurpation in every meaning of the word. Though the Constitution has sought to keep Congress away from all the process of making a President, this bill creates and places in the control of Conmaking a President, this officerates and places in the control of Congress the enginery by which Presidents can be made and unmade at the caprice of the Senate and House. It grasps all the power, and holds States and electors as toys in its hands. It assumes the right of Congress to go down into the colleges and inquire into all the acts and facts connected with their work. It assumes the right of Congress to go down into the States, to review the act of every officer, to open every ballot-box, and to pass judgment upon every ballot cast by seven millions of Americans. by seven millions of Americans.

I know the bill is not proposed as a permanent law; but I know equally well that if the Congress of our centennial year pass this measure, they will destroy forever the constitutional plan of electing a President. Pass this bill, and the old constitutional safeguards are gone. Congress becomes a grand returning board from this day forward; and we shall see no more Presidents elected by the States until the people rebuke the apostacy and rebuild their old temple

Gentlemen on the other side of the House have expressed their indignation that one or two States in the Union have established indignation that one or two States in the Union have established returning boards to examine and purge the returns from the ballot-boxes of their States; and I must say for myself that I would not tolerate such a board unless intimidation, outrage, and murder made it necessary to preserve the rights of voters. All the evils that have been charged against all the returning boards of the Southern States, this bill invites and welcomes to the Capitol of the nation. It makes Congress a vast, irresponsible returning board, with all the vices of and none of the excuses for the returning boards of the States.

Now, if this general arraignment of the bill be not justly and fairly made, I should be glad to hear the distinguished gentlemen who approve it show in what respect I have misrepresented or exaggerated its provisions.

approve it show in what respect I have misrepresented or exaggerated its provisions.

Mr. Speaker, our people have lived under the Constitution for eighty-seven years; and in all that time, until our Government was nearly wrecked by rebellion, the Congress has never ventured to touch with the smallest of its fingers the action of any recognized State of the Union in creating the electoral colleges, nor the action of the colleges themselves in the election.

Why, sir, in 1857 the electoral college in one of our States did not cast its vote on the day fixed by law; but the democratic President of the Senate counted the vote of Wisconsin and declared the result in spite of all the clamor that was raised against him by both Houses;

in spite of all the clamor that was raised against him by both Houses; and that vote stands on record as a part of the official count.

For more than three-quarters of a century, there has been but one ground on which Congress has ever challenged and excluded an electoral vote; and that ground was that some political organization calling itself a State was not a State in law and in fact. When Missouri tried to vote before it was admitted into the Union, and when Indiana tried to vote before it was admitted into the Union, and when Indiana and Michigan tried to vote under like circumstances, their right to an electoral vote was challenged. That challenge might be defended on the ground that Congress alone can admit new States into the Union; and no political society except the original thirteen States is entitled to an electoral vote without previous recognition by Congress.

In 1805, while the fires of our great war were still blazing, when the vast war powers of the Constitution had been awakened from their sleep of half of a century, and when eleven States had broken away from their normal relations to the Union, the Congress, without reflection, and, as they have since discovered, without the warrant of the Constitution, adopted the twenty-second joint rule for the sole purpose of keeping States from voting that were not yet restored to their places in the Union. This rule was based on the same principle on which Congress had challenged the right of Missouri, Indiana, and Michigan to vote; but unfortunately it did not in terms restrict objection to that ground alone. From that joint rule has sprung most of our present entanglement; and the republican party is responsible.

It was one of the many mistakes of that party during those years, when, too powerful for its own good, or the good of the country, and flashed with victory, it went recklessly forward into acts that were unwarranted by sound policy, and of doubtful constitutionality.

But for the adoption of the twenty-second joint rule, in the midst of war, and its continuation after the war had ended, the hasty judgof war, and its continuation after the war had ended, the basty judgments of Senators and Representatives would not now complicate and embarass this Congress in solving the present problem.

But it should not be forgotten that before this question arose, a republican Senate confessed the wrong and abolished the rule. At the last session of Congress, every Senator, without distinction of party, voted to declare it unwarranted by the Constitution. Even at this session, and in spite of the passion and heat of this presidential contest, all but four of the Senators who were present voted that the rule was no longer valid or binding. Every precedent which Congress made during the last fifteen years under that rule has come back to plague and disturb those who are seeking to find the way out of our present difficulties by following the Constitution and laws. Without reflection, men of both parties have committed themselves to the theory of the twenty-second joint rule, and their committals embartheory of the twenty-second joint rule, and their committals embar-rass their action to day. It is best for men and parties frankly to confess their errors and correct them.

But to return to the pending bill. Besides the general arraignment I have made, I find in this first section of the bill that it invites objections to counting the votes of the States. It commands the presiding officer that whenever a State is called, he shall call for objecsiding officer that whenever a State is called, he shall call for objections; and as many objections as any two members of Congress, one from each House, shall please to make, shall be filed, no matter what the ground of objection may be; and immediately the two Houses shall separate to consider all such objections. If both Houses agree so to do, the vote of any State shall be rejected.

That first section deliberately provides that though a State has appointed electors in perfect accordance with the law, and through its electoral college may have fulfilled all points of the law; though the certificates may be regular and perfect in every particular, yet on the objection of two members of Congress, the two Houses may throw it out, may stifle the voice of that State, may nullify the constitutional out, may stifle the voice of that State, may nullify the constitutional election of a President. A legislative body is not obliged to give reasons for what it may lawfully do. It can act for bad reasons if it choose. I know the presumption of law is that all functionaries will choose. I know the presumption of law is that all functionaries will do their duty; but when we are conferring powers, we should ask what it is that we permit to be done. And the plain declaration of this first section is that Congress may at its discretion, for any reason good or bad, or for no reason, stifle the vote of any State. The Constitution commands that the votes shall be counted: this bill declares that the votes may be rejected. It is a monstrous assumption, a reckless usurpation of power. Congress may not use the vast powers herein granted; but a vote for this bill is a vote that Congress may thus act.

In opposition to this grant, I hold that neither House acting separately, nor both Houses acting concurrently, has any more authority to refuse to hear the voice of the State when it speaks through the law in electing a President, than Great Britain has to say that the State shall not vote. Yet this first section invites contests, and assumes the right of Congress, at will, to reject the vote of any State. If this section becomes a law, every close State will hereafter grow a luxurious crop of contests and unload their noxious harvests in the National Capitol. Not as in the past, one in the century, but squadrons of Cronins will invade the electoral colleges in each election in the future.

From what part of the Constitution is this measureless assumption of power drawn? I have carefully read the debates in both Houses to find the source of this alleged authority, and I find but two clauses on which the allegation is based. The first is the simple fact of the on which the allegation is based. The first is the simple fact of the presence of the two Houses at the opening and counting of the votes. How much power can be evoked from the word "presence?" We have seen that in all the previous steps in the process of electing a President, the little that Congress was permitted to do by the Constitution was merely to fix a date; and finally, in the concluding act, the agency of Congress is narrowed down to a mere shadow, to a presence. That is all. But a great deal of ingenuity and eloquence have been expended to add "power" to that "presence." We are told it would be trifling with the dignity of Congress to call the two Houses as mere spectators of a dumb show. It may throw some light upon this word "presence" to ascertain what the different States of the Union have done in the matter of opening and declaring the votes of their people done in the matter of opening and declaring the votes of their people for State officers. I have taken the pains to examine the constitutions of thirty-seven States of the Union, all except that of Colorado, which I have not seen; and I find this: In thirty of the thirty-seven States the act of opening the votes and counting and declaring them is definitely and absolutely described in their constitutions as an executive act. In thirty States of the Union the duty is devolved upon executive officers. There are seven States, most of them the older States, in which the Legislature itself eating its officers. in which the Legislature itself, acting jointly or by means of joint committees, is the canvassing and returning board to examine the votes and declare the result.

Mr. HOAR. Does not my honorable friend know that in every American State in existence when the Constitution was adopted, the vote for governor was counted by the two branches of the Legisla-

Mr. GARFIELD. I will answer my friend with a great deal of Mr. GARFIELD. I will answer my friend with a great deal of pleasure by saying that in a majority of all the original thirteen States, in 1787, the Legislatures elected the governors. The people did not elect their supreme executive officer; and, as a matter of course, when the governor was elected by the Legislature, the Legislature managed the whole process from beginning to end. But it is true that in the gentleman's own State, and in Connecticut, and in New Hampshire the popular votes for governor were and in some States. New Hampshire, the popular votes for governor were, and in some States are still, returned, canvassed, counted, and declared by the Legisla-

Mr. HOAR. My friend does not answer the question to its full extent. Does he not know that, in every one of the old thirteen States, the vote for governor was counted by the Legislature, it being true that in some of them the Legislature cast the vote as well as counted it?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let me say that it is not true of New York. On the contrary, the votes there were canvassed by officers designated, and the Legislature had no power over the subject.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to read the provision of the constitution of my own State, made in 1802, under the immediate inspiration of the constitutional era, and the same language still stands in the constitution of Ohio with only a slight verbal change.

Here is the provision:

The president of the senate shall open and publish the returns in the presence a majority of the members of each house of the General Assembly.

of a majority of the members of each house of the General Assembly.

Substantially, the same language is used in the present constitutions of twenty-one States of the Union. In these States it is the unbroken practice that the presiding officer of the senate or house does open and does publish and does declare the result; and only where a contest arises, regulated by law, is the result as declared by him questioned at all. Though their constitutions require the presence of a state of both houses they have no function event that of with the context of the tioned at all. Though their constitutions require the presence of a majority of both houses, they have no function except that of witnesses. If the dignity of twenty-one Legislatures is not affronted by this provision, the dignity of our two Houses ought not to suffer by granting its presence one day in four years.

An incident occurred in the State of Ohio nearly thirty years ago which is worthy of mention. The election for governor was close and doubtful. In obedience to the constitution both houses of the Legislature assembled, and the president of the senate proceeded to open and publish the returns. As the tellers were making the lists and footing up the votes an objection was made to counting the vote from one of the counties and the business was delayed by tumult, when the president of the senate, taking the certificates from the hands of the tellers, completed the count and declared the result, in obedience to the constitution. He did not permit the performance of an executo the constitution. He did not permit the performance of an execu-tive duty to be prevented or hindered even by the presence of legislative witnesse

The claim is set up that the presence of the two Houses implies that they are to do something; that they are to count the votes. Formulate that construction in definite words and it will read: "In the presence of the two Houses the votes shall be counted by the two Houses." That is they shall count the votes in their own presence. Let us not charge the framers of the Constitution with such stupid tautology.

We have seen that in the third step, two things were to be done, two acts to be performed; not acts of legislation, not laws to be devised, but acts to be done, executive acts. And the only executive officer present is the President of the Senate. One of these two acts he is expressly commanded to perform; he "shall open all the certificates." That is past question.

In reference to the other, the Constitution says it shall be done. We are asked why the language changes from the active to the possive are asked why the language changes from the active to the passive voice. I have already suggested the reason: that when the roll of voice. I have already suggested the reason: that when the roll of the States is called, each answers through the certificates which announce their votes for President and Vice-President. The States speak through the electoral colleges when their certificates are read, and nothing is left but the imperial command; the "votes shall be counted." Arithmetic does the work. It may be in the person of the President of the Senate, a teller, or a clerk.

What can be plainer than that our fathers intended that a certain, summary, and unquestioned result should be had? They determined to create a President; and they established a method which, if not to create a President; and they established a method which, if not to create a President; and they established a method which, if not overthrown, would certainly accomplish the result. Mr. Speaker, I am not controverting the position taken by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar,] and I think justly, that, under the general clause in another section of the Constitution, Congress may regulate the method of doing anything that the Constitution orders to be done. I admit most fully that Congress may regulate the act of opening the certificates and may regulate the work of counting; but it cannot push its power to regulate, beyond the meaning of the words that describe the thing to be done. It cannot ingraft a judiciary system upon the word "open." It cannot evolve a court-martial from the word "count." It cannot erect a star chamber upon either or both of these words. It cannot plant the seeds of despotism between the these words. It cannot plant the seeds of despotism between the lines or the words of the Constitution.

I have no doubt that Congress, under the general clause referred to, may regulate how the opening of the certificates shall be done, whether in alphabetical or chronological order; and may make any regulation necessary and appropriate. I have no doubt that Congress may provide by law who shall count or add up the votes; how the lists of votes shall be recorded—whether on paper or parchment. I do not hold that the Constitution has made it the exclusive duty of the President of the Senate to count the votes. That is no part of my argument. It makes no difference who counts, only so that the counting is done. I am seeking to find what authority Congress may exercise in reference to the election of the President. I insist that Congress may legislate upon the subject wherever the Constitution has made legislation possible. But I insist that Congress can go no farther. In reference to the last act of the process, Congress cannot go beyond the just scope and meaning of the word "count." If gentlemen want to "stick in the bark" in their construction of this clause, let me follow their example for a moment. If you tell me that the power of the President of the Senate ends with the word "open," then I tell you that the presence of the two Houses is dispensed with at the same instant. He shall, in the presence of the two Houses, open all the certificates. Stop there. If at that point "the Constitution turns its back upon the President of the Senate," it also at the same moment turns its back upon the two Houses. The "presence" and the President disappear together.

But I do not propose thus to read the Constitution with a microscope. I admit the difficulty of the situation. I recognize honest differences of opinion in regard to the true construction of the clause. But after reading them all, I return to that clear and comprehensive exposition of the venerable Chancellor Kent, which was full of wisdom and of prophecy. It was his opinion that, in the absence of legislation on the subject, it would be the duty of the President of the Senate to count the votes and declare the result.

I do not object to an act of Congress to regulate all that can be regulated. I have never objected to such legislation. In 1868, on my motion, a resolution was passed by this House directing our Judiciary Committee to inquire into this question of such vital and transcendent importance, and report what legislation was possible. But no action was taken; and in the absence of legislation we are re-manded to the Constitution itself. If we obey it we shall find a plain way out of our troubles gain I return to the bill before us, and call attention to the second Again I return to the only before us, and call attention to the second section, to the case where there are two returns. And here again is an invitation to anybody to get up a contest by sending "papers purporting to be certificates of electoral votes." It does not limit the contest to double returns from the officers of a State; but two or more returns from anybedy residing within the territory of a State may be considered under the provisions of this section. If anybody within a State manufactures a return, calls it a certificate of votes of electors, and forwards it to the President of the Senate, he must re ceive it and treat it as a return, and submit it to the tribunal provided by this section.

[Here the hammer fell.]

to one hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman was speaking in fifty minutes of the time of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I supposed I was speaking in my own right; but if the Speaker rules otherwise I submit to his decision.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose that no other gentleman will desire to speak to-night, and I ask consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] have leave to proceed with his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be allowed to proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. I thank my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] and also the House, for this courtesy.

Now in the case of a double return, a course is to be taken wholly unlike that which is laid down in the first section, where the vote of the State is left at the mercy of the two Houses. But double returns from a State are to be sent to a mixed commission, consisting of an equal number of members from each House of Congress and the Suequal number of members from each House of Congress and the Supreme Court. That commission is virtually clothed with power to hear and determine the vote of any such State, and its decision is the law, final and conclusive, unless both Houses shall concur in reversing the decree.

The commission is authorized to do whatever the two Houses of Congress may do in reference to the presidential election. That is, Congress may do in reference to the presidential election. That is, Congress delegates its power to fifteen persons. If it be a delegation of legislative power, it is clearly in conflict with the Constitution; for all authorities concur in the doctrine that legislative power cannot be delegated. If the power conferred on the commission be executive or judicial power, then the members of the commission are officers of the United States, and their appointment is a legislative appointment. But the Constitution has placed the appointing of all officers in the hands of the President and the heads of Departments. When, in 1871, an associate justice of the Supreme Court, the late

When, in 1871, an associate justice of the Supreme Court, the late When, in 1871, an associate justice of the Supreme Court, the late Judge Nelson, was appointed on the joint high commission to negotiate the treaty of Washington, his name was sent to the Senate and confirmed on the 10th day of February, as were the nominations of the Secretary of State and the Attorney-General to the same commission. It was found necessary in order to comply with the Constitution that those commissioners should be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. If the commissioners here proposed are officers, how can you take five Senators and five members of the House and make them officers when the Constitution forbids that a member of either House shall hold any office under the United States? Notice these difficulties that beset you at every step as you walk through the mazes of this bill.

the mazes of this bill.

But a far more important question is that of the powers conferred upon this commission. Here is certainly a new thing under the sun. This commission of fifteen persons is empowered to roam at will throughout the realms of the constitution and laws, and to assume whatever jurisdiction they think they are entitled to assume in reference to the subject. No jurisdiction limits are prescribed; but the commission is endowed "with the same powers now possessed by the two Houses acting separately or together." The two Houses of Congress say in effect to the commission: "We transfer our powers to you. Construe them for yourselves. Use or refuse them, as you please. If you choose to confine yourselves to the papers that have been delivered to the President of the Senate, halt there. If you conclude to enter the electoral colleges and overhaul them, enter. have been delivered to the President of the Senate, halt there. If you conclude to enter the electoral colleges and overhaul them, enter. If you choose to content yourselves with such an examination, stop there; but if you wish to go deeper and embrace within the sweep of your examination all the States and all the officers of the States, all the ballot-boxes and all the ballots in them, do so. Take the Sherman report, take the Morrison report, take the Howe report, take the Palmer report, take the Florida report and the South Carolina report, and the Cronin report. Accumulate cart-loads of reports and documents upon your tables, and sit down at your leisure to digest and make the most of them."

This, Mr. Speaker, is the scope of possible power given to this commission. And that is not enough. They may "take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall by the Constitution be competent and pertinent in such consideration." They may also send for persons and papers, because they have all the powers possessed by the two Houses or either of them; and this House certainly has shown its power to send for persons and papers beyond any other of its great powers. [Laughter.]

Now, I would treat this bill with all respect, for I do most sincerely respect the men who made it. But when the members of this commission come to verify and explore their powers, they will find one respect the men who made it. But when the members of this commission come to verify and explore their powers, they will find one limitation so thoroughly Pickwickian, that I am sure they will enjoy it as literature, if not as law. That limitation is in the brief and crisp language of the bill "if any." The commission may do all these things enumerated; may exercise all the vast powers residing in the Constitution, or conferred upon either House of Congress, or both, "if any."

In reading this clause I was reminded of a speech delivered in this Hall about the years ago by a gentleman who was imploring up to

Hall about ten years ago by a gentleman who was imploring us to receive our southern brethren who came knocking at the doors of Congress, and not keep them out any longer. A distinguished gentleman from Illinois rose and said:

I desire to ask the gentleman from New Jersey what he would do if our southern brethren, as he calls them, should come to our doors with certificates of election to Congress and ask to be admitted while their hands are still red with the blood of our brethren of the North?

Pausing solemnly for a moment, the orator replied:

If our southren friends come to the door of this House and ask to be admitted, I, sir, for one, am in favor of receiving them in the very spirit in which they come to us, provided they come in that spirit.

[Laughter.]

[Laughter.]
So the commission may do all and singular and exercise all powers that are given, "if any;" but of the "if any" they must judge.
Now, Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] to what may happen if this bill should become a law. From a careful reading of its provisions, it appears entirely possible for the two Houses and the commission to revent the deal postion of any result relatives. appears entirely possible for the two Houses and the commission to prevent the declaration of any result whatever. Remembering that there are thirty-eight States, and that in each case the President of the Senate must call for objections, and that upon each objection the two Houses must separate, and that the debate may proceed for two hours upon each objection, and that the House may take a recess for one day on each of these objections, a failure to reach a result is altogether possible. Suppose the case of Florida is reached, and one party finds itself disappointed in the judgment of the tribunal, and is so determined not to be pleased with the result that it prefers to present a completion of the count; how can such an attempt be prevented under the provisions of this bill?

There are buttwenty-eight secular days from the day when the count

Prevented under the provisions of this bill?

There are buttwenty-eight secular days from the day when the count begins, before this Congress will expire by limitation. I want to ask my friend from Massachusetts whether he thinks there is no danger in that direction; whether he does not also see that this bill may make it impossible for the President of the Senate to obey the plain mandate of the Constitution that he "shall open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted." There may be no then left in which to open the certificates near the foot of the list.

Mr. HOAR. As my distinguished friend from Ohio has invited.

Mr. HOAR. As my distinguished friend from Ohio has invited my attention to his argument, he will allow me to ask him whether the case he puts is not precisely such a one as may happen under any government under the sun; whether in any government the constituent parts may not refuse to do their duty. And what would happen under his theory if the President of the Senate did not choose to count the votes? Does the gentleman suppose the two House of to count the votes? Does the gentleman suppose the two Houses of Congress are any more likely than any one man to refuse to perform their constitutional duty and thus permit the Government to go to

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend strengthens my argument. If the President of the Senate should refuse to open the certificates the Senate can depose him in an hour and put another President in his place who will obey the Constitution.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose the Senate should refuse to do it?

Mr. GARFIELD. Then you have a legislative body which you cannot control; and this illustrates the radical evil of this bill. It aomits to a share in counting the votes, two uncontrollable legislative bodies; but when that duty is in the hands of one person he is liable to punishment for neglect or malfeasance in office. And precisely for that reason my theory of the Constitution is safer and more cisely for that reason my theory of the Constitution is safer and more practicable than that of my friend.

Mr. HOAR. Then the body that you cannot control is the only thing you have got to control him.

Mr. GARFIELD. Impeachment, expulsion, personal disgrace, all bear with tremendous force upon the individual officer. He is more amenable to public opinion and to the law that can seize him, and acts with a keener sense of personal responsibility than a legislative body, where responsibility is divided. The bad behavior of the two Houses is my friend's problem, not mine. When the Houses go wrong there is no remedy in a case like this. Quis custodiet ipsos custodes?

Mr. HOAR. That is a doctrine you cannot find in the American Constitution or the utterance of a single one of its framers.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think my friend will acknowledge that all executive officers are subject to impeachment and removal and punishment; but will he find anything in the doctrines of the fathers, in the Constitution, or the laws, by which a legislative body can be punished for a dereliction of duty?

The radical and incarable defect of this bill is that it puts a vast, punished for a dereliction of duty?

The radical and incurable defect of this bill is that it puts a vast, cumbrous machine in the place of the simple, plain plan of the Constitution; it adopts a method which invites and augments the evils from which we now suffer. That there are difficulties in the present situation, I freely admit; that there may be doubt, honest doubt, in the minds of honest men as to who is elected President, I admit. But I think the bill introduced by my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] which provides for submitting to the Supreme Court those questions of constitutional law about which we differ, would be far better. To the adjudication of that great and honored tribunal all would bow with ready obedience; but this novel, dangerous, and cumbrous device is, in my judgment, unwarranted by the Constitution. If we adopt it, we shirk a present difficulty, but in doing so we create far greater ones for those who come after us. What to us is a difficulty will be to them a peril.

will be to them a peril.

Mr. Speaker, I have trespassed too long upon on the indulgence of the House; but I cannot withhold from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoan] the tribute of my admiration for the earnestness and eloquence with which he closed his defense of this measure. I even shared his enthusiasm when looking forward to the future of this nation he pictured to our imagination the gratitude of those who this nation he pictured to our imagination the gratitude of those who may occupy these Halls a hundred years hence, for the wisdom which planned and virtue which adopted this act, which my friend believes to be the great act of the century; an act that solves a great national difficulty, that calms party passion, that averts the dangers of civil war. Let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that they will not be compelled to add that, though this act enabled the men of 1877 to escape from temporary troubles, yet it entailed upon their children evils far more serious and perils far more formidable; that it transmitted to them shattered institutions, and set the good ship of the Union adrift upon an unknown and harborless sea. I hope they may not say that we built no safeguard against dangers except the slight ones that threatened us. It would be a far higher tribute if they could say of us: "The men of 1876, who closed the cycle of the first century of the Republic, were men who, when they encountered danger, mct it with clear-eyed wisdom and calm courage. As the men of 1776 met the perils of their time without flinching, and through years of sacrifice, suffering, and blood conquered their independence and created a nation, so the men of 1876, after having defended the great inheritance from still greater perils, bravely faced and conquered all the difficulties of their own cpoch, and did not entail them upon their children.

"No threats of civil war, however formidable, could compel

"No threats of civil war, however formidable, could compel them to throw away any safeguard of liberty. The preservation of their institutions was to them an object of greater concern than present ease or temporary prosperity; and, instead of framing new devices which might endanger the old Constitution, they rejected all doubtful expedients; and, planting their feet upon the solid rock of the Constitution, they stood at their posts of duty until the tempest was overpassed, and peace walked hand in hand with liberty, ruled by law." [Applause.]

During the many calm years of the century, our political pilots have grown careless of the course. The master of a vessel sailing down Lake Ontario has the whole breadth of that beautiful inland sea for his pathway. But when his ship arrives at the chute of the La Chine there is but one path of safety. With a steady hand, a clear eye, and a brave heart, he points his prow to the well-fixed landmarks on the shore, and with death on either hand, makes the plunge and shoots the rapids in safety.

We too are approaching the narrows; and we hear the roar of angry waters below, and the muttering of sullen thunder overhead. Unterrified by breakers or tempest, let us steer our course by the Consti-tution of our fathers, and we shall neither sink in the rapids, nor compel our children to "shoot Niagara" and perish in the whirlpool.

[Great applause.]
And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE, (at eleven o'clock p. m.,) the House took a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House re-assembled at ten o'clock a. a., (Friday, January 26.)
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I am aware that it will be very diffi-cult after the discussion which has transpired in this Capitol in both Houses of so exhaustive a nature upon the subject-matter of the bill now before the Congress of the United States for any one, much less myself, to expect to add anything to the information or instruction of the House in what he may say. And in the few remarks that I shall offer I shall simply state the reason for the vote I shall subsequently give rather than attempt to enter into an argument covering quently give rather than attempt to enter into an argument covering the ground already so completely occupied.

The objections to this bill have proceeded, Mr. Speaker, on two grounds: First, it is contended by certain of the opponents of this measure that it is inexpedient to pass it, for the reason that the Constitution provides that the President of the Senate, the Vice-President of the United States, should he occupy that position, or the President-elect of the Senate, would have the right, under the Constitution, to open and count the votes. And as a reason for this it has been urged that under all precedents from the beginning of the Government down to the present time such has been the case; and especially was it referred to by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Garfield.] They referred to what occurred in the first election and the second election of President of the United States as a reason and a precedent why the framers of the Constitution and those who lived contemporaneously with its adoption had yielded to this idea. But, on the contrary, so far from adoption had yielded to this idea. But, on the contrary, so far from that being correct, in 1841 and 1845 and 1849 and 1853 and 1857 and 1861 and 1865 and 1869 and 1873, as in every presidential election since 1797, and including that, the official record states—and I now quote from that record—that—

The two Houses of Congress having assembled the certificates of election of the several States for President and Vice-President were, in their presence, opened by the Vice-President and delivered to the tellers, who, having read and ascertained the number of voxes, presented to the Vice-President a list thereof.

And here ends the quotation. In 1793, when General Washington was unanimously re-elected, the proceedings differed somewhat from all that followed. The record states with reference to the count:

The two Houses having accordingly assembled, the certificates of the electors of the fifteen States in the Union, which came by express, were, by the Vice-President, opened, read, and delivered to the tellers appointed for the purpose, who having examined and ascertained the votes, presented a list of them to the Vice-President, which list was read to the two Houses, and is as follows:

It will be observed that even on this occasion in 1793, on the reelection of General Washington, while the President of the Senate opened and read the returns from the respective electoral colleges, they were yet delivered to the tellers appointed by the two Houses to examine and ascertain what the votes were and they were then they were yet derivered to the teller's appointed by the two hoses to examine and ascertain what the votes were, and they were then returned to the Vice-President, who simply performed the function of announcing the result. So much, then, for the precedent which was so much relied upon by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] in the argument which he made enforcing the idea that the Vice-President the Scatch half the secretary of the scatch half the scatch hal the argument which he made enforcing the idea that the Vice-President of the Senate had the power to count.

In 1857, when the vote of Wisconsin was not cast upon the proper day, owing to the fact that the electors could not reach the capital of the State, but cast upon a subsequent day, the inquiry arcse as to whether the vote of Wisconsin should be counted; and after debate in each House, and the report of the tellers requiring it, it was counted. But in the course of the debate, the Vice-President was bitterly accused by men of both parties of having usurped a power with reference to counting the electoral vote with which he was not invested by the Constitution.

In reply to that the then Vice-President said that he "did not under

In reply to that, the then Vice-President said that he "did not undertake to decide whether the vote of Wisconsin was a good vote or a bad vote."

He disclaimed-I now quote his own language-

Having assumed on himself any authority to determine whether that vote or any ther vote was a good or a bad vote.

In the joint convention which assembled, Mr. Jones, one of the tellers, remarked:

I suppose, Mr. President, the proper way would be for the tellers to report the facts to the convention of the two Houses, and let them decide.

To which the Vice-President replied:

The presiding officer so considers. In the debate which ensued after the two Houses had separated, Mr. Seward said, speaking of the power which the Vice-President was accused of assuming:

A misunderstanding exists in both Houses of Congress whether the President of the Senate, acting, as I hold, as the organ of the Senate, has not passed upon the question and counted the votes from the State of Wisconsin, and whether that may not be drawn into a precedent hereafter. I am one of that number who think that the President has not counted them.

Mr. Douglas, then a distinguished Senator from the State of Illinois, commenting upon the same subject-matter of the assumed power of the Vice-President, said:

I rise to state that in my opinion the tellers have no right to authenticate the certificate until the two Houses have passed upon it as being a true count.

Mr. Crittenden said-

That any member of either House has the privilege and right to object to the counting of a vote.

And this is sufficient to answer the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Garfield,] that the first section of this bill gives to any member of either House the right to object. It existed under the Constitution. The bill does not give it, but it existed under the Constitution prior to any such proposition as that now submitted. But I proceed with the remarks of Mr. Crittenden. He said—

That any member of either House has the privilege and right to object to the counting of a vote, and that it was competent for the Senate and House of Representatives alone to decide upon that objection.

Speaking of a supposed assumption of authority by the Vice-President to declare the vote, he said:

It involves the privilege of determining a presidential election and declaring who shall be President. I protest against any such power.

So much, then, Mr. Speaker, for the early precedents upon this subject and the manner in which they run through the several occasions ject and the manner in which they run through the several occasions when the powers of the two Houses were called in question.

The bill now before the House for consideration does nothing more than designate that five members of this body and five members of the Senate, together with five other persons to be selected in the mode in which the bill provides, shall act for the two Houses in counting the returns. This was a subject, Mr. Speaker, which was considered very much at length by the distinguished men who framed this Constitution. It is by no means a new question. It was debated in that convention at great length and debated in the convention of every State where the Constitution was subsequently considered. In the State where the Constitution was subsequently considered. In the convention of Pennsylvania a distinguished member of the convention of 1787 and also a member of the State convention to ratify and adopt the Constitution submitted by it, I allude to Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, used this language:

The convention, sir, were perplexed with no part of this plan so much as with the mode of choosing the President of the United States.—Eliot's Debates, volume 3, page 297.

So that it will be observed that in that convention we have the testimony of Mr. Wilson that no subject engaged more largely the attention of the convention than the method and mode of counting the electoral vote. Then, sir, we have the testimony of Mr. Mason in the Virginia convention on the same subject, who used this lan-grage:

We know the advantage the few have over the many. They can with facility act in concert and on a uniform system; they may join, scheme, and plot against the people without any chance of detection. The Senate and President will form a combination that cannot be prevented by the Representatives. The executive and legislative powers thus connected will destroy all balances. In its present form the guilty try themselves. The President is tried by his counselors. He is not removed from office during his trial. When he is arraigned for treason he has the command of the Army and may surround the Senate with thirty thousand troops. But I suppose that the cure for all evils, the virtue and integrity of our Representatives, will be thought sufficient security.—Elliot's Debates volume 2, page 364.

I will refer to what was said by Mr. Iredale in the convention of North Carolina, when, commenting on the manner in which the Pres ident was to be elected and the vote counted, Mr. Iredale used this language:

The committee will recollect that the President is to be elected by electors appointed by each State, according to the number of Senators and Representatives which the State may be entitled to in the Congress; that they are to meet in the same day throughout the States and vote by ballot for two persons, one of whom shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. These votes are afterwards to be transmitted under scal to the scat of the General Government. The person who has the greatest number of votes, if it be a majority of the whole, will be President. If more than one have a majority and equal votes, the House of Representatives are to choose one of them. If none have a majority of votes, then the House of Representatives are to choose which of the persons they think proper out of the five highest on the list. The person having the next greatest number of votes is to be the Vice-President, unless two or more shall have equal votes, in which case the Senate is to choose one of them for Vice-President. If I recollect right, these are the principal characteristics. Thus, sir, two men will be in office at the same time: the President, who possesses in the highest degree the confidence of his country, and the Vice-President, who is thought to be next person in the Union most fit to perform this trust. Here, sir, every contingency is provided for. No faction or combination can bring about the election. It is probable that the choice will always fall upon a man of experience and fidelity. In all human probability no better mode of election could have been devised.

Governor Randolph, of Virginia, in the debates in replying to the criticisms of Mr. Henry on the large powers invested in the President and in favoring the adoption of the Constitution, used these significant words in regard to the election of a President:

How is the President elected? By the people, on the same day throughout the United States, by those whom the people please. There can be no concert between the electors. The votes are sent sealed to Congress. What are his "powers?" To see "the laws executed."—Elliot's Debates, Convention of 1787, volume 2, pages 168, 358, and 359.

So that it will be observed that two of the most prominent members of the convention of 1787, afterward acting in their State conventions, Mr. Iredale, of North Carolina, and Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, in speaking of transmitting the votes, did not speak of transmitting them to the Vice-President or the President of the Senate, but of transmitting them to Congress, showing that the idea was that Congress possessed power to supervise the count of those votes.

We have witnessed, sir, in later days, an extraordinary assumption We have witnessed, sir, in later days, an extraordinary assumption of authority and power, and particularly in this last election, by those controlling the military forces of the Government. That too was a subject under consideration by this convention. It was denounced by no man in terms more emphatic than it was by Mr. Dawes, when he reminded the convention that Charles II in England had kept in pay an army of 5,000 men, that James II had increased it to 30,000, and that this justly excited the alarm, indignation, and apprehension of the English people, so that when William III ascended the throne they ingrafted that principle on the English constitution which so many of the States have borrowed, declaring that in no case should the Executive arm, equip, or direct troops except by the assent of the Legislative Department of the Government.

So it will be observed that in every one of the conventions they

So it will be observed that in every one of the conventions they spoke of returning votes to Congress, and not to the Vice-President. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Garfield] in the course of his remarks said that the first section of this bill destroyed the electoral college entirely in the States. How so? On the contrary, it will be found in the sixth clause of the bill that it provides that the action of this commission shall be reviewed by either House upon the motion of five members of the House and five Senators. I quote that portion of the bill in order to show that the gentleman from Ohio has neither construed the first section nor the subsequent one correctly in reference to this matter:

Whereupon the two Houses shall again meet; and such decision shall be read and entered in the Journal of each House, and the counting of the votes shall proceed in conformity therewith—

That is, in conformity with the finding of the commission-unless, upon objection made thereto in writing by at least five Senators and five members of the House of Representatives, the two Houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise; in which case such concurrent order shall govern.

There is, therefore, no surrender of the power of either House. five members of the Senate and five members of the House should desire it, instead of being bound by the finding of the commission, they shall act as they always do, by concurrent resolution or order of

It was further insisted by the gentleman from Ohio that these electoral colleges were despotic in their powers; that they meet as representatives of the people, appointed by the people, but yet, that they were so despotic that when they had assembled and cast their vote there was no power on earth that could correct it. He went on further to remark in regard to the provision of the Constitution that required the presence of the two Houses when the vote was counted. What sort of presence did the gentleman from Ohio say it should be? Why, that they were to be here as dull spectators of the count which the Vice-President was to make; that they were to be here with lips closed and minds sealed, and no one of the five senses able to be exercised save those of sight and hearing; that they were to be here as witnesses of the count of the vote by the Vice-President or President of the Senate, without power to open their lips, without power to object to wrong, without power of resisting corruption, and without power to prevent an unfair return by the Vice-President of the United

Why, sir, the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio is a monstrous why, sir, the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio is a monstrous proposition, clothing this electoral college under the Constitution, not with the power of representing the people, but with a despotic power, and saying that though the Constitution provides that the two Houses shall be present, they shall be present without any authority to ask whether the Vice-President has counted correctly or not. This theory is in violation, as I have shown, of all the precedents; for invariably in the larger number of cases since the first election of President of the United States it will be found that in some way or other, by concurrent action of the two Houses tellers some way or other, by concurrent action of the two Houses, tellers have been appointed, to whom, when the Vice-President has performed the function of breaking the seals of the returns, they have been submitted for examination and computation.

Can these tellers, the mere creatures of the House, compute improperly and yet the Senate and the House be powerless to correct their action or object to it? Suppose the tellers should make a miscount of a vote actually returned, are the two Houses necessarily dumb while this wrong is perpetrated by their own agents? Should the President of the Senate, after the tellers have computed and ascertained the count, report to the two Houses that a different man was elected from the one whom they knew to be elected; are they to sit quietly by and see this assumption of authority and not be able to control it?

It was argued by the gentleman from Ohio that this power was confided to one man because the framers of the Constitution wanted to devolve this duty upon some one who would be amenable to law, who would be subject to impeachment, and thus within the power of who would be subject to impeachment, and thus within the power of the two Houses. For this reason, he argued, the power was confided, not to the two Houses, but to a particular individual. So far is this from being true, that this officer is but the agent of the electoral colleges, the conduit pipe as it were by which the votes of the people, as cast by their electors, may be transmitted to the two Houses.

No question, Mr. Speaker, excited profounder attention in the convention of 1787 than the manner of selecting the Executive. There was no subject upon which the framers of the Constitution felt greater jealousy than the power of the Executive. It was urged by some of the members of that convention that as the Senate would have the right to try any case of impeachment, the President of the United States would thus be tried by his own counselors and advisers. This was the argument made in reference to that body. There was great jealousy of its power from the fact that it was to have the right to confirm the appointments made by the President. Mr. Monroe, of Virginia, who was a member of the convention of his own State, when Virginia, who was a member of the convention of his own State, when he came to discuss the question of the Vice-President and his powers, used this remarkable language: "The Vice-President is wholly unnecessary." A very large number of members of the convention of 1787 and of many of the State conventions were of opinion that the presiding officers of the Senate should in all cases be an officer chosen from that body and not elected from any outside source. Yet shall it be said that this convention would so jealously guard the Excentive from infringing upon the powers of the legislative department by assuming authority not granted in the Constitution, and yet would confide to this officer whom one of the most prominent members of the convention thought unnecessary under our form of Government the power to determine who should be President? Mr. Monroe, in the course of his observations in the Virginia convention, makes the recourse of his observations in the Virginia convention, makes the remark that the Vice-President, for whom this extraordinary power is claimed, would, in many cases, have the right to make a President and that he might be interested himself in the result of an election.

In the short time allotted to me this morning, I shall not be able to cover entirely the ground which would naturally be consumed in an argument of this discussion; but so much has been said on this subject that it is unnecessary to travel over it. I simply repeat that all the precedents from 1793 down to the present time show that the mode of counting the vote for President and Vice-President has always been fixed by the two Houses in some way, and never arranged by them in such a manner that the two Houses were not present. I take it for granted that the framers of the Constitution did not intend to make an idle provision, and that when they provided for the presence it for granted that the framers of the Constitution did not intend to make an idle provision, and that when they provided for the presence of the two Houses they meant that these Houses should be present for the purpose of inspecting the vote through their tellers or their agents. It is proposed in this instance to do that through a commission; and I will say, so far as regards the report of the committee who have given us this bill, that it comes to us sanctioned by the wisest and ablest men of our own body, who have devoted to this subject close study of several weeks, and by the wisest and ablest men of the other side of the Capitol, men of both parties, who believe that this is the most feasible method of meeting the difficulties that now stare us in the face. us in the face.

Sir, it was said by the gentleman from Ohio, in commencing his speech, that he had scorn and contempt for anything looking like force. I have yet to hear on this side of the Chamber, and especially from any southern man, any idea other than that there is virtue enough in the Constitution and laws of the land, and virtue enough in the great heart of the people, to decide this question without even a reference or an allusion to the subject of war. I never have doubted that this question would be solved by the wisdom of the American people and of their representatives in Congress without regard to anything like force. I have believed that the same sagacity, prudence, and wisdom which have characterized those who have preceded us in settling questions of this nature will also characterize our action. I think, Mr. Speaker, that there is no time for appealing to partisan passion and prejudice, for arousing the feeling of the people by unwise, incantious, and uncertain words. On the contrary, whatever is spoken here should be spoken in words of wisdom and prudence and caution, but at the same time with firmness for whatever of constitutional right either House may possess. They should be words of wisdom and truth designed truth designed

To shed
On ears abused by falsehood, truths of power In words immortal—not such words as flash From the fieree demagogue's unthinking rage, To madden for a moment and expire—Nor such as the rapt or artor imbues
With warmth of facile sympathy, and mold To mirrors radiant with fair images
To grace the noble fervor of an hour;
But words which bear the spirit of great truths
Winged for the future; such as the dying breath of Freedom's martyr shapes, as it exhales,
And to the most enduring forms of earth
Commits—to linger in the craggy shade of the huge valley, 'neath the eagle's home, or in the sea-cave where the tempeet sleeps, Till some heroic spirit bid them wake
To thrill the world with echoes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to enter at any great length into the argument of the questions involved in the bill pending before this House. Even if I desired to do so the limited period of time which is alloted to me for my argument would prevent any extensive elaboration of the thoughts I propose to present for the consideration of this House.

I may be permitted to premise my observations by declaring that I have arrived at a conclusion upon this subject after long and careful and anxious thought and study. I may say that I have arrived at it after many vacillations of purpose and of mind, for the principles involved in this bill, the great principles of its constitutional purity and strength, are such that any mind might well hesitate at arriving at a conclusion promptly.

If there be any section of this broad land which more than another requires the preservation, in all its purity, all its sanctity, all its strength, of the Constitution of this country, it is that section of which I have the honor to be one of the representatives. If there be any portion of the American people who more than another should guard and criticise anything which is said or done in reference to that Constitution, it is the people who are suffering now from what they once conceived to be their proper interpretation of that Constitution, but which interpretation was met by force of arms and another placed upon it, issuing almost in their ruin, certainly in the prostration of all their material interests and all their interests in

Therefore, I am tender in approaching the Constitution. I feel that when I do so I come like the patriarch of Israel when approaching the Litrael when secret ground, and I must put my the burning bush: I tread upon sacred ground, and I must put my shoes from off my feet. Therefore, I have sternly investigated my own mind before I could come to a conclusion upon this subject.

I know that the Constitution may suffer from the mistakes of its own friends as well as from the assaults of its enemies. I know that it makes no difference whether the blow be inflicted by the hand of an open enemy or of a mistaken friend. It matters not whether the an open enemy or of a mistaken friend. It matters not whether the rent be one which an envious Casca makes or one through which a well-beloved Brutus stabs. In either case as the "cursed steel" is plucked away the blood of liberty will follow it.

Therefore, I say, I have struggled and striven with my own mind and my own intention. But as I speak under the sanctity of the oath I have taken to support that Constitution, I am conscientions when I declare to these my fellow-members that I do believe that this bill presented for our consideration is perfectly constitutional and safe. If it be constitutional in its provisions then there is but one other question to ask: that is, is, it fair to all parties and to all the people?

question to ask; that is, is it fair to all parties and to all the people? Is it fair to all parties? Sir, the tribunal that we seek under this bill is one that will be bound by the solemnity of an oath; a tribunal chosen from both Houses of Congress and from the Supreme Court of the United States; a tribunal which is to be selected for the wisdom, the patriotism, the fairness of mind of those who shall take part in its deliberations and its actions.

I am not one of those who believe in the utter depravity of human an not one of those who believe in the utter deprayity of human nature. I am not one of those who believe that because men belong to a political party they cannot rise above the atmosphere of passion and of prejudice. We have seen recently, in this very bill itself we have seen, how noble men, politicians, friends of particular party creed, could cast aside their passions and their prejudices and array creed, could cast aside their passions and their prejudices and array themselves almost unitedly upon the side of patriotism and of their country. Therefore, what has been done I believe can be done again. I believe that this tribunal will be one governed by fairness, governed by law, governed by patriotism, governed by the Constitution. If this bill is fair and constitutional, why cannot we support it? Is it not our duty to support it? Constitutional? Why not? The Constitution of the United States is silent upon the points involved in this bill. After declaring that the presiding officer of the Senate in this bill. After declaring that the presiding officer of the Senate shall open the certificates and that the vote shall then be counted, the shall open the certificates and that the vote shall then be counted, the Constitution is silent. No mode is pointed out by that Constitution for examining into a disputed case. No tribunal is pointed out by that Constitution to decide between contesting applicants for an office. It is silent; there is something wanting. It may be that those who framed that Constitution never contemplated the responsibility of such an extremity as is now upon us. But, whatever were their motives, nothing is said, nothing is declared, nothing is determined, nothing is marked out in that Constitution for our guidance.

But the power is left to Congress. Power is given to Congress to

But the power is left to Congress. Power is given to Congress to see to the counting of these votes, to see that the President of the United States is fairly elected by the count of the legal votes cast by the different electoral colleges.

And this Congress now seeks to do this thing. Time and again other Congresses have sought to do it. This is not the first time the question has arisen, this is not the first time the question has been presented to the consideration of the American Congress. again efforts have been made in this direction, but through some cause or other failed. But now there is a necessity for this action.

Sir, I would prefer for myself an amendment to the Constitution, marking out for all time provisions of a bill like this. And if this were a bill to govern more than this present Congress it might not receive my sanction.

But this bill amounts to nothing more nor less than this, that these but this oill amounts to nothing more nor less than this, that these two Houses by concurrent vote will declare how the vote shall be counted. They bind this and no future Congress. They simply declare that we, having the power to count these votes, decree concurrently that they shall be counted in a certain way. That is all. But, sir, if this bill took it entirely out of the hands of Congress, gave Congress no revision, gave Congress no control, allowed Congress no action upon the action of this committee or commission, then gress no action upon the action of this committee or commission, then I would not give it my support. For I do not believe we can entirely disencumber ourselves of our task. I do not believe we can impose our duty entirely upon somebody else to discharge and perform for us. But this bill keeps in the hands of Congress the power of revision. It declares emphatically when this commission shall make an award or a judgment that that shall stand unless the two Houses by concurrent vote shall reject it, leaving the two Houses power by concurrence of action to reject whatever may be the judgment of this commission.

What greater power than that can be claimed for Congress? know that some parties still persist in advocating the doctrine that the presiding officer of the Senate alone has the power to discharge this duty, to count these votes, and decide whether they are right or wrong. Sir, I shall not undertake now, at this late day, to answer that argument. It would be like fighting with windmills, or belaboring an opponent prostrate upon the ground, for the argument has been entirely overthrown.

I know that there are members of my own party, persuasion, and politics who believe that the two Houses must by concurrent vote politics who believe that the two Houses must by concurrent vote count in, instead of by concurrent vote reject; but, sir, that doctrine is not held by all members of the democratic party. There is doubt even in that party line which is the right and which is the wrong doctrine. There always has been, and if we go back to the times when the Constitution was young, when it was interpreted by its framers, we will find the ablest and best exponents of the doctrine of State rights, the most strict constructionists of the Constitution itself held to the doctrine set forth in this very bill, that it required the concurrent action of the two Houses to reject a vote.

current action of the two Houses to reject a vote.

Mr. Speaker, I find in 1800, when this very subject was under consideration, a bill like this passed the Senate, but it did not have in it the power retained in the two Houses to reject a vote. The House of Representatives put in an amendment, reserving to the two Houses the right concurrently to review the vote, to reject a vote. That went to the Senate. In the Senate it was amended by striking out the word "reject," and putting in the word "count;" and that amendment came back to the House of Representatives, and when it came what happened? The House received this bill with amendments, one of which, "respecting the election of President," was, instead of the word "rejecting" (in the bill) any vote or votes by a concurrent vote of the two Houses, the word "admitting" was proposed by the Senate. Mr. Harper—Robert Goodloe Harper—and Mr. Bayard hoped the House would not concur, and the yeas and nays were taken, and the amendment was rejected, 15 yeas, 73 nays. Among those voting to reject that amendment, therefore among those to retain the provision that it required the concurrent action of the two Houses the provision that it required the concurrent action of the two Houses to reject a vote just like this bill does, I find these names: James A. Bayard, William C. C. Claiborne, Samuel J. Cabell. Albert Gallatin, Robert Goodloe Harper, Thomas Pinckney, Edward Livingstone, Nathaniel Macon, John Nicholas, and John Randolph of Roanoke. Surely if I had any doubts, if I had any doubts of the propriety of this provision, I, a humble individual, might well yield them to an array of such a list of names of earnest supporters of the rights of the States, earnest supporters of strict construction of the Constitution. Therefore I have no doubt about the constitutionality of this tion. Therefore I have no doubt about the constitutionality of this bill.

I believe it to be fair. I believe it to be equitable. I believe it to be demanded by the exigencies of the times and of the country. I believe it, above all, to be constitutional. And for these reasons I shall give it my support.

Sir, I am not one of those who apprehend war or difficulty arising from the troubles now around us. I never have apprehended or believed that there would be a clash of arms growing out of this quesneved that there would be a clash of arms growing out of this question. I know that the American people in their great heart are too much wrapped up in constitutional liberty to have arms clashing over a constitutional question like this. I am not one of those who believe in the approaching downfall of that constitutional liberty. Constitutional liberty has been before in as great straits as now. But it never has been destroyed entirely. From the day when it was wrested in an unshapen, unformed condition from an English tyrant wrested in an unshapen, unformed condition from an English tyrant at Runnymede, by the iron-mailed hands of English barons, to the present hour, when it stands invested with the full stature and majesty of manhood; through all the vicissitudes of change and time and blood, it has never died. Time and again it has seemed to be overthrown in the tunults of temporary revolution, or destroyed by the vacillating changes of the popular will. Time and again the hand of some Tudor or Stuart, or the power of some star chamber, or the grasp of some military despotism, has seemed to crush it into dust. But each time the example of some Hampden, or the sacrifice of some Warren, has proved to the world that it still existed, and still claimed its followers and apostles. Ay, time and again the life has seemed warren, has proved to the world that it still existed, and still claimed its followers and apostles. Ay, time and again the life has seemed to depart from its body, and that body, clothed in the cerements of the grave, has been put away out of sight into what seemed to be its eternal tomb. But its disciples had only to labor and to wait, and each time some hand has been found to roll away the stone from the door of the sepulcher; and issuing forth in all its pristine vigor and beauty, it has again shed sunshine and safety all over the land.

Sir, I stand almost beneath the coat of arms of my native State, engraved upon the ceiling of this Hall. There is the arch of the Constitution, supported by the three pillars, upon which respectively are inscribed the words "wisdom," "justice," and "moderation." If these three words can be the talismans to control our action-wisdom in the concert of measures, justice in executing them for the benefit of all alike, moderation in the exercise of power—if we will act under the inspiration of those words, and so contain and so control ourselves, we will hand down and perpetuate for posterity the great principles of constitutional liberty. [Applause.] yield what remains of my time to my colleague, Mr. Felton. Mr. FELTON. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the plan of adjust-ment proposed by the committee which in my judgment conflicts with the provisions of the Constitution.

It is simply a commission created by Congress, clothed with its powers to inquire into the law and the facts, and when a decision is reached by that commission their report becomes a guide to congressional action.

It is not a compromise, for that would imply a concession of principle, a surrender of opinion for a common benefit.

In this bill each party and every shade of opinion connected with the vexed question of counting the electoral vote is respected and guarded from attack until it can be ascertained by the wisest, purest, and most patriotic tribunal that this country can organize whether this or that political party and what previously-formed opinions are in harmony with the constitutional law of the land.

It is a movement in the interest of peace and in opposition to all revolutionary measures. This country for weeks has been on the verge of a most terrible political and social convulsion. Law, order, and prosperity were equally poised in the scale of chance with violence, fraud, and financial ruin. Good men awaited in breathless expectancy the crash which seemed inevitable. Business was paralyzed in every section of the country, and confidence, which is so essential to prosperous business communities, was being destroyed just as it was on the eve of a permanent restoration.

By the conservative stand taken by this House of Representatives, their determination to maintain the Constitution and the laws, and never to tolerate any proceeding that was revolutionary in its character, we have been instrumental in bringing to pass that which occurred in 1821 under the wise and conservative influence of the statesmen of that day; also, that which occurred in 1833 by the houest and intelligent leaders of that period; and that which should and would have occurred in 1860, if our statesmanship had been equal to the demands of the occasion, namely, existing difficulties have been adjusted, the Constitution and the laws have been respected, the Union has been preserved, civil strife has been averted, and a prosperous future secured for us and our children.

The strength of republican governments has frequently been called into question. From the beginning it was charged by our enemies that these institutions were well enough adapted to a young government, in a formative condition, with a circumscribed territory, homogeneous population, identified in all their interests and pursuits. But when our population should increase and approximate in numbers the population of the oldest and most substantial monarchies of Europe; that when our interests and pursuits became diversified and necessarily antagonistic; that when the products, labor, and customs of one section began to clash with those of another section; that as wealth concentrated and the multitude found it more difficult to sustain themselves; that as avarice and ambition should develop a party spirit, inflamed by a common desire for place, power, and personal enjoyment of the revenues and patronage of the Government as all these elements of disintegration and dissolution should be evolved by time and growth, our form of government would gradually weaken and, like all its predecessors, disappear in blood, anarchy, and despotism.

One of our great orators has expressed this doubt and uncertainty in language made memorable by its eloquence: "We stand the latest and perhaps the last experiment of self-government." Is it true that self-government is still an experiment? Is the doctrine that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed still a problem in process of solution?

The man of science asserts what he supposes a truth. He has expended time, labor, and fortune in its attainment. If it be truth, it is valuable to the world. The doubt can only be settled by experi-

That "idea," with all its accompaniments, is thrown into the crucible to be tested; an hour may establish its falsity, or it may emerge from that crucible "more precious than gold tried in the fire."

Republican forms of government have been attempted in nearly every age of the world, but never under so favorable circumstances as in this country and in our one hundreth year.

We are constrained to believe that it is yet watched by the patriot as an experiment; watched not only in this country, but watched by the purest and best of our race thoughout the world. We have been notified by the exigencies of this presidential muddle that the experiment approaches its culmination. The supreme moment is at hand, and we are to take off the lid of the crucible and find either the hopes of the world turned to ashes or find those hopes consolidated and perfected, bearing these glowing words, "In perpetuum."

The question to be considered in estimating the strength of our Government and its adaptation to the necessities of our rapidly-increasing population is simply the capacity of the people through their representatives to preserve and perpetuate the Constitution and the laws of the Republic.

A constitution is sometimes defined as the fundamental law of a state, containing the principles upon which the government is founded.

In American constitutional law the word "constitution" is used as implying the written instrument agreed upon by the people of the Union as the absolute rule of action and decision for all departments and officers of the Government, in respect to all the points covered by it, until it be changed by the authority which established it, and in opposition to which any act or regulation of any such department, or officer, or even of the people themselves, will be altogether void.

A government may have a constitution and yet not be a constitutional government. The mere grant of a constitution does not make the government a constitutional government, until the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments of the government, and until even the people themselves, unless acting in a constitutional way, are deprived of power to set it aside at will.

Magna Charta did not make the English a constitutional monarchy, and it was not until after the Crown was deprived of all power to set and it was not until after the Crown was deprived of all power to set it aside that civil liberty was protected by constitutional guarantees and the government became constitutional.

The product of constitutional government is civil liberty; this is the resultant of all governments of limited and enumerated powers. Our founders were assured of this truth, and they declared the object of our Constitution to be the establishment of justice, domestic tranquillity, the general welfare, and the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity.

Every lover of his country is interested in preserving the Constitu-

Every lover of his country is interested in preserving the Constitution of his country. Its preservation means liberty to ourselves and our posterity. It is the anchor which in the storm holds fast the ship which is freighted with all the blessings of peace, prosperity, and happiness that may be in store for us and our children. It is the rock in the wilderness which our fathers under the inspiration of the hour commanded to send forth that stream which is to irrigate and enrich the political wastes of the world. Wherever its refreshing waters touch there the wilderness is made to "blossom as the rose."

It is said that some of the deserts—the wild, barren, burning, sandy plains which abound in the East—give signs of having been once fertile and productive lands, perchance crowded with a dense and thrifty population. Magnificent cities were there, as is proven by the broken columns and sculptured marbles which are occasionally thrifty population. Magnificent cities were there, as is proven by the broken columns and sculptured marbles which are occasionally brought to light by the excavator. Flowers bloomed around happy homes. By some convulsion in nature, the streams which traversed those lands were dried up at their sources or diverted from their channels and sought the sea through other outlets. Is it possible that somewhere in the future some author of the "Decline and Fall of the Republic" shall, in prosecuting his inquiries, excavate from the débris of history some fragment, some broken column of American constitutional liberty, revealing the fact that there once existed a government securing to its inhabitants the "blessings of liberty" where only the dreary, bitter rule of despots shall appear?

Every act of a people outside of their written constitution is revolutionary, and the product of almost all revolutionary measures undertaken by the citizens of a constitutional government is despotism.

dertaken by the citizens of a constitutional government is despotism.

Where a new form of government is desirable, where existing evils are insupportable, then revolution may relax the hold of the oppressor or may at least modify the exactions of unjust rulers or disperse the conspirators against the public welfare.

perse the conspirators against the public welfare.

But when the citizens of a free republic undertake to correct real or imaginary evils; to right wrong-doing or maladministrations, or to enforce the will of a faction or party, by measures outside their written constitution, the result is generally the destruction of all that is valuable in that republic. Nay, more. When a free people desire to enforce the constitutional provisions of their government, that enforcement must be according to constitutional requirements.

It will not do to resort to unconstitutional or revolutionary measures for the preservation of the Constitution. We elect a President every four years. Heretofore there has been no difficulty in determining who was constitutionally elected, or in the event there was no election by the electoral college, the election passed into the House and the chosen man was inaugurated.

no election by the electoral college, the election passed into the House and the chosen man was inaugurated.

But now honest men cannot agree. I am sincere in my convictions that Mr. Tilden is elected. Others, equally sincere, believe that we must take the results of returning-boards, and thereby inaugurate Mr. Hayes. There are others whose personal ambition and partisan corruption may incline them to intervene between the ballot-box and the inauguration of the constitutionally chosen President. Will you find the solution of such a crisis in revolutionary measures? Never. We think every act which has for its object the stifling of the popular will at the ballot-box is revolutionary in its character. Shall we meet these revolutionary acts by counter-violations of our fundamental law? Never! Rather let us meet them by constitutional and legal remedies, and by exposing the frauds, plots, and conspiracies of men who are seeking a partisin triumph by overturning the supremacy of the ballot-box. Let us make political trickery odious, and at the same time forever establish the vital principles of free government.

The men who would resort to force to throttle the verdict of the ballot-box, to make any man President who has been rejected by the ballot-box, to make any man President who has been rejected by the people, or to prevent any man from being President who has been constitutionally elected, are public enemies, and, to the extent of their ability, are destroying the foundations of our free institutions. The man who dreams of military power as a remedy for any difficulty arising out of the exercise of the elective franchise has never appreciated the beautiful delicacy, the wonderful complexity, or the glorious purposes of republican forms of government; he has certainly read history to little advantage.

History teaches that in all elective governments, whether they be republics or monarchies, the critical period with them is when the administration of public affairs is passing from the hands of one man or party into the hands of another; that has been the time when personal ambition, partisan prejudice, or an inordinate desire for public plunder, have found it most convenient to array themselves against the will of the cation as expressed at the ballot-box.

Take Poland for an example. From 1573, when Poland became an elective monarchy, and Henry Duke of Anjou was called to the throne by the votes of the nobles, until the abdication and death of Stanislaus, in 1798, at nearly every election for a new monarch personal feuds, civil dissensions, and the clashing swords of rival aspirants impoverished and disgraced that unhappy country.

Take our neighboring republic, Mexico. Since 1821, when this country declared her independence and Iturbide was emperor, and during the time that Santa Anna was made its first president, in all about fifty-six years, I am told there have been fifty-five revolutions to found as many dynasties in that faction-cursed republic. Nature made Mexico an earthly paradise. In climate, soil, mineral wealth, and facilities for commercial enterprises there is no land on the globe excelling Mexico. Yet her civilization and prosperity have been reexcerning stexico. Let her civilization and prosperity have been retarded, her resources undeveloped, her government made a by-word and reproach among the nations; revolutionary factions determined to advance their own personal interest, as ignorant of and as indifferent to the claims of the public welfare as the brutal savages they profess to have supplanted, having no conception of self-government to advance their own personal interest, as ignorant of and as indifferent to the claims of the public welfare as the brutal savages they profess to have supplanted, having no conception of self-government and no idea of constitutional remedies as separate and distinct from the rattle of musketry or the less harmless rattle of pronunciamientos. In Mexico aspirants for office and an unwise partisanship among the people are the exciting causes of all their troubles. The leaders, who are generally military men and unfitted by their professional training for the administration of civil affairs, and who are surrounded by a multitude of impecunious attachés, succeed in their insurrectionary purposes. They involve the people in fratricidal war; property is destroyed; all business pursuits are suspended; there is not sufficient intelligence and virtue among the people to resist the pressure of these military adventurers and attachés, and the result is the government passes for a short time into the hands of a few idle, scheming, corrupt, and unprincipled politicians, who in turn are driven away by a swarm of more desperate political brigands.

I apprehend no such fate awaits this Republic. Our politicians and partisan leaders may be crafty and ambitious; they may have lost that delicate sensitiveness to public honor which characterized our fathers; the bulwarks which the old régime threw around the national escutcheon may have been swept away; political corruption and official peculation may have been setartling in their dimensions, but as long as the people remain as they are, intelligent, virtuous, and patriotic, we have an unquestioned security against all attacks upon constitutional liberty by corrupt and ambitious leaders.

The people must and will govern this country. They will govern it according to the Constitution and the laws, and political overthrow and disgrace awaits the man or party which is arrayed against the popular will constitutionally expressed. Leaders of a party may be capable of the most palpable tricks or the legerdemain of State canvassing boards.

The object of this commission is to determine among other matters how and for whom the people voted.

Again, sir, this commission will give strength to the incoming Ad-Again, sir, this commission will give strength to the incoming Administration. If by any means a man becomes President of this Republic with the taint of illegality or fraud attaching to his inauguration, with a large number of his fellow-citizens believing that he unjustly occupies the position of Chief Magistrate, he will have done more to weaken confidence in our republican institutions than all the errors, mistakes, and unconstitutional acts of his predecessors, for he will have struck a blow at the very source of free government and will have given a precedent for future usurpations that may lead to the permanent overthrow of the Constitution.

I cannot believe that either of the honorable competitors for the next Presidency would be willing to accept the position under such damaging surroundings. I cannot believe that either of the great political parties which control this country would be willing to see their favorite go into office under the imputation of fraud, or even of irregularity, for they must love country better than party ascendency, they must value the happiness of their children, which is inseparably bound up with our country's Constitution, more than the partisan triumphs of the hour.

This commission will free the incoming Administration of all taint of irregularity or fraud.

I care not who had been made President by the action of Congress without the intervention of this board of arbitrators, he would have been met at the threshold of his administration with the charge of usurpation and dissension; party strife and desperate political measures would have characterized the next four years, to the utter prosares would have characterized the next four years, to the utter prostration of business and the possible overthrow of the Government. As much as I desire to see Mr. Tilden President, I never wish him to occupy that exalted position charged by a large and controlling party as a usurper. No, sir; by the passage of this bill respectability is guaranteed to whoever may be President, and no barrier will be thrown in his pathway of duty.

The passage of this bill will be the proof that in moments of great peril the American people are prepared to subordinate all partisan excitement to the general welfare, and that our Government, under the guidance of an intelligent citizenship, is self-adjusting in all its

the guidance of an intelligent citizenship, is self-adjusting in all its parts. As time rolls on, with increasing population and wealth, we will apprehend no trouble from increasing friction or multiplying

The passage of this bill may sweep to destruction many things which have long barricaded the progress and prosperity of this country. Like the ice-gorge which oftentimes gathers in navigable rivers, blocking up and arresting all trade, when under more genial suns and influences the final break-up occurs, there is carried to the bottom in the crash the partition, the plunge, all that lies in its pathway.

So this political and presidential gorge, which has been gathering and threatening for weeks, will carry under, when it breaks, many of the worm-eaten men and parties which have obstructed the nation's progress; and nothing shall be seen on the broad, deep stream of liberty but the Constitution and Union of our fathers.

Mr. MILLS obtained the floor. When he had spoken ten minutes, he was interrupted by Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, who said: I rise to a question of order. My point of order is that the gentleman from Texas has spoken ten minutes, and that under the order made by unanimous consent yesterday the last four hours preceding three o'clock were to be devoted to speeches not exceeding ten minutes in length. I send to the Clerk's desk, to be read, the remarks of the Speaker in having that order made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the reason why The SPEARER. The Chair desires to state that the reason why he did not call the gentleman from Texas to order at the expiration of ten minutes was that on this question, as is well known, each side is somewhat divided in judgment. It seemed proper to the Chair that each division of the two sides should be heard upon this question at length in argument. The friends of the bill on the left of the Chair have been heard and the opponents of the bill on the left of the Chair have been heard at some length, indeed at considerable length, while the friends of the bill on they have been heard. while the friends of the bill on the right of the Chair have been heard at considerable length and no member of the House on the right of the Chair who desires to vote against this bill has yet been heard. The Chair thought that, in administering the hour, it was nothing more than right and just that some one should be heard at length in opposition to this bill upon the right side of the House, and up to this time the opportunity has been denied them. If the House desires the execution of the order and puts the interpretation upon it as indicated by the gentleman from Indiana, there is no help but for the Chair to enforce it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I ask that the Clerk read the language of the order of the House made yesterday in regard to debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the fact that the order of the House was that the last four hours of the debate should be confined to ten-minute speeches, but the order is not distinct whether that does or does not include the hour after the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to my colleague [Mr. BAKER] that under the circumstances he consent that ten minutes additional time be allowed to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.]

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I should be as much gratified as anyone to hear the gentleman from Texas. I did not make the objection in consequence of any indisposition to listen to him, but because under the order of the House there is now only four hours left for debate before the previous question is to be called. There are a very large number of gentlemen who desire to be heard, and if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Mills] is allowed to consume an hour at this time it will deprive at least five other members of the opportunity to be heard.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let him have ten minutes more.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. So far as I am personally concerned, if the gentleman from Texas desires only ten minutes more, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The time for debate having been limited to three o'clock this afternoon, if the order be not enforced, there are twenty-five members who have put down their names for remarks who cannot be heard. I do think that the majority of this House have had their share of this debate and that the minority ought to be heard. I must object to extending the time to any one.

ought to be heard. I must object to extending the time to any one.
Mr. PAGE. I would suggest to the gentleman from Texas that some gentleman on that side belonging to the minority upon this question can be recognized and yield his time to him.
Mr. MILLS. I hope I shall not be placed in that situation. I appeal to the sense of justice of the majority of this House to permit the minority to be heard. This bill is as good as passed, and there is no need for indecent haste about it. I want that our ideas may go upon record in this centennial year, so that a hundred years from now, when it is again proposed to violate the Constitution, the reasons of those who now oppose it may be found upon the record.

Mr. HUNTON. I trust that the objection of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Townsend] will be withdrawn, and that the gentleman from Texas will be allowed to go on for ten minutes longer.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I will withdraw my objection if the time for calling the previous question can be extended to ten minutes after three o'clock.

Mr. HUNTON. I hope the gentleman will say half an hour.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I am willing to allow the gentleman a half an hour, if the time for calling the previous question can be extended after three o'clock for half an hour, so that the additional time shall not be taken out of that which should be given to

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be the most fair and just way. The Chair understands that unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] may continue his remarks for thirty minutes longer.

Mr. MILLS. I ask for one hour from the time I commenced, and that the time for debate be so far extended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for one hour from the time he commenced, and that the previous question shall not be called until four o'clock, instead of at three o'clock.

Mr. HUBBELL. I object to that.

Mr. BANKS. I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. That will interfere with no right that any other members were here.

member may have.

Mr. HUBBELL. I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. HOGE. I renew it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I must object to any extension of time, unless the understanding is that the previous question shall not be called until four o'clock

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair stated.

Mr. HOAR. In regard to the order made by unanimous consent yesterday concerning debate upon this bill, I have this suggestion to make: The committee have had and have exercised to a large degree, if not entirely—I gave away my own time to my friend from Maine, [Mr. Hale]—the power of beginning this debate. That practice usually obtains where the committee are divided in sentiments, as they ordinarily are, in regard to the questions that are considered and reported upon by them.

Mr. MILLS. I hope this is not coming out of my time.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HOAR. In this case the report was made by a united commitee, so that five hours of the debate to start with (not including the hour to which I was entitled as a member of the committee) have been controlled by five gentlemen friendly to the measure, which does operate a certain injustice to the opponents of the bill. The SPEAKER. So the Chair thinks.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think the House thought of that at the time the order was made. I thought of it and gave a great deal of my time to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Hale.] Perhaps the House will see that a brief extension of time to be enjoyed by the opponents of the bill would not be unjust under the circumstance

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that under the arrangement made on yesterday in regard to the debate the gentleman from Texas would have been entitled to the floor when the House met at ten o'clock this morning. But last night unanimous consent was given to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Garfield] to extend his remarks beyond the hour to which he was entitled. That was one of the hours for which general debate was allowed. The consequence was that the gentleman from Texas is thrown an hour or a part of an hour beyond the man from Texas is thrown an hour or a part of an hour beyond the time when he was to have the floor.

Mr. BANKS. I have never known a question of this magnitude to be pressed within so small a compass of time for debate.

Now the committee had almost the entire day yesterday. The tenminute speeches of to-day are of no account. Nobody wants to speak under that limitation upon a question of this sort. I would like to speak myself; but I waive my privilege that I may hear others. I hope there will be no objection to the gentleman from Texas proceeding in the way he has proposed.

ing in the way he has proposed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this additional time will really be but justice to the gentleman from Texas who, by reason of the extension of time on the other side of the House, was this morning cut out from the first hour.

Mr. LAPHAM. If the order of yesterday fixing the hour for closing this debate is to be changed, I trust that no definite time for terminating the discussion will be now fixed. This measure occupied two legislative days in the Senate besides one whole night embracing twelve hours of discussion. Yet in this body, much more numerous than the Senate, it is proposed to occupy but half the time which was given to the debate in the Senate. I ask, therefore, that the time for closing this debate may be left undetermined at present, to be fixed by the House after the discussion has proceeded further.

Mr. PAYNE. There is great propriety and justice in allowing the opponents of this bill the additional hour that has been suggested; and for one I do not propose to antagonize that proposition. But beyond that I must object to extending the time for calling the previous question.

Mr. FORT. I trust the committee will let loose the gag on this question and allow some others to speak besides those whom the comquestion and allow some others to speak besides those whom the committee select. I think that a question of this importance ought not to be run through in this manner. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] to loosen the gag and allow gentlemen to talk without any extraordinary restriction.

Mr. MILLS. I hope gentlemen will defer this debate till I get through with my remarks.

Mr. SPRINGER. The committee do not undertake to control the

The SPEAKER. All of yesterday except one hour was controlled by the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. I mean that the time to-day is not under the control of the committee.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the House will consider that when the committee occupied the time yesterday they occupied practically the whole time allotted for debate. Ten minutes is no time for any one who wants to discuss the principles of this bill. I hope the gentleman from Texas will be allowed to speak his hour. I trust nobody man from Texas will be allowed to speak his hour. I trust nobody on this side will object to it.

The SPEAKER. Unless that arrangement be assented to, gentlemen on the right who are opposed to this measure will have had no opportunity to argue the question fully.

Mr. HOAR. I hope my colleague [Mr. Banks] will understand that the committee agree with him entirely.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I trust that our friends on this side will interpose no objection to the order extending the debate one hour and giving the gentleman from Texas that hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CLYMER. Does this arrangement extend the time for demand-

Mr. CLYMER. Does this arrangement extend the time for demanding the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It extends it till four o'clock.

Mr. MILLS resumed and concluded his speech, which is as follows: Mr. Speaker-

I feel like one
Who treads alone
Some banquet-hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled,
Whose garlands dead,
And all but he departed.

Laughter.]

My convictions of duty compel me to oppose the compromise of the joint committee. Having sworn to support the Constitution, without any "mental reservation or purpose of evasion," I will endeavor to keep the obligation that oath imposes without variableness or shadow of turning. It is the supreme law of the land, and it exacts obedience from every citizen. I have been taught to believe that it created a Government whose power was divided into three co-ordinate and independent departments: that every step toward the concentration of these three into one was a step fraught with great peril to popular liberty, and when the union is consummated we should have the very essence and definition of despotism.

It was most aptly said by Mr. Justice Davis in the Milligan case, and said for all of his brethren:

The Constitution is a law for rulers and people equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times and under all

For well nigh a century it has borne us along through storms as well as calms. It has carried us victoriously through foreign wars as well as through the most gigantic civil insurrection ever seen on the earth since the morning stars sang together. It has been subjected to every conceivable test, and it still remains to us a fortress and a strong tower where the genius of free institutions may stand and defy all the storms of partisan rage and disappointed ambition. The very object of a constitution is to guard the public safety in times of peril; but now we are told, after its reign of almost a hundred years, that safety can better be secured by abandoning its protection and fleeing for aid to temporizing expedients. If democratic statesmen abandon its defense, as their adversaries have done, we shall soon see the end of its authority, and its beneficent reign end in clouds and darkness and storm. Had it not been for their strict vigilance and unfaltering and storm. Had it not been for their strict vigilance and unfaitering devotion to it at all times and under all circumstances; had it not been that they had kept the eyes of the people constantly fixed upon its infractions and the dangers that threatened it with overthrow and ruin, it would have been to-day nothing but the form of a republic driven to anarchy by madness and ambition and governed and misgoverned by military pronunciamentos.

What is needed, sir, is not a more accurate method of ascertaining what is needed President. It is not that the law is not sufficiently clear to enable us to learn and obey the public will. But what is who is the elected Fresident. It is not that the law is not sufficiently clear to enable us to learn and obey the public will. But what is wanting among the people, or a portion of the people, is a disposition to obey the popular will when that will has been expressed against their own inclinations. I care not how clear the law may be, it is utterly powerless without the disposition to support and obey it. That is a virtue without which it is impossible to sustain republican government. Let us stand upon that magnificent platform which was given to the country by General Grant a few years ago in a letter addressed by him to President Johnson. He said:

This is a Republic where the will of the people is the law of the land. I beg that their voice may be heard.

Let us all get upon this platform and let us invite the President to come upon it himself, and all apprehensions for the public safety will at once be dispelled. Believing that the Constitution is adequate to every emergency, that it provides for every contingency, that there is no necessity to resort to extraneous aids to preserve the Government, I cannot consent to give my vote to a measure that paralyzes the power of this House and transfers that which it cannot transfer to a tribunal unknown to the Constitution, the power to determine to a tribunal unknown to the Constitution, the power to determine who is the elected President of the United States. It is a practical abdication of power by the House. To pass this bill is to surrender the trust reposed in us by our constituents and abandon them to the hazard of the die.

We are told, sir, that there is a difference of opinion about who is elected and who shall count the electoral vote, and unless this compromise is adopted the worst of consequences may ensue. For nearly a century we have had presidential elections, and they have always been contested with great earnestness and attended with high popular excitement. At the end of each of those campaigns the votes have been returned, the electors appointed, their votes have been cast and sent to the Vice-President. They have been opened by him, as directed by the Constitution, and counted by the two Houses.

Never on one single occasion has the Vice-President exercised the right, or claimed it even, to determine what votes should be counted. Such a doctrine is a new revelation that was made during the last canvass. The disciples of this faith are now very zealous and profess to be profoundly sincere in their convictions. This power they derive from the power granted him to open the certificates. The canons of interpretation tell us that language in the Constitution is to be construed like language in any other law. If that be true, the expression of the power conferred on him would exclude all other perpression of the power conferred on him would exclude all other persons from opening said certificates, and would likewise exclude all other power except that of opening the certificates. When that is done, and the certificates delivered to the two Houses, his power over them ceases. But does not the Constitution say that "the votes shall then be counted." Yes. By whom? There are but two parties present; it must be by one or both of them. The Senate and House of Representatives are there, with their officers. The Vice-President is there, but the Sergeant-at-Arms is there also, as is the Speaker and Sergeant-at-Arms of the House. The Vice-President detached from the Senate is an official nonentity. There are three departments in the Government; he is an officer of the Government, and must belong to some one of them. He must be a part of the executive, a part of the judicial, or a part of the legislative. If he is not a part of one of these, he is a myth. We know that he is not a part of the execution of any of the laws. We know that he is not a part of the judicial, for he neither exercises judicial powers nor enforces the orders of those who do. Then he must be a part of the legislative. That is divided into neither exercises judicial powers nor enforces the orders of those who do. Then he must be a part of the legislative. That is divided into two branches, a Senate and a House of Representatives. He is certainly not a part of the House; he must be a part of the Senate. He has his seat there, presides over its deliberations, votes with them, preserves order, opens and delivers to them all communications addressed to him as Vice-President that require the action of the Senate. Then, sir, when he is present in the joint session, he is there as a part of the Senate, and can be there in no other capacity. As the returns are directed to him, he is to open them. They are directed to him rather than the Speaker because he is a higher officer, and that deference was due to the dignity of the position as well as the officer who filled it. The Constitution requires the votes to be counted then and there. Why should the presiding officer of the Senate open them rather than the presiding officer of the House? Because he presides in the joint session by the law of courtesy, and the presiding officer was the proper person to open them, he already having them in his custody. them in his custody.

But there is another insuperable objection to the right asserted. The Constitution provides that in a certain contingency the House of Representatives shall elect the President, and it is an undisputed of Representatives shall elect the President, and it is an undisputed rule of law that where a power is to be exercised upon the happening of a contingency the body upon whom it is conferred must determine for itself when that contingency shall happen. But if the Vice-President is the sole judge of the vote, and his judgment cannot be questioned, he can elect whom he pleases and the House could never elect; or you must have two elections and Presidents, both provided for by the Constitution. You have two tribunals, each supreme, and each having jurisdiction to determine the same fact. But that is not the end of the tangled web. The Senate in a certain contingency, of which it is the sole judge, is to elect a Vice-President. The Vice-President counts the vote and decides two persons are elected President and Vice-President. The Senate says the count between the candidates for Vice-President was a tie and proceeds to elect. The House says the same of the count between the candidates for Presidents, and all legally elected. The Constitution never contained such folly. How are these inconsistencies to be reconciled? Certainly not upon the hypothesis that the encies to be reconciled? Certainly not upon the hypothesis that the Vice-President has anything to do with the count at all. The pretensions of the Vice-President are as inconsistent with common sense as they are with a correct construction of the Constitution.

Thus far I have no objection to the bill. It settles that question, which was from the beginning a bold and palpable absurdity. I wish it had gone no further; but it has, and established a tribunal two-thirds legislative and one-third judicial, and to that tribunal it has transferred the settlement of the question that the Constitution im-posed upon the two Houses. Impolitic as this measure is, it would not have been in violation of the Constitution if it did not deprive one branch of Congress of its equal power to hear and determine the ques-tion. If when this award is made and submitted to the two Houses the bill had provided that it should not be adopted until both of them agreed to it, it would leave the power of each House unimpaired. Each House is equally the judge of what votes shall be counted and who is elected; but this bill provides that when the award of the joint commission is made that it will require the concurrence of both Houses to reject it; or, in other words, the assent of but one House will sustain it, thereby allowing one House to count the votes and declare the President elected. When votes are opened in the presence of the two Houses, they cannot be counted except by the assent of both Houses. Each has exactly the same powers as the other. If they both agree to count a vote or not to count, they will both agree when a President is elected and when he is not; they will both concur when the contingency happens that the one must elect a President and the other a Vice-President. There can never be any collision between them. There is no provision in the Constitution where joint action is required that anything can be accomplished without the concurrence of both Houses. The two Houses are a legislative unit, and the assent of a part of it is not sufficient to meet the demand upon the whole; wherever they are required to join in the performance of a duty, if they do bill had provided that it should not be adopted until both of them agreed part of it is not sumicient to meet the demand upon the whole; wherever they are required to join in the performance of a duty, if they do not agree, everything remains as though they had not met.

The idea is obscured by the way it is presented by the bill. The whole subject is obscured by standing the proposition on its head instead of its feet. The proposition of the committee is that it will require both Houses to concur to reject the decree of the commission, or one House assenting to it counts its vote. The other House is ignored. It should have required both Houses to have consented to the decision of the commission. Then their power would have remained unimpaired. Every count of the electoral vote, from the origin of the Government to the present time, has been by the concurrence of both Houses. Such is the unbroken line of precedents; such is the twenty-second joint rule, from which the Senate seceded last session to deprive a democratic House of any voice in counting the electoral vote at the present time. The practical effect of this bill is that the body controlled by the party for whose benefit the vote is to be cast can admit it, though it be a gross and palpable fraud, and the other House is powerless to prevent it. The legislative department of the Government is designated as the tribunal to count the vote because it can exercise both legislative and judicial powers on that question. The legislative department only can decide political questions. If there are two governments in a State, an illustration which we have before our eyes, both send electoral votes to be counted, the first question to be determined is a political one, which is the rightful State government? And to determine it Congress must act; that is, both Houses. After the political question is settled then come the judicial questions, ineligibility, fraud, or other. have required both Houses to have consented to the decision of the the political question is settled then come the judicial questions, ineligibility, fraud, or other.

The Supreme Court held in Luther w. Borden that the judiciary could not determine who was the chief magistrate of the little State of Rhode Island. But this bill says five of its judges have the power to determine who is the Chief Magistrate of thirty-eight States. The people never designed to confer on the Supreme Court power to determine who should be their President. That is a power they lodged far beyond the reach of the judiciary. And if the Supreme Court had not the power to enjoin the President from doing an unlawful act, as they held they had not in the Georgia and Mississippi cases, how could they in all the solemnity of their assembled gowns determine who was the legal Chief Magistrate of forty-five millions of people? This question the people have left with the representatives of the States and the representatives of the people, and they must be left untrammeled in the exercise of their judgment and neither House must be fettered or its equal power in the least impaired.

No man can be legally the President of the United States unless both Houses have concurred in declaring him elected, or both Houses

No man can be legally the President of the United States unless both Houses have concurred in declaring him elected, or both Houses have concurred in declaring no one is elected and the House elects. In this proposition I am sustained by the unbroken practice of the Government from its beginning. Mr. Clay announced this doctrine in 1821, and it was not controverted by a single Senator or member in that Congress. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] eulogized the names of Randolph and Macon and other American eulogized the names of Randolph and Macon and other American statesmen who in the great contest of 1800 had voted for a measure like this to avoid the evils of a threatened civil war. He extolled their patriotism and their great abilities, and in doing it he touched a chord in my bosom that responded to every sentiment he so eloquently uttered. But, sir, when I produce the name of Henry Clay, who when besought by anxious friends to espouse that which conscience said was wrong, that which he felt while bringing weal to him would bring woe to his country, said, "I had rather be right than be President;" the man whose sleepless devotion to the people won for him the title of "the Great Commoner"—when I can produce his name to sustain the position I take here, I can more than match any other name that has ever attracted the admiration of the American people. Mr. Clay, after stating that in determining the question "the people. Mr. Clay, after stating that in determining the question "the two Houses must decide what are votes," said:

Will the House allow that officer-

The Vice-President-

singly and alone, thus virtually to decide the question of the legality of the votes? If not, how then were they to proceed? Was it to be settled by the decision of the two Houses conjointly or of the Houses separately? One House would say the votes ought to be counted, the other that they ought not; and then the votes would be lost altogether.

Another American statesman who is still with us, and advocating now the power of the Vice-President to decide the question, held a few years ago that it required the concurrence of both Houses to count a vote. In the debate in the Senate in 1875 he said:

You cannot leave it to one House alone; they do not agree. You cannot read both sets; you can only read one set, and therefore read that set which both Houses of Congress, supposing men to be patriotic and to be honest and acting under the obligations of the Constitution and their oaths, shall decide to be the true and valid return. I think that is the fairest way.

Mr. EATÖN. Suppose they do not agree on the same return. What then?

Mr. MORTON. The vote goes out. The State has no vote.

In the same debate Mr. THURMAN said :

Something must be done for a case where there are two conflicting returns; and what can you do but require the two Houses to consider each of those returns, and then determine which of them shall be received? They can make no decision to receive one unless both Houses congur. One House has no superiority over the

I will give a quotation from a recent letter by Judge Comstock, formerly of the supreme court of the State of New York, and one of the ablest judges that ever sat in that court. He says:

the ablest judges that ever sat in that court. He says:

Howillusive and deceptive, then, must be all devices and all contrivances conceived with the end in view of counting electoral votes against the constitutional protest of either Houses of Congress. All such devices and contrivances terminate in the denial of a great and vital power, the existence of which is conceded at the very point where the work of circumvention and fraud begins. I believe the people earnestly intend that the Constitution shall not be thus made the sport of political parties. They cannot tolerate one interpretion to-day and another to-morrow, as partisan necessities may vibrate and change on one side or the other. In the justly aroused state of the public feeling it is dangerous thus to sport and play with the Constitution. The great and delicate powers which it confers must be executed. They cannot with impunity be openly trampled upon or fraudulently circumvented. In my opinion, most deferentially entertained, they are ample to meet all the phases of the present emergency. New and untried expedients are as unnecessary as they are without warrant in the fundamental law or in the precedents and usages of our past history.

Some weeks ago this House appointed a select committee to examine and report to it what were the powers and privileges of this House in counting the electoral vote. They made a report to the House embracing six points; the fifth was—

That in the counting of the electoral vote no vote can be counted against the judgment and determination of the House of Representatives.

On that committee were, among others, Messrs. Knott, Tucker, and Field, three of the ablest lawyers in the House. A week ago, if this House had been called on to vote on the adoption of that report, it House had been called on to vote on the adoption of that report, it would have received every democratic vote in this House. Why have they retreated from it now? Have they taken counsel from their fears? Will they abandon the powers and prerogatives of this House, which is the voice of the people, because the republican party threaten to seize the Government by force? A wonderful change has come over the spirit of their dreams in a few short days.

For myself, sir, I will not shun the responsibility that attaches to my position. I will never give my vote to disarm this House of the power it has to assert and maintain the rights of the people. If popular government is to be overthrown, and a minority is to dictate to the majority and enforce its orders by the military power of the Government, I will not legalize the robbery nor do any act to screen its deformity from the eyes of the people.

There is a serious objection to this bill on the score of policy. It deformity from the eyes of the people.

There is a serious objection to this bill on the score of policy. It is the first step toward an alliance between the legislative and the judicial departments; and when the union is completed the judiciary must pass completely under the influence of the legislative department; it will lose its independence and its integrity and become the mere serf of political power. It will be degraded. Each of these departments must be kept perfectly independent of each other or civil liberty must perish. This is the lesson we read on all the pages of history. Are we, sir, without instances illustrating this truth in our own history? Within the last few years we have passed through the dark night of civil strife. Storms of passion have swept the land, and Congress has been filled with political madmen. The Supreme Court, independent of them, holding their places for life, have stood like a rock against which the waves have dashed and broken. Congress twice changed the number of its members to compel it to conform to the legislative will, but it continued in the even tenor of its way, and that way was always to stand by the Constitution in its way, and that way was always to stand by the Constitution in every utterance that fell from the bench. In December, 1866, the Supreme Court decided the Milligan case, declaring that civil liberty and martial law could not endure together, that the antagonism was irreconcilable, and in the conflict one or the that the antagonism was irreconcilable, and in the conflict one or the other must perish. They declared that all the safeguards of personal liberty secured by the Constitution remained inviolate, excepting alone the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, and when that was suspended by Congress the highest stretch of arbitrary power was to detain the body of its victim; that it could not try him; that he could only be tried by jury, after an indictment by another jury; that when tried he could only be convicted by the unanimous voice of the whole panel. They declared that there was no place in our system where such a monster as a military commission could live; that it had no powers; its judgments were without authority except the yet, sir, as soon as that decision was rendered, the Congress of the United States passed an infamous bill that will stand a perpetual blot upon our civilization. It annihilated States that the authority of the highwayman's code that might makes right. blot upon our civilization. It annihilated States that the Supreme Court say are indestructible. It subjected the civil power to the military when the court held that the military was subordinate to the civil. In willful and wanton defiance of the Constitution and the decision of the court it created military commissions and invested the monsters with power to drag its victims from the tribunals ordained monsters with power to drag its victims from the tribunals ordained by the Constitution and deprive them of life and liberty without cause and without trial. The Executive, then independent, vetoed the bill, and in his message returning it called the attention of Congress to the decision of the Supreme Court, condemning their pretended authority to pass such a law under the Constitution which they had sworn to support, but they shut their eyes and rushed headlong to the consummation of their purposes. They voted again to stab the Constitution which they had sworn to support "without purpose of eyasion". Do you think it is safe to subject the indiciary to the of evasion." Do you think it is safe to subject the judiciary to the influences of such red-bonneted Jacobins? Do you propose to wed the judiciary to this department that for ten years has been engaged in a revolution to overthrow the Government and erect a military despotism upon its ruins? If you do, as one of the representatives of the people and in their name I forbid the bans.

Sir, after that bill had become a law and the present Executive was in the presidential chair, a citizen of Texas was seized at the bar of one of her civil courts, where he stood covered with the panoply of the Constitution and the laws, ready to make his defense before a jury of his peers; he was hurried before a military commission, passed the ordeal of a mock trial, and was condemned to be hanged. The record ordeal of a mock trial, and was condemned to be hanged. The record of this court was laid before the President, who required the opinion of his Attorney-General before he would approve it. This officer, under the pernicious influences of the legislative department, gave an elaborate opinion in the face of the decision of the Supreme Court, telling the President that the military commission had the right to try and condemn a citizen to death, and advising him that he saw no good reason for withholding his approval. Whether or not the sentence was executed I am not informed, but if it was I have the authority of the Supreme Court for saying it was murder.

On the 14th of January, 1867, the Supreme Court decided the cases of Cummings and Garland, declaring that test oaths which deprived or cummings and dariand, decraring that test daths which deprived a citizen of any right by legislative enactment for past conduct, under any form, however disguised, was a bill of attainder, and called by name and interdicted by the Constitution; and yet, sir, this House on the 22d day of the same month passed a bill prohibiting persons from practicing law in the courts of the United States for past con-

In Garland's case they declared that the Constitution conferred the pardoning power on the Executive; that it was beyond all interference by Congress; that mercy and clemency had been placed in a citadel above the power of hate and revenge; that when the President exercises this act of clemency all civil and political rights were restored. Yet Congress in six weeks after the decision enacted a law prohibiting citizens who had executive pardons from voting and hold-

When we contrast these independent judges of the Supreme Court with the creatures of the executive and legislative departments as represented by the Underwoods, the Bonds, and the Durells, we should pause and deliberate with great care and caution before we strike down the first barrier that separates them and keeps them in-dependent of either executive or legislative control. In all the peril-ous hours of our history an independent judiciary has always stood the immovable bulwark of civil liberty, against which the rage of madness and the intrigues of ambition have dashed and broken as the boisterous waves dash and break against the rock. The judiciary stands to-day, as it has always stood, firmly grounded in the confidence of the people. Let us stand by the Constitution which has separated these departments and divorced them perpetually from each other. Let us assiduously cultivate habits of obedience to its authority, and we shall not stand in need of miserable expedients like this to extriwe shall not stand in need of miserable expedients like this to extricate us from threatened danger.

When we look back into the history of our English ancestors we see upon every page of her history that their rights were preserved, not by concessions to bold and impudent pretension, but by a persistent and courageous adherence to them whenever they were assailed. A bold, independent, and honest judiciary has always been the strong support of personal and public liberty in Great Britain. The unshaken confidence of the people in its honesty and ability gave it a moral power that caused its indements to be respected and obeyed The unshaken confidence of the people in its nonesty and ability gave it a moral power that caused its judgments to be respected and obeyed throughout the kingdom. In the fifteenth century a chief-justice of England committed the Prince of Wales to prison for insulting conduct in his presence in court. In the seventeenth century, when the judiciary had been prostituted by its alliance with the throne, a chief-justice of England was scorned and spit upon as he rode through the streats of London. the streets of London.

But laying aside objections to the bill, let us see what will be the results of its application. The republicans have taken by force the electoral vote of three States—Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina. They have taken them in the face of day and in spite of majorities, and in the case of Louisiana a large majority. Upon the results in these States the presidential election depends. If the bill should not pass these fraudulent votes could not be counted, because they could not obtain the consent of the House. If the bill should pass, these votes can be counted without the consent of the House and in spite of its wishes. Is not that a surrender of the power of the House I is it my duty to surrender a certainty for a chance because some one is alarmed? Are we to take counsel from our fears and abandon the Constitution and betray the confidence and trust of the people? Is it not our duty to stand by the rights of this House and depend of every one challenges to the law?

demand of every one obedience to the laws? Let me ask my friends what answer they will make to their constituents when they return to their homes and they shall ask them why they surrendered the rights of the people represented in this House. When they shall ask you if the House of Representatives do not possess an equal power with the Senate in counting the electoral vote and determining who is President, you will answer, a committee of this House have so reported to it at this session, and that no vote can be constitutionally counted without its concurrence; when they shall ask you what has been the practice of the Government on that subject, you will answer them, no vote for President has ever been counted without the concurrence of the House since the Govern-ment was formed; when they shall ask you if the Constitution does not confer on you the power to elect a President if no candidate has received a majority of all the electors appointed, you will answer has received a majority of all the electors appointed, you will answer yes; when they ask you if you did not have a democratic majority both of members and States in the House and the ability to elect a democratic President, you will answer yes.

What, then, will be your answer when they ask you why you abandoned a certainty for an uncertainty—why you did not discharge the duty imposed upon you by the Constitution, instead of creating a tribunal for that purpose whose determination was to be confessedly a game of chance? What answer can you make for putting up to lottery the Presidency of forty millions of people? The only answer you can make is that you were afraid of the present Executive; hat the assembling of soldiers and artillery here and the open menaces of the friends and supporters of the Executive had filled your bosoms with apprehenand supporters of the Executive had filled your bosoms with apprehenand supporters of the Executive had med your bosons with apprehensions of civil war. Grantit. But is it wise states manship to encourage intrigues and conspiracies by making concessions to them? Is it not rather our duty to stand by the Constitution and laws and declare him President whom the people have elected? It is our duty to stand by the ballot-box, not the dice-box.

If in this game of chance the dice should fall against the people's choice and elect a man reprobated by them at the ballot-box; if it should re-instate an administration which they have condemned and renounced and continue over them the misrule that has banished renounced and continue over them the misrule that has banished their prosperity and paralyzed their industries; if to maintain by force what they have won by fraud they shall annihilate the political power of the South by remanding her States to territorial vassalage, as that party is now proposing in the Senate and House; if arbitrary power and the swarm of vultures which follow its shadow to prey upon the victims of its lusts shall be given again to an oppressed and suffering people, what answer will you, what answer can you give for surrendering the keys to their fortress which they have intrusted to your faithful keeping?

For myself, I will stand by the Constitution and the sovereignty of the people, and leave it to them to determine whether or not they will abandon their Government to a bold, insolent, and palpable will abandon their Government to a bold, insolent, and palpable fraud. Concessions to fraud never added strength to the right and only defers the evil we would avoid, and, while deferring, increases its strength. If we are right, then let us stand by the right for the sake of the right. If the Constitution is assailed by a powerful combination for its overthrow, we can best do our duty by rising to the highest courage in its defense. In the language of a great American statesman, let us "cling to the Constitution as the mariner clings to the last plank in the shipwreck when night and tempests gather round him." Let us imitate the high courage of that other great American name, and adopting his motto, "Ask nothing but what is right and submit to nothing that is wrong." These, sir, are the lights that fall along my pathway, and these are the lamps by which my feet are guided, and I will follow them with the faith and devotion that the philosophers followed the star that led them to the Author of truth.

We are creating a commission of five democrats and five republicans from Congress and two democrats and two republicans from the Supreme Bench, and the four judges are to choose the odd man from three republican judges. If these opposites, whose equality in num-bers is so carefully provided for, cancel each other like plus and minus quantities in algebra, as it is supposed they will, the democratic pros quantities in algebra, as it is supposed they will, the democratic prospect for the Presidency is to be found in one republican judge who will hold the balance of power. It has been the boast of our Government that it was of the people, by the people, and for the people; but this is a government selected by chance, and a very poor chance for him who was chosen by the people if the representatives of the two parties must in the present condition of the country resort to this mode of settling the controversy.

If peace at any price is the controlling idea, then both parties ought to have equal chances in the toss of the dice. Let us see if we have. Louisiana voted democratic by over eight thousand majority, but a vile and infamous returning board, created to defraud the people of their right to have such officers as they chose, gave the certificates to the republican electors. The same was done in Florida and South Carolina. The votes of these three States are necessary to elect Hayes, one of their electoral votes is necessary to elect Tilden. The Senate refuses to join us in counting the vote this year as it has always been done before, without a single exception, to prevent a democratic House from throwing these votes out. As the votes stand they are presumed to be correct; if submitted to the Senate and House they could not be counted, because both Houses would have to concur. But they are referred to this mixed commission and when it decides, if it be for Hayes, as the fifteenth man who holds the casting vote is a republican and the chances are that way, then the House has lost its power, and the Senate being republican will of course abide by the decision, and as it cannot be rejected except both Houses concur, it will stand and give the Presidency to Mr. Hayes. We have exchanged a demonstrate of the course of the contract of and give the Presidency to Mr. Hayes. We have exchanged a demo-cratic House having power to elect a President by itself for a mixed commission with a republican majority on it. Any man who would make such a trade in ordinary times and under ordinary circum-stances ought to be confined in a lunatic asylum. We have given up all our advantages and the rights of our constituents with them out of pure fear, and that alone. I do not mean fear of personal vio-lence to the members, but fear of civil war. If it is justifiable to surrender the Government to a usurper in order to preserve peace, then government has lost all authority and is a mere rope of sand. The success of this conspiracy is an invitation, and a very seductive one, to other schemers to conspire again to seize it and hold it; and when the favorable opportunity presents itself, it will be repeated and on a larger and grander scale.

The proper way to have treated this bold and impudent conspiracy as to have confronted it with equal andacity. When we met here was to have confronted it with equal andacity. When we met here in December, instead of doubting, debating, and halting, confronting an insurrection with investigating committees, we ought to have assured the confidence of the people by accepting the issue tendered by sured the confidence of the people by accepting the issue tendered by the conspirators, planted ourselves squarely upon the supremacy of the Constitution and the people, and called upon them to prepare to vindicate their rights. If that course had been taken—and I advised it in the first conference held with my party associates—this thing would have disappeared like a dream. The people everywhere would have responded with a storm of indignation against the leaders in the plot that would have silenced them forever. But instead of this, our leaders exhibited a want of that high courage necessary to meet and repress a gathering revolution, and the conspirators boldly pressed forward in their plans. If the people of the West had not spoken in terms so defiant and determined, I doubt if the conspirators would have faltered or accepted any terms. After the western meetings on the 8th of January, I doubt very much if the leaders would have attempted to carry their plans into execution. They stood trembling and hesitating over the coveted prize, "letting I dare not wait upon I would." Their counsels were as stormy and discordant as the counsels of the synod of fallen angels called to deliberate upon the assault and overthrow of heaven and heaven's dread Sovereign, and had they screwed their courage to the sticking point, and dared the enterprise, they would have been hurled

With hideous ruin and combustion, down To bottomless perdition, there to dwell In adamantine chains and penal fire, Who durst defy th' Omnipotent to arms.

Seeing their divided counsels and appreciating their weakness, they wisely decided that "discretion was the better part of valor," and pressed for the arts of diplomacy rather than the arts of war. In accepting their proposition, and to that extent recognizing their revolutionary pretensions as a power too potent to be suppressed by the power of the Government, we have acknowledged the strength of their conspiracy and confessed a weakness in the Government to meet it.

I fear we have made a mistake. The leaders in this conspiracy have certainly made a very grave mistake in attempting to overthrow the will of the people, the only annointed sovereign in this land; and the President, by lending to it the aid of his own name and character and the official power belonging to his station, has made the gravest of all the grave mistakes of an administration of eight years characterized throughout by usurpation, fraud, and misrule. To an American citiand contrast it with what it was ten short years ago. Before he rose to the Chief Magistracy he was the idol of the Union people. His to the Chief Magistracy he was the idol of the Union people. His reputation was the theme of their constant admiration. They determined that he should be President that he might wear for their gratification as well as his own their highest civic honor, as he had worn their highest military honor, and they trusted with unfaltering faith that he would adorn the one as he had adorned the other. When called by the will of the people to exchange the camp for the court, the sword for the scepter, unhappily for his reputation and for the well-being of his country he called around him for his advisers a cotterie of politicians who danced about his feet with fawning and flattery. Alast for a weakness to common among rulers his ears were tery. Alast for a weakness too common among rulers, his ears were open to the voice of flatterers, pretenders, and hypocrites, the worst enemies of himself and the State. They poured into his ears a ceaseless stream of fulsome laudation. They won their way to his bosom, obtained his confidence, inspired his counsels, conducted his administration, and like false and treacherous sirens have lured him from his course and made him steer the ship of state over sunken rocks and boiling maelstroms, until to-day he is brought by their wicked and perpicious counsels to look upon a reputation once the admiration of the world now marred and stained by the grossest usurpations of power and a country hanging upon the ragged edge of revolution and rnin.

As a southern man, conscious of his magnanimous bearing as a soldier toward a people who had fallen under the edge of his sword, remembering as I do that perilous hour when a recusant son of the South, himself President of the United States, demanded of the Warwick of her armies that he would consent that Robert E. Lee might be brought to the scaffold and stand upon its treacherous triggers to make treason odious—a name that was written in the heart of hearts of the fallen people; a name that they hugged to their bosoms and cherished with their holiest affections; a name that was left as the only idol they could worship when land and liberty were lost and property and peace had gone down in the storm of battle; a name that came back to them unstained by one unmanly act, to occupy the that came back to them unstained by one unmanly act, to occupy the vacant places of the loved and lost who slept in undistinguished graves all over a blighted and ruined land—Lee, who had piled the memorial rocks of victory on every rolling hill and beside every murmuring stream that guarded the gates to the confederate capital, must die upon the scaffold, that treason might be made odious and the love of liberty lost in the land—the thought could only have come from a heart that was the habitation of cruelty; it was a deed of darkness demanded by the passions which civil strife had loosed from their prisons, and if it had been done it would have blotted the fair face of victory with a smirch of blood that all the waters of the multitudinous seas could not have washed away: it would have been the trudinous seas could not have washed away; it would have been the thrust of a poisoned dagger leaving a rankling wound whose lips would never heal. If the great captain had yielded then, as he has yielded since, to the insolent demands of those who were far beneath him in all the qualities of head and heart, he would have done a deed that would have caused tears to rain for a generation upon the faces of twelve millions of people. Had he done the deed he was entreated to do—and entreated by a President—he would have washed his hands in the blood of one of the purest, noblest, and best of the sons of the sires of '76, and left an enduring spot upon his fair name and fame, a spot upon which the American people would fain have gone backward and covered with a mantle of perpetual oblivion. But with the same high resolve, the same unconquerable will, the same chivalrons sense of honor that had always characterized the man, he spurned the deof honor that had always characterized the man, he spurned the temand, high though the source, and standing like a soldier upon his plighted honor, informed the President that not a hair of his head should perish as long as he held unbroken the faith he had pledged to the Union. Look upon the pictures, then and now. Then he stood to the Union. Look upon the pictures, then and now. Then he stood before the country like Saul amidst the hosts of Israel from his shoulders and upward higher than all the people.

Now lies be there,
And none so poor as do him reverence.

Mr. LAMAR began his remarks; but before concluding, Mr. CLYMER said: As it is now very near twelve o'clock, I ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] to yield to me to move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. LAMAR. I will yield for that purpose.
Mr. CLYMER. I now move that the House adjourn.
The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at eleven o'clock and fifty-nine minutes a. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 26, 1877.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. Owen, D. D., of the city of Washington. The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting an estimate from the Commissary-General of Subsistence to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for subsistence of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, the amount ($36,840.71) being required to replace subsistence stores lost by the burning of the Montana in the Gulf of California, December 14, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BUILDING FOR SMITHSONIAN COLLECTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, adopted at a meeting held January 24, 1877, asking an appropriation by Congress for the erection of a suitable building, in connection with the present edifice, for the accommodation of additional collections; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WINDOM presented a resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of such legislation as will appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the several States afflicted with grass-hoppers to those States, to be used in the payment of bounties for the destruction of such grasshoppers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands

He also presented the petition of Henry R. Wells, of Preston, Minnesota, praying the repeal of the law imposing a tax on the deposits, circulation, and capital of national banks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented a petition of John Cummings, C. A. Grinnell, and others, of Boston, Massachusetts, praying for the adoption of the proposed plan for counting the electoral votes; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of E. R. Mudge, Sawyer & Co., and others, of Boston, Massachusetts, praying for the adoption of the proposed plan for counting the electoral votes; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented a petition of A. W. Wilson and others, of the District of Columbia, praying that the charter of the Washington City Inebriate Asylum be so amended as to place it upon a footing with the other public charities of the District of Columbia, and that an annual appropriation be made for it; which was referred and that an annual appropriation be made for it; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WRIGHT presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of the city of Burlington, Iowa, favoring the adoption of the plan for the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President reported by the joint committee of Congress; which were ordered to lie

Mr. COCKRELL. I hold in my hand a resolution passed by the Kansas City Board of Trade on the 22d of January, approving the ac-tion of the joint committee of Congress in regard to the counting of the electoral votes. I move that it lie upon the table. It represents all the different political sentiments of this great city of the West, Kansas City, which has 35,000 inhabitants, and it was passed by the board of trade unanimously.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of an appropriation of money out of the Indian civilization fund for the payment of attorneys' fees and expenses incurred by settlers on the Osage ceded lands in that State in contesting the title of the same, and for the prosecution of certain suits against certain railroad companies in the United States courts; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be

Mr. INGALLS. I present also three petitions, numerously signed by citizens of Johnson County, Dickinson County, and other places in Kansas, praying for the passage of an act allowing pensioners the amount of arrears to which they would be entitled by the removal from the statutes of the unjust limitation which has debarred many from receiving their just dues, and that they shall be entitled to receive in all cases pension from the date of discharge of the soldier.

I take the occasion which the presentation of this petition offers me to say that on the 20th of April last the Committee on Pensions reported to the Senate a bill of the House of Representatives granting additional pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, with amendments, covering this among other subjects of very great importance; and I give notice that on Monday next, at the expiration of the morning hour, or as soon thereafter as I can obtain the attention of the Senate, I shall move the consideration of House bill No. 2454, relating to this subject. I move that the petitions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. I present a petition of John T. Pickett and Joseph J. Stewart, attorneys for the heirs of James H. Causten, deceased, and others, praying that the unappropriated balance of the Geneva award fund be devoted to the payment of the French spoliation claims. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary inasmuch as that question is now before that committee; and, as it is a curious proposition and seems to be very well argued, I move that the petition

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOOTH presented a petition of citizens of California, praying an amendment of the pension laws so as to allow arrearages of pen-sions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOWE. I present a couple of petitions from citizens of Suamico and Holley, Wisconsin, praying the passage of an act allowing pensioners the amount of arrears to which they would be entitled by a removal from the statutes of the limitation which has debarred many from receiving their just dues. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. I would say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the Committee on Pensions have reported a bill on this subject, and I have given notice that I will call it up for action on Monday, and I have given notice that I will call it up for action on Monday, and I hope the Senator will be here to assist in its passage.

Mr. HOWE. Let the petitions lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will lie on table.

Mr. HOWE presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Milwaukee, in favor of the proposed appropriation of $50,000 by the General Government to aid in the establishment of a temporary colony for the purpose of exploration and scientific research at or near the eighty-first degree of north latitude under the direction of the President of the United States, and with the advice and counsel of the National Academy of Sciences; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT. The bill (S. No. 1161) for the relief of Nathan Butler, of Minnesota, which was introduced by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. Windom,] was referred to the Committee on Claims by mistake, when it should have gone to the Committee on Pensions. I move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1103) for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of François Cazeau, have had the same under considrepresentatives of François Cazeau, have had the same under consideration and recommend its indefinite postponement. I am requested to ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report a bill to ratify and confirm an agreement made by ertain commissioners appointed under authority of an act passed last year with the different bands of the Sioux nations. This is a very important measure, it affacts a very large territory and a very greet. important measure; it affects a very large territory and a very great number of people in the United States. If there is no objection to the bill I should be glad to put it upon its passage.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the bill been printed?

Mr. ALLISON. It is just reported. The bill is very brief. It only confirms an agreement made with these Indians.

Mr. INGALLS. Which has been local contains.

Mr. INGALLS. Which has been long in print.
Mr. ALLISON. It has been long in print. The articles have been printed, but I do not know that the matter has been examined by members of the Senate.

The bill (S. No. 1185) to ratify an agreement with certain bands of the Sioux Nation of Indians, and also with the northern Arapahoe and Cheyenne Indians, was read the first time by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for informa-tion, subject to objection.

The bill was read the second time at length.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt that I shall vote for the bill, but I think that on account of the great importance of the subject-matter and for the sake of example, it ought to lie over until the next day's

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Iowa calls it up at our next ession I shall have no objection to it and I shall vote for the bill from what I know of it, but I object to its consideration to-day.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall not press its consideration to-day, but I give notice that if we shall have a session to-morrow I will call up this bill. I think it will take a very short time to dispose of it. If we do not have a session to-morrow, I shall call it up on Monday. I move that the bill lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4306) making appropriations for the sup-port of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4188) making appropriation for fortifications and for other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

REVOLT IN TURKISH PROVINCES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print additional copies of the message of the President of the United States communicating correspondence in relation to the revolt in the Turkish provinces, reported it without amendment, and it was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That 500 additional copies of the message from the President of the United States communicating correspondence with diplomatic officers of the United States in Turkey in relation to the revolt in the Turkish provinces be printed for the use of the Department of State.

REPORT OF DISTRICT BOARD OF HEALTH.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution in regard to printing the report of the board of health of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and it was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives corcurring.) That 1,000 extra copies of the report of the board of health of the District of Columbia for the year 1876 be printed for use and distribution by said board.

PACIFIC RAILROAD ACTS.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to give notice that as soon as the morning hour expires I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 934) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act. This bill has twice been made a special order; once postponed at the request of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] who is now absent, and the other day it was overslaughed by the unfinished busi-

Mr. PADDOCK. I wish that the Senator from Ohio would consent when my colleague, who is still absent, who is a member of the committee and has had much to do with this proposition, will be here.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator excuse me? I did not hear a word that he said.

Mr. PADDOCK. I suggest that the Senator from Ohio consent that this bill go over until the day after to-morrow, when I am advised that my colleague, who has given this matter a great deal of attention and who is still absent, will be here. I think that one day more, or two days more, will make no difference in the ultimate de-termination of the matter. My colleague is very anxious to be here when the bill is considered. He is a member of the committee, and when the bill is considered. He is a member of the committee, and has given the matter much attention.

Mr. THURMAN. This session is fast running to a close and it is agreed on all hands that something should be done on the subject of this bill. If something is to be done there is no time to lose; but I am perfectly content if the bill can be taken up so as to be the unfinished business to-day, and then if we adjourn over until Monday the Senator from Nebraska will be here. If he should not, nevertheless I am quite certain that the debate will take up the whole of to-morrow, so that the Senator from Nebraska will be here in time before the vote is taken. If there can be an understanding that we shall take up the bill and leave it the unfinished business at the close of our session to-day, I will consent to that very willingly.

Mr. PADDOCK. The proposition is entirely acceptable to me.

Mr. WEST. May I inquire of the Senator from Ohio what his proposition is, with respect to this bill?

Mr. THURMAN. My proposition is that it shall be the understanding that it be taken up so as to be left the unfinished business at the adjournment to-day.

standing that it be taken up so as to be left the unfinished business at the adjournment to-day.

Mr. WEST. You propose to call up the bill at the termination of to-day's session so as to make it the unfinished business for to-mr. rrow?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PADDOCK. Or on Monday?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir. If we sit to-morrow it will be the unfinished business for to-morrow, but if we do not sit to-morrow it will be the unfinished business on Monday morning.

Mr. PADDOCK. I wish to have the further understanding with the Sengtor from Ohio that if we shall hold a session to morrow and

Mr. PADDOCK. I wish to have the further understanding with the Senator from Ohio that if we shall hold a session to-morrow and my colleague has not yet arrived he consent that the bill shall go over as the unfinished business until Monday.

Mr. THURMAN. If it is made the unfinished business at the close

Mr. THURMAN. If it is made the unfinished business at the close of to-day's session and comes up to-morrow, then after the bill and the report and the other bills, for they will all come up together it is very clear, shall have been read, I shall not have any objection to the bill going over until Monday, if it can be passed by informally and not lose its place as unfinished business. I want to say now, although it is a little out of order, that manifestly the attention of the Senate will be drawn to this subject and the points that are in dispute by the different propositions. There is a House bill which has already passed, and is on our Calendar; there is this bill reported by your Judiciary Committee; there is a bill on the same subject reported by the Railroad Committee, and there is a substitute to that offered by the Railroad Committee, and there is a substitute to that offered by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] and it will be by bringing the "arious differences between these propositions to the attention of the Senate that the subject will be finally understood. The discussion will take place upon those differences, I think, so that I shall be perfectly willing if the various bills shall be read to-morrow and the reports upon them to consent that this bill shall preserve its place so as to be the unfinished business for Monday.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am quite as anxious as the Senator from Ohio or any one else can be that this matter shall be amply considered and finally determined, and I shall be unwilling to place any obstacle in the way of an early consideration. The arrangement which the Sentine state of the stat ator now assents to will be entirely satisfactory. I hope the bills will be read to-morrow.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1186) for the relief of Charles H. Moseley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on

Military Affairs

Mr. MERRIMON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (8. No. 1187) authorizing the Secretary of War to allow interment in the National Cemetery at Newberne, North Carolina, of the remains of the late R. F. Lehman, lately a commissioner of the United States circuit court in the eastern district of North Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS. I have been requested to introduce a bill to attach to the Territory of Wyoming a certain portion of the Black Hills country for judicial purposes. Whether this bill should properly go to the Committee on the Judiciary or to the Committee on Territories, I am not aware. I believe the latter committee have the subject under consideration.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1188) to attach to the Territory of Wyoming a certain portion of the Black Hills country for judicial purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1189) to extend the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts of the United States, for the punishment of crimes, over Indian reservations within the limits of any State or organized Territory; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I was about to say that this bill ought to receive the attention of that committee at this time. It relates to a very important subject connected with the Indians on the various Indian ervations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1190) to establish a post route from Kasheno to Langlade, in the State of Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1191) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to receive and report upon unadjusted claims for damage to real estate in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORT ON EUROPEAN SHIPS OF WAR.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the Senate the report of Chief Engineer J. W. King, United States Navy, on European ships of war, &c.

COURT OF COMMISSIONERS OF ALABAMA CLAIMS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to submit a resolution, which I ask to have put on its passage. It is a resolution authorizing the printing of five hundred copies of the report on the Alabama claims for the use of the Secretary of State. I offer the resolution at the instance of the Secretary of State:

Resolved, That 500 extra copies of the message from the President of the United States, communicating a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, relating to the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, be printed for the use of the Department of State.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to. PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Charles H. Moseley, of Little Rock, Arkansas, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. WRIGHT. Some time since a bill passed the House of Representatives in accordance with a recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue—a bill (H. R. No. 2922)—to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make allowances for compensation to collectors of internal revenue who went out of office prior to February 8, 1875, upon final settlement of their accounts. This bill was reported upon some time since by the Finance Committee, and its indefinite postponment recommended and agreed to. My attention has been called to it, and, after consultation with the chairman of the Commit-the on Finance, I move that the order for the indefinite postponement of the bill be reconsidered, and that the bill be recommitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves the reconsideration of the order by which the bill was postponed indefinitely. nitely, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

WARREN MITCHELL.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 2145) for the relief of Warren Mitchell. The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to its present con-

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I object to the consideration of the bill. I would prefer that the Senator from Florida, who made the report, would allow it to go over until some day early next week. I report, would allow it to go over until some day early next week. I dissented from the report made by the Committee on Claims, and would much prefer, if there be no special objection, that the bill should go over until the early part of next week, when I shall have no objection to its being taken up, and considered, and disposed of.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Is the Senator willing to designate any particular day that will suit his convenience?

Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin, Trackley would sait me.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Tuesday would suit me. Mr. JONES, of Florida. Very well, I accept that.

DR. J. MILTON BEST.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 174) for the relief of Dr. J. Milton Best, of Kentucky

Kentucky.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this motion?

Mr. INGALLS. When the Senator from Oregon gave notice on a previous day of his intention to call up this bill, it is my recollection that the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] who is now absent, the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who is now absent, and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON,] whom I do not see in his seat, expressed some desire to be heard upon this bill when see in his seat, expressed some desire to be heard upon this bill when it should come before the Senate for consideration; and as the subject is one confessedly of very grave importance, the bill having been before passed and vetoed by the President, it seems to me to be inappropriate to take it up during the morning hour.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that I did not observe that any of the Senators referred to by the Senator from Kansas were absent, and I shall not insist upon the consideration of the bill in their

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2157) to provide for building a markethouse on square 446, in the city of Washington, District of Co-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the motion? The Secretary will report the bill for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is that bill up for consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question if

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice that the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who have generally taken a very active interest in District matters, are not present, and I do not know whether it would be proper to pro-

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest that this is an important bill, a long bill, and one which gives unusual powers. I know nothing about the merits of it. I do not know whether it ought to be considered in the absence of some Senators who have taken an active part in such matters; but I rather think it ought to be. I do not know whether the bill is called up for explanation or whether the Senator from Kansas wishes to press it in the absence of those Senators who have usually taken an interest in such matters.

Mr. INGALLS. To whom does the Senator from West Virginia

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Oregon just said that the Senator from New York and the Senator from Vermont each had taken an interest in the subject-matter.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Oregon was purely facetious in his remark, I would say to the Senator from West Virginia. He was endeavoring to requite me for a remark that I made in regard to a bill of his. This subject has never before been under consideration, and is one that affects purely local interests in which those Senators have never taken the slightest concern.

While the bill is somewhat long, its provisions are exceedingly simple. It relates to a matter of very great interest to a considerable portion of the people of this city. I hope, therefore, the Senator will interpose no objection to its consideration.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to its consideration, but I certainly should like to have an explanation of the necessity of it, and why the corporation cannot be formed under the general law instead of a special bill. Why the necessity for a special bill? My own opinion is that nearly all provisions of unusual grants of power to corporations are dangerous, and that as a rule all such things should come under the general provisions on the subject. I ask the Senator whether or not the bill has been considered by a committee, and what committee? committee

Mr. INGALLS. The bill which is now before the Senate was passed unanimously by the House of Representatives at the last session. It was reported to the Senate and referred to the Committee on the District reported to the Senate and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, by whom it was very carefully considered and unanimously reported to the Senate on the 7th day of June last, and it has since remained upon the Calendar awaiting time for consideration.

Mr. COOPER. Will the Senator permit me to ask whether the committee examined the legal questions involved in the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that the bill has met with considerable opposition, and the legal questions were elaborately argued by Ex-Senator Carpenter and one or two other gentlemen, whose names I do not now recall, before the committee. They received very careful consideration, and it was the unanimous opinion of the committee that the bill was one that ought to pass.

Mr. COOPER. I made the inquiry simply because a similar bill was before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and that committee reached a different conclusion.

ommittee reached a different conclusion.

Mr. INGALLS. I regard it as the misfortune of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that it differed from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COOPER. It may be; but I thought I should let the Senate know that committees differed on the legal question.

Mr. INGALLS. In further response to the Senator from West Virginia, I will say that this is not an act creating a corporation, is not an act conferring any power whatever upon any association of individuals. It merely authorizes the District commissioners to build a an act contenting any power whatever upon any association of individuals. It merely authorizes the District commissioners to build a market-house on square 446 in this city. The commissioners purchased the tract of land upon which this building is proposed to be erected from W. W. Corcoran, esq., for this specific purpose. The ground is paid for. The foundations for the market-house have been partly completed; but owing to some matters, to which it is not necessary for me now to refer, the building was suspended.

The bill that is now under consideration before the Senate proposes, in brief, simply to prepare a plan and specification, and then to sell the right to occupy stalls to such persons as may wish to purchase, and from the funds that are thus obtained to build the markethouse. The bill expressly forbids the contracting of any debt upon the District, and provides that the funds for the construction of this building shall be obtained solely from the persons who desire to occupy stalls therein. Unless the funds are thus provided the building cannot be constructed. Therefore, as it is a matter that concerns these individuals who may themselves desire to purchase stalls, and unless they see fit to pay the money for the purchase of them the unless they see fit to pay the money for the purchase stains, and unless they see fit to pay the money for the purchase of them the construction will not take place, I can conceive of no reason why Congress should not authorize this proceeding to be had.

Mr. DAVIS. I inquire whether or not there is a report accompanying the bill made from either committee.

ing the bill made from either committee.

Mr. INGALLS. There is no written report.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Kansas says that the square has been purchased from Mr. Corcoran, by the city I presume, and paid for, by the city I presume, as the Senator says it is paid for.

Mr. INGALLS. For a market-house.

Mr. DAVIS. For the purposes of a market-house. Will the Senator be kind enough to tell us how much was paid and whether or not the property will revert to the benefit of any individual whatever, or whether it is solely to be managed by and for the benefit of the city of Washington?

Mr. INGALLS. It is solely to be managed by and for the benefit of the inhabitants of the city of Washington; and the terms of the bill provide that in addition to the payment of the structure that is bill provide that in addition to the payment of the structure that is bill provide that in addition to the payment of the structure that is proposed to be erected on these premises, there shall be a reservation that shall be sufficient to extinguish bonds outstanding that were given as purchase-money for the lot. It is exceedingly well guarded, I have never known a bill for any purpose which guarded the public so explicitly and so directly and carefully as this does. There is an absolute prohibition of the imposition of any burden whatever upon the people by reason of the construction of this building.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator, no doubt unintentionally, avoided two questions which I propounded. One is as to the amount that had been paid for this square. The other was whether or not any individual was connected with the bill by which that individual would receive a benefit that ought to go to the city.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not remember the amount that was paid for

Mr. INGALLS. I do not remember the amount that was paid for the property, but I believe it was $100,000. I am not sure; I do not state definitely. In response to the other question, I would state that there is no privilege or advantage given by which any individual will receive any benefit that properly belongs to the corporation.

Mr. DAVIS. Still the question is open. The Senator says that no individual will receive a benefit which properly belongs to the corporation. The Senator does not say, however, that ne individual will receive a benefit that the corporation might receive or ought to receive ceive.

Mr. INGALLS. That I do not know anything about.
Mr. MORRILL. I have not carefully examined this bill; but the same subject-matter was before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds at the last session, upon which an adverse report was made after carefully examining the question; and since that time I have understood that they had confided the measure to the Committee on the District of Columbia in the House, and from that committee this

So far as I now remember, the objections of the Committee on Publie Buildings and Grounds were of a twofold character. One was, that subsequently to the purchase of this square by the District from Mr. Corcoran a market had been built by private contributions on the part of the owners so near this location that no other market was required. Any one, by examining the square on which this is located and looking at two other markets, will see that this market is probably not located where it would be for the convenience of the District or the city of Washington. They will be too near together.

In the next place, this property cost the District about $120,000.

They paid for it some years ago, and gave their bonds for it, I think, to the amount of $100,000 or $106,000, and the interest upon those bonds to the amount of $100,000 or $106,000, and the interest upon those bonds makes it cost at the present moment somewhere about $120,000 to the District of Columbia. These bonds are outstanding against the District. It was thought by the committee that it was inexpedient for the District or for Congress to have any other partnerships with market-houses, with one of which we have heretofore been concerned which has resulted disastrously to the interests of this city, and perhaps not to the credit of the legislation or the judicial decisions in selection theorets. relation thereto.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds would have had no reluctance to allow these parties to purchase this square and put up a market-house thereon, provided they would have assumed the amount of the cost of this land as it stands against the District. Beyoud that they were unwilling to go.

The effect, I suppose, of this bill—for I have not had time to examine it since it came up—is to loan this company the amount of the money already invested for the cost of the land, and to trust to the success of the venture as to the future repayment. In my judgment, it is a bill that we may well pause before we take it up for consideration; in other words, I think the bill is unnecessary and inexpedient if it is based on the principles of the bill that has been heretofore considered by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the hill for consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. One remark made by the Senator from Vermont has disclosed the whole secret of the opposition to this measure. It springs from the hostility of a private corporation that, having invested its money in an unprofitable venture, is unwilling that the public should be accommodated if they themselves are willing to pay for that accommodation. He alludes to the fact that there is another that accommodation. He alludes to the fact that there is another market-house somewhere in the vicinity of the one proposed to be authorized to be erected by this bill. That is very true. What is known as the Northern Liberty Market House Company, or the K Street Market House Company, have erected, at an enormous expense, a palatial structure at the intersection of Fifth and K streets, upon grounds that belong to the District of Columbia. Owing to the fact that that building is remote from the centers of population, it is unfrequented; the stalls in that building are not merchantable; people do not congregate there to purchase their supplies: and therefore the venture up to this time has not been exceedingly remunerative. The venture up to this time has not been exceedingly remunerative. The owners of that property are naturally unwilling that there should be any structure erected in the neighborhood, either immediate or remote, that shall accommodate the people, if it still further interferes with their profits.

There is upon the ground proposed to be covered by this market-house already a miserable, inferior wooden structure, consisting of dilapidated sheds, in which the business of marketing is carried on; it is a fact that every day in the week when markets are open and it is a fact that every day in the week when markets are open for the transaction of business, there are three to one who resort to these wooden sheds upon this ground to those who resort to the pala-tial building at the intersection of K and Fifth streets. That is the only objection that exists to this bill, and it springs from the hostility of that private corporation, who are unwilling that the public shall

Now, with regard to loaning, as the Senator from Vermont says, the sum of $100,000 or $106,000 to this corporation, he says this bill proposes to loan these men the sum of $100,000 or $106,000 to enable them to put a market-house upon the lot that has thus been paid for. The fact is that that ground at the present time is lying idle so far as any revenue is concerned, so far as any compensation is concerned. This bill provides a measure by which not only will that ground be covered by a building, as contemplated by its original purchase, but that from the revenues derived from it a sinking fund shall be established that will liquidate the entire obligation that exists as purchase-money for the payment or these premises.

chase-money for the payment or these premises

what objection then can there be in any quarter to the passage of a bill like this? If there is any point in which the bill is not guarded; if there is any point that leaves the question open so that any obligation can be imposed upon the inhabitants of the District; if, as the Senator from Vermont says, there is any partnership proposed between Congress and the District and a market-house corporation, let it be pointed out, and I will certainly join him in striking it from the bill; but he certainly has not examined it and is not familiar with its provisions. There is nothing of the kind contemplated. On the convisions. There is nothing of the kind contemplated. On the contrary, this is a bill to enable these parties, at their own expense, to erect a structure from the profits of which a revenue will be derived that will relieve the community from the obligation that is now imposed upon them for the purchase-money of the ground.

Mr. MORRILL. Just a word.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF FLORIDA.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I gave notice last week that I would ask indulgence in the course of the present week to submit a few remarks on a memorial I introduced on the 18th instant in regard to the election in Florida

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make a motion ? Mr. JONES, of Florida. I move to proceed to the consideration of the memorial presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be regarded as before the Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, before I proceed to the consideration of the question which I propose to discuss this morning, I wish to make a few preliminary remarks in regard to what was said by the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] not now in his seat, in the debate on the 25th, in regard to my State. That Senator said:

in the debate on the 25th, in regard to my State. That Senator said:

Mr. Davis. I believe the Senator from California is chairman of a committee that recently visited Florida and I should like to ask him whether when investigating this subject there he let light in and had the doors open?

Mr. Sargent. There was nothing depending: we were merely taking evidence, not making a decision there. The minority of the committee was ably and zealously represented in the person of my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER.] Iadmit that under the exigencies of the case; I admit that in the community where, after it was decided that Drew, the democratic candidate for governor of the State, had been elected by I believe an unwarrantable action of the supreme court of that State, white men came to us and said "We no longer dare testify; please excuse us; our lives are in danger," and when colored men were afraid to come forward and we found difficulty in getting witnesses, then, in order to carry out the commission confided to us by the Senate, anticipating that result, we satwith closed doors for the mere purpose of taking evidence. We should have been very glad to have welcomed the Senator there or any one who perhaps would act exercise a bull-dozing influence on the witnesses we were trying to get.

This involves a very grave and serious imputation upon the character and condition of my State. When this declaration was made by the Senator from California I did not feel disposed to protract a debate which had carried us into the morning, by attempting to say anything upon the subject then; but it is due to myself as one of the representatives of the State of Florida on this floor, to the people whom I have the honor to represent here, and to Governor Drew, who now wields the executive authority of that State, to say something in the outset in regard to the opinion of the Senator from California, touching the state of society in Florida.

The condition of Florida has been somewhat different from that of nearly every southern State since the era of reconstruction began, and nearly every southern State since the era of reconstruction began, and I believe it has been universally conceded that we have enjoyed peace and tranquillity and order there to an extent that has not been surpassed in any northern community; and before I sit down I will show from the most unquestionable authority, and that republican, that the opinion of the Senator from California is not correct. I hold in my hand an executive document of the State of Florida. The government, as you know, has lately been transferred to democratic hands; but in 1874, while there was there a republican administration, a republican expired the government in a very well, temperated message. a republican cabinet, the governor, in a very well-tempered message, a very fair message, presented to the people of Florida and to the people of the United States the true condition of affairs in that Commonwealth, and I think what he said and what his cabinet ministers said, wealth, and I think what he said and what his cabinet ministers said, if such expression may be considered applicable to any person who belongs to the executive government of Florida, ought to have some weight. Now I will ask the Secretary of the Senate to read what I have marked in the report of the commissioner of immigration, Mr. Fagan, in 1874, touching the condition of affairs in Florida at that day, and which was addressed to the whole people of the Union inviting them to come there, because, as he said, they would be perfectly secure. I might say here that I feel more than a common anxiety on this subject, because we are indebted to northern immigration for a great deal of the prosperity which we now enjoy, and I am not disposed to stand here and hear anything said which will tend to keep from among us any of the good people of that section.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF SOCIETY HERE, AND ITS EFFECT ON IMMIGRATION.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF SOCIETY HERE, AND ITS EFFECT ON IMMIGRATION.

Among the many causes that have operated favorably in securing this large addition to our wealth and population, not the least potent has been the confidence that is universally felt that every man coming among us will be protected in life and property, and will not encounter that anarchy and disorder which have convulsed many of the other Southern States. There is nothing that has operated so disastronsly to the cause of southern immigration as the disorders that have grown out of the late war, and which, in some of our sister States, still distract society. Under such conditions progress is impossible. Wealth and population shun such places as plague-spots, and it is folly of an aggravated type to expect immigration to such sections. It is a matter for profound congratulation that, while the bitterest passions of prejudice and hate have held uncontrolled sway in other portions of the South, Florida reposes in absolute peace, and, forgetful of the past extends the right hand of friendship to all, and invites them ungrudgingly to share the honors, equally with the duties, of citizenship. The history of the late election furnishes a forcible proof of the restoration of that social peace and tranquility essential to the welfare of any State. While elsewhere race antipathies, section hatred, and violent political prejudices have manifested themselves in the most abhorrent forms of bloodshed and revolution, we enjoyed entire freedom from even the milder forms of disturbance, which seem inseparable from the exercise of the rights of suffrage in the most peaceable and best governed portions of our country. The race issue has not been mooted here, and its malignant influences, which seem to threaten the most dangerous consequences in Louisiana, Alabama, aloeorgia, have not been felt with us. We know nothing of White Leagues, or those numerous political organizations which flourish throughout the South, and the existence of which i

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That, Mr. President, is a description of the social and political condition of Florida in the year 1874 from republican authority of the very highest character. This is a State the social and political condition of Florida in the year 1874 from republican authority of the very highest character. This is a State paper; it is part of the report of the commissioner of immigration in my State, a cabinet officer, directed to his excellency the governor and referred to in the message of the governor of that year, which I have not now before me, and wherein sentiments equally strong and decided are set forth on the same subject, affirming the peaceful and orderly condition of the State.

So much, sir, for the political condition of Florida at that day. Now I need hardly say that nothing which has taken place since that period has changed the condition there. We enjoy a large immigration from the North. We are dependent in a great measure upon it for prosperity and wealth, and we are anxious that our reputation for peace and order and personal security shall remain as it has hitherto, unimpeached.

Now, sir, a word in regard to the distinguished gentleman who has lately been elevated to the office of governor, and I do this for the purpose of showing the temper and the honorable disposition of our people. When he was inaugurated into office he did not follow the example of some of his predecessors and indulge in a very lengthy discourse, but he set forth in a few brief words the principles which he said should govern him in his public office; and in this address he shows to the people of Florida what they all knew before, that there was no violent spirit there and there was nothing but an anxiety for just and good government, that there was no prejudice against northern men because in the person of Governor Drew we elevated to the high-est position in our State a man of northern birth and of Union pro-What does he say?

est position in our State a man of northern birth and of Union proclivities. What does he say?

Fellow-citizens, having taken the oath of office as prescribed by the constitution, I am about to enter upon the grave and responsible duties appertaining to the position of chief magistrate of the State of Florida.

The will of the people, as legally expressed at the ballot-box, has been enforced by the mandate of our highest judicial tribunal, and it must be a source of supreme gratification for every citizen to feel that, whatever results may flow from the excitements of political contests, he has the broad shield and protecting arm of an impartial judiciary as the final arbiter of his rights. And the quiet and entire submission of citizens of all parties to the decision of the supreme court is the surest guarantee that we are a law-abiding people, resolved to perpetuate free institutions, and to transmit to our posterity the blessings of constitutional government.

As the contest is over, let us hope that the animosities engendered thereby have died away, and that as your chosen executive I may be able to rise to the true and broad statesmanship of occupying the position of the governor of the State of Florida, and not the head of a political party. Our immense territorial dimensions demand a population commensurate with its capacity. Let us demonstrate by wise measures that our feelings and interests combine to generously invite an immigration that will promote this most desirable result.

Reflecting upon the past ouly as a guide for the future, let us endeavor to bring about an era of good feeling between all classes and build up the prosperity of Florida by the combined efforts of her entire population. A large portion of that population, recently enfranchised, have been tanght to feel solicitous of the continuance of their newly-acquired rights if the party of which I have been the honored candidate came into possession of our State government. Their fears are groundless, and our colored fellow-citizens may f

When I have received and considered the reports of the various heads of departments, I shall, in accordance with duty and usage, transmit them to the Legislature with such suggestions as I may deem appropriate. Then I can more appropriately refer to details affecting the political and material interests of the State.

Returning my heartfelt thanks to the people of the State of Florida for their confidence and support in elevating me to this position, and hoping that I may be able to meet all their just expectations, I ask their kind indulgence upon my administration of public affairs, and in my earnest efforts for their welfare and prosperity I invoke the assistance of an overruling Providence.

That is all that I deem it necessary to say in regard to Governor Drew, whose character and political antecedents are fully set forth here in his own strong language. But there is enough in that to show that our citizens are not the lawless, reckless people which some might be led to suppose by what was said here the other night by the distinguished Senator from California.

Now I have a word to say about the supreme court whose judgment has been alluded to in no complimentary terms. It is true, as Governor Drew says in his inaugural address, that the people are living under the security of the law, under the security of the courts, and that it ought to be a matter of pride to the citizens of the State that they are able to look up to their highest tribunal with pride and satisfaction. I say so, too, Mr. President; and it affords me extreme gratification to be able to say here that that court, composed as it is gratification to be able to say here that that court, composed as it is of republicans, at least a majority of them, have vindicated their character and have put themselves upon such high ground in the recent decision they have made, that no lawyer, no statesman, no intelligent citizen can impeach its exalted judgment. That decision will stand for what it is worth. It needs no support of mine. The principles of law which it sets forth, the facts upon which it is founded, will be scanned by the intelligent judgment of every intelligent citizen, and the people of this country, I thank God, are able to decide for themselves whether a thing is obviously wrong or obviously right. This decision carries in it the inherent evidence of its own correctness, which will appear from the slightest investigation by any man who feels interest enough to look into it.

Who are these judges whose judgment the honorable Senator from

by any man who feels interest enough to look into it.

Who are these judges whose judgment the honorable Senator from California says is unwarranted? I know them personally and professionally, and I say it here in the presence of the United States Senate, in the presence of the country, that three more high-minded, more capable men do not occupy public station in the United States to-day. I know that some think we cannot produce anything down there; that it is impossible to get an elevated judiciary; that it is hard to find a man with a good knowledge of the law or who is capable of deciding anything rightly: but, sir. I will put the supreme court of Florida in anything rightly; but, sir, I will put the supreme court of Florida in comparison with any other court of like character in the United States for ability and integrity, and it is due to the men who compose it and to the State to which they belong that I should say this here, because I know whereof I speak. They are republicans. What matters that to me? They are honorable men, who have ever enjoyed the confidence I be even free even more firmly their reputations, which cent decision establishes even more firmly their reputations, which were before pretty well founded. A gentleman originally from Wisconsin is the chief-justice, Mr. Randall, who came to our State after the reconstruction measures went into operation, a lawyer of high character, not unknown to many gentlemen on this floor, a man of very great ability. Another is Mr. Van Valkenburg, formerly a member of Congress from New York, not unknown to fame, who represented for search a resolution district in the other and of the Capital sented for years a republican district in the other end of the Capitol. The third is a man "to the manner born," J. D. Westcott, who has as pure a heart and as bright a mind as any man in the country. He is a son of Ex-Senator Westcott, formerly a Senator in Congress, and of whom it can be said, I believe, that since he went upon the judicial bench he has had nothing to do with the contests of party. These are the gentlemen who rendered this decision unanimously and gave an interpretation to the law of Florida which the Senator from California said was unwarranted.

Now I should like to ask how these judges could have decided otherwise than they did. In 1871 they had a case before them similar in principle to the one which they recently decided. There was not much said about it outside of the State, because it did not interest so much outsiders as the recent case; but then that same court was called upon to make a decision upon this very election law which has been the subject of interpretation within the last few weeks. Their decides in the property of the subject of the decision is here. The same court was then called upon to decide a case very similar to the one recently decided.

What was the occasion of that decision? The canvassing board as then constituted in a State election undertook to usurp judicail powers and did usurp them; for when they came to canvass the vote of the State for the office of lieutenant-governor they threw out the re-turns from eight counties and arrived at an unwarranted result. The defeated candidate appealed to the highest judicial tribunal in the State for relief, and the court made a decision in 1871 expounding the statute and defining the powers of the board. This was before the presidential contest now upon us. It was only a State election; and this decision was not heard of outside the State, I suppose; but here is what the court then said:

The object of the law is to ascertain the whole number of votes cast and who had received the highest number of such votes, so that the choice of the majority of the voters might be ascertained and respected. If the facts are correctly stated by the relator, the respondents neglected to perform this duty, and therefore did not comply with the law, in which case they did not conclude their duties as canvassers, nor put an end to their powers as canvassers by adjournment sine die. Their duties and functions are mainly ministerial, but are quasi-judicial so far as it is their duty to determine whether the papers received by them and purporting to be returns were in fact such, were gennine, intelligible, and substantially anthenicated as required by law; in other words, whether they contained within themselves evidence that they were authentic returns of the election. If, as is alleged, the respondents neglected to examine and include returns duly and legally made from several of the counties, and therefore but partially performed what they were required by law to do, it must be considered that they have not complied with the law, and that they may be required to do so by means of the process here invoked.—State ex rel. Bloxham vs. Board of Canvassers, Florida Reports, volume 15, page 73.

That is the language of the court, not in 1876 but in 1871, when there

That is the language of the court, not in 1876 but in 1871, when there That is the language of the court, not in 1876 but in 1871, when there was no presidential question to decide. It is the decision of the court on this very statute. What, I ask, would lawyers have had the supreme court to do when they were brought face to face with this same question in 1876? Was it to be expected that they should stultify themselves, go back upon their own record, and arrive at a different conclusion from what they did in 1871? O, no, Mr. President, the trust convent to expect from the supreme court of Februage. dent; that was too much to expect from the supreme court of Florida; and I am proud and happy to be able to say that it has vindicated its judicial character by pursuing an impartial course and re-affirming their former judgment.

I know this statute was amended after this decision was made; and so confident am I of the justice of the case which I represent here that I have no disposition to keep from full view this whole case in all its parts. After the decision was made the Legislature passed an act in 1872 amending the statute. They had this decision before them in which, as you have seen, the court held that those officers had no judicial power, that they were ministerial, and that they were confined in their duties to an examination of the returns and a declaration of the result of the election from an inspection of them.

How did the amendment affect the question?

How did the amendment affect the question? The Legislature amended the statute by the addition of a few words which did not have amended the statute by the addition of a few words which did not have the effect of changing in the slightest degree the character of the duties of these officers as prescribed by the judgment of the highest court in our State. If they meant to give the canvassing board judicial power, with this decision before them fixing their duties as ministerial officers, then was the time to do it. In 1871 this decision was made. In 1872 the amendment was enacted; and there is nothing in the amendment from which any man can infer that it was the intention of the Legislature to confer upon these men the extraordinary power that hear from which any man can thier that it was the intention of the Legislature to confer upon these men the extraordinary power that has been set up for them. The mere statement of this proposition is sufficient to show to any reasonable man that no such thing was ever proposed, no such thing was intended. The debates in the Legislature at the time show that it was not the intent or purpose to confer judicial authority, and they had before them at the time that amendment took place, staring them in the face, this judgment, which I have read, fixing and defining in the clearest possible terms the duties and the powers of this board.

Now, sir, for fear that I may do injustice to anybody in this discussion, I will here read the words of this amendment. I will first read the law as it stood at the time the decision which I have read was made, and then I will read it as it stood after the amendment of

On the thirty-fifth day after the holding of any general or special election for any State officer, member of the Legislature, or Representative in Congress, or sooner if the returns shall have been received from the several counties wherein elections shall have been held, the secretary of state, attorney-general, and comptroller of public accounts, or any two of them, tog-ther with any other member of the cabinet who may be designated by them, shall meet at the office of the secretary of state, pursuant to notice to be given by the secretary of state, and form a board of State can wassers, and proceed to canvass the returns of said election, and determine and declare who shall have been elected to any such office, or as such member, as shown by such returns.

That was the law in 1871, upon which the supreme court of Florida rendered this decision, stating as they did that it was a mere ministerial duty the canvassers had to perform; but in 1872 this provision was added:

Was added:

If any such returns shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration, and the secretary of state shall preserve and file in his office all such returns, together with such other documents and papers as may have been received by him or by said board of canvassers.

The said board shall make and sign a certificate containing, in words written at full length, the whole number of votes given for each office, the number of votes given for each person for each office, and for member of the Legislature, and therein declare the result; which certificate shall be recorded in the office of the secretary of state in a book to be kept for that purpose; and the secretary of state shall cause a certified copy of such certificate to be published once in one or more newspapers printed at the seat of government.

That is the law under which it is claimed that the canvassers That is the law under which it is claimed that the canvassers could exercise judicial powers, the denial of which authority the court has been blamed for by the honorable Senator from California. The supreme court in its recent decision re-affirmed, as I said awhile ago, the principle of its decision in 1871. If it had not done so it would not now be entitled to the respect of any lawyer or citizen in the country, because, if it had arrived at a different conclusion in 1876 from the one it reached in 1871, it would be pointed to as a political tribunal where the wrongs of persons could not find redress. It has, therefore, been consistent. The court in 1876, following its decision in 1871, said: in 1871, said:

While the general power of the board is thus limited to and by the returns, still as to these returns the statute provides that "if any such return shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent, that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration, and the secretary of state shall preserve and file in his office all such returns, together with such other documents and papers as may have been received by him or by said board of canvassers." The words "true vote" here indicate the vote actually cast, as distinct from the legal vote. This follows, first, from the clear general duty of the canvassers, which is to ascertain and certify "the votes given" for each person for each office; and second, because to determine whether a vote cast is a legal vote is beyond the power of this board. As to the words "irregular, false, and fraudulent" in this conection, their definition is not required by the questions raised by the pleadings in this case. These respondents have not alleged that they have before them any return "so irregular, false, or fraudulent;" that they are unable to determine the actual vote cast in any county as shown by the returns; and nothing can be clearer than that the counting of returns sufficiently regular to ascertain the whole number of votes given, and signing a certificate, are merely ministerial acts.

Is anything clearer?

Is anything clearer?

Under these pleadings the genuineness and regularity of the particular returns in question here are admitted. We will say, however, that the clear effect of this clause in the statute is that a return of the character named shall not be included in the determination and declaration of the board; and that it has power to determine the bona fide character of the returns dehors their face. It is not within the power of this board to refuse to count some of the votes embraced in a return and to count others embraced therein. They must count the whole of the return or must reject it in toto. We will also say that the powers here conferred are ministerial powers. It is true that in some respects these powers are something more than simple counting or computing, but they are powers which necessarily appertain to the discharge of every ministerial duty of this character. Their existence is no obstacle to the control of such officers by mandamus from a court having Jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

The court goes on to say that this view of the law is sustained by The court goes on to say that this view of the law is sustained by a series of decisions in this country which no lawyer can impugn. While I am at this part of the case I might refer to what Judge Cooley says in regard to this jurisdiction, and I find on looking into the notes that he cites a decision of the supreme court of California, which is not now in my hand, affirming the very jurisdiction that the court in Florida exercised in the case referred to. Judge Cooley says:

If the election is purely a local one, the inspectors who have had charge of the election canvass the votes and declare the result. If, on the other hand, their district is one precinct of a larger district, they make return in writing of the election over which they have presided to the proper board of the larger district; and if the election is for State officers, this district board will transmit the result of the district canvass to the proper State board, who will declare the general result. In all this the several boards act for the most part ministerially only—

The very language employed in the Florida decision-and are not vested with judicial powers to correct the errors and mistakes that may have occurred with any officer who preceded them in the performance of any duty connected with the election, or to pass upon any disputed fact which may

And in support of this principle he cites a number of authorities. Each board is to receive the returns transmitted to it, if in due form, as correct, and is to ascertain and declare the result as shown by such returns.

The language here in the text of Cooley is the very language that is employed in the Florida statute; they are to declare the result of the election from the returns before them, and the statute seems to have been framed in conformity with the text of Cooley's opinion on this subject:

Each board is to receive the returns transmitted to it, if in due form, as correct, and is to ascertain and declare the result as shown by such returns; and if other matters are introduced into the return than those which the law provides, they are to that extent unofficial, and such statements must be disregarded. If a district or State board of canvassers assumes to reject returns transmitted to it on other grounds than those appearing upon its face, or to declare persons elected who are not shown by the returns to have received the requisite plurality, it is usurping functions, and its conduct will be reprehensible, if not even criminal. The action of such boards is to be carefully confined to an examination of the papers before them, and a determination of the result therefrom, in the light of such facts of public notoriety connected with the election as every one takes notice of, and which may enable them to apply such ballots as are in any respect imperfect to the proper candidates or offices for which they are intended, provided the intent is sufficiently indicated by the ballot in connection with such facts, so that extraneous evidence is not necessary for this purpose. If canvassers refuse or neglect to perform their duty, they may be compelled by mandamus; though as these boards are created for a single purpose only.

That is his opinion, that they may be controlled by mandamus; and that is all that the supreme court of Florida in the case recently before it attempted to do, to exercise the very jurisdiction which is before it attempted to do, to exercise the very jurisdiction which is here stated, and which is supported by a number of authorities from other States of the Union. Will any man tell me that a judgment so obviously correct, in point of jurisdiction and upon the merits of the controversy, should be arraigned as unwarranted?

So much in regard to the law which controlled the action of this tribunal. And now, sir, a few words in regard to the facts of the case. The votes of the thirty-nine counties in Florida at the last election, according to the returns now on file in the office of the secretary of state were 24 440 democratic and 24 349 republican. I mean retary of state, were 24,440 democratic and 24,349 republican; I mean retary of state, were 24,440 democratic and 24,349 republican; I mean upon the electoral ticket. These include all the frauds said to have been committed in the various counties before the State canvass. This is the largest vote ever polled in the State, being 5,727 in excess of the republican vote of 1874 and 6,885 in excess of the democratic vote of the same year. It may be asked, why this great increase in the democratic vote since 1874? If it has increased 6,885, the republican vote has increased 5,727; but it is a matter of general notoriety that the tide of immigration into Florida since that time, and which is now going on I am bany to say is chiefly of white propulation and is now going on I am happy to say, is chiefly of white population, and the larger part of the increased democratic vote is from that population. The State canvassers changed this result on their first canvass, and made the vote to stand 23,849 republican and 22,923 democratic, throwing out over 2,000 votes actually east at the ballot-boxes, and thus creating an apparent majority for the republican ticket of 926. How this was done is shown by this table:

Counties.	Republican elector, Humphreys.			Democratic elector, Yonge,
	Vote.	Increased.	Decreased.	Vote.	Increased.	Decreased.

Mark you, sir, that this whole action is founded upon the conduct of the election officers, and upon the conduct of the election officers alone. The canvassers attempted to disfranchise over two thousand citizens of my State because of the manner in which the election officers discharged their duty.

I am not here to give my judgment upon this case, but to submit the facts in regard to it, but I must say that, in any point of view in which it can be regarded, you cannot uphold the judgment of the canvassing board which sustained the most flagrant frauds in Alachua Connty, where the returns were altered, and put aside democratic canvassing board which sustained the most flagrant frauds in Alachua County, where the returns were altered, and put aside democratic majorities because of the irregularities of the election officers, and republicans at that. It was not denied that the votes returned from said counties were honest and true. The objection went to the conduct of the election, and to that alone. I say here that every one of the objections urged against the returns from these counties, if made before a tribunal invested with power to pass upon them, could not for a moment be sustained by the principles of law as settled by the authorities. Judge Cooley has well stated the rule in such cases. Speaking of election laws, he says: Speaking of election laws, he says:

Their provisions designed merely for the information and guidance of the officers must be regarded as directory only, and the election will not be defeated by a failure to comply with them, providing the irregularity has not hindered any who were entitled from exercising the right of suffrage, or rendered doubtful the evidences from which the result was to be declared.—Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 617.

So that even if this board possessed the power which it claimed to exercise in this case, its judgment cannot be maintained by any man in view of the facts before it. But how much stronger does the case appear against these canvassers when we remember that they had no legal or rightful authority whatever to disregard a single return be-fore them from which the actual vote cast could be ascertained. There were no facts shown by the evidence to call for the exercise of judicial power, if the board had it; but there was no jurisdiction in judicial power, if the board had it; but there was no jurisdiction in the board to go behind the returns, even if they desired to deal with the case in a judicial way. So that it matters not what view may be taken of the proceedings of these men, they carry with them no validity. If they had judicial power, it was not general, but special, and their record must show upon its face that they had a case before them which justified the judgment which they gave. And while I am right here on this point, I wish to say a word in regard to the Louisians against way of illustrating ways into the Floridaese. siana case by way of illustrating my position touching the Florida case.

The opinion of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this body has been referred to heretofore for another purpose, but I will show from the report of that committee that in the view entertained by it the Louisiana board had no jurisdiction to act there unless all the requirements of the law had been complied with. What does it the requirements of the law had been complied with. What does it say?

The statute of Louisiana authorizes the supervisors of registration in the parishes, or the commissioners of election, to make affidavit in regard to any violence, tumult, fraud, or bribery by which a fair election has been prevented, which shall be forwarded to the returning board, along with the returns, and upon which the returning board may reject the vote of a poll in making the count; and if the evidence of the officers of the election is not sufficient to satisfy the minds of the returning board in regard to the matters charged, they are authorized to send for persons and papers and take further testimony upon the matter; but they have no authority to make such investigation unless the foundation is first laid by the sworn statements of the officers of the election, as before mentioned. The Lynch board, in making their count without having the sworn statements of the officers of the election to give them jurisdiction to investigate, received affidavits, the statements of supervisors of election appointed under the act of Congress, letters and verbal statements upon which they assumed the authority, in some cases, to reject the entervote of particular polls and wards, and in others to estimate and fix the vote at about what they supposed it ought to be from their knowledge of the political status of the parish or locality. The evidence submitted to the board, and which has been described to the committee, undoubtedly produced the conviction in their minds that the election had been an organized frand. Governor Warmoth, under the act of 1870, had the whole machinery of the election in his own hands. He had the appointment of the supervisors of registration in the different parishes, and they the appointment of commissioners of election, and those officers, with but few exceptions, were appointed from the ranks of those who were opposed to the republican party, and we think, from the informal evidence before the returning board and from

This was the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this body, stating that unless these statements, about which my friend from Missouri [Mr. Bogy] the other day said so much and said so well, are part of the returns, the returning board can take no action in the matter. It is without jurisdiction upon the principle here stated, that being a special tribunal it must have before it every fact necessary to give it power. This distinction between courts of special jurisdiction and courts of general jurisdiction is well established by Mr. Cooley, page 405:

The records of the one must show affirmatively that it had jurisdiction to render the particular decree, while the authority of the other is always implied from its recorded proceedings.

Now, sir, our law does not differ from the laws of every State of the Union on this subject. It prescribes ministerial powers for three sets of canvassers: first, the canvassers of the votes of the precinct, second, or canvassers: first, the canvassers of the votes of the precinct, second, the county canvassers, and thirdly, the State canvassers; and I will say here that the duties of each class of canvassers are prescribed in almost identical language. They have no authority to go behind the returns, no authority to inquire into the legality of votes, no authority to do anything but to ascertain the result of the election in the one case from the votes actually cast in their presence, and in the others from the returns that have been sent to them duly certified; so that under this law the authority of the inspectors is equally as great as that of the State board, and indeed it is far more important because the law takes the precaution of requiring precinct officers to take an oath to discharge their duty faithfully and impartially before they enter upon it, while in the case of the State canvassers no such they enter upon it, while in the case of the State canvassers no such obligation is required, and will any man say, after a review of this law, that the board of inspectors who are required under it to canvass the vote on the night of the election would dare to throw out a single vote that they found in the box, unless it was found under circumstances prescribed in the statute which might impeach its honesty and validity?

Even in the case of challenges over which the inspectors have jurisdiction, if the voter swears that he is authorized to vote under the laws of Florida, although the inspector may know that he is not thus qualified, he has no option to disregard his vote, but is bound to accept it and to include it in the return. And so it is with the county canvassers when they come to pass upon the returns from the various precincts in the county, they canvass the returns just as the inspectors do the votes; and they certify the result to the State board in a single certificate, in which they are not permitted to say whether this man or that man has been elected. O, no; but their very judgment is prescribed by the terms of this very particular and important law. They are not permitted to say in general language that this or that candidate has succeeded; but they are required, in the language of the statute, to write out in words at full length the whole number of votes cast or given for each person for each office, in order that the public, in order that the citizen may see from that record for himself who is the duly elected candidate. So it is with the State board. They are required in the very same language to declare the result in the State as the county returning officers are required to state the result in the county, from the whole number of returns before them, and to write out in words in full length—they are not permitted to laws of Florida, although the inspector may know that he is not thus and to write out in words in full length-they are not permitted to put them down in an ordinary way—but they must write in words at full length the whole number of votes actually given for each office and the persons for whom they were given; and this has been called judicial power. Why, sir, who ever heard of a statute undertaking to give judicial power, which is the right of unqualified decision, that to give judicial power, which is the right of unqualified decision, that prescribed for the judge the very nature and form of his judgment? Would it not be an insult to any tribunal to say to it when called upon to pass upon a case, "Here is the form of your judgment, here is the substance of your decree, here is the manner in which you must decide the case before you?" Is that the way the law gives judicial power? If it is, I must confess that my knowledge of judicial power is very different from that of other gentlemen who maintain that view. No, sir, when you give judicial power you give power to decide, according to the judicial function, in any manner that the principles of justice and equity may dictate. You are not to say to a tribunal that is vested with judicial power "Here is your judgment; it can under no circumstances be recorded in any other way." That is just what the statute does. It prescribes the judgment that the is just what the statute does. It prescribes the judgment that the board must give, and still there are gentlemen who entertain a notion that this is a great judicial power, and that the supreme court of Florida had no right to interfere with the exercise of this power by the State board.

But, sir, what does the constitution of Florida say on this subject? It says that all judicial power in the State shall be vested in four courts, which it designates; and it is a remarkable fact that at the time when the act of 1872 was passed the Legislature, in pursuance of the power conferred by the constitution, had vested all the judicial power of the State in the four courts that that instrument designated as the repositories of it; and this was one of the questions designated as the repositories of it; and this was one of the questions that was presented to the supreme court in the recent cases. It said, and said with great reason and force, the board had no judicial power for two reasons: First, that the Legislature did not have the judicial power to confer, because all the judicial power of the State vested in the government by the constitution had in 1868, when the government was re-organized, been transferred to the fon courts which the constitution designated to be the only repositories of it: the supreme court, the circuit courts, the county courts, and the justices of the peace. They had all the judicial power of the State, every bit of it. Hence the Legislature in 1872 had none to give these canvassing officers. That is a proposition that nobody can deny.

Then, sir, there was another difficulty even greater and graver than the one I have mentioned, in the way of giving this board any judicial authority. Who are the gentlemen that compose the canvassing

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose they had the power under the constitution, would the words used by the Legislature have conferred judicial power on that board in the Senator's judgment?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think not. Both views of the subject to take by the convergence court and they decide first that second are taken by the supreme court, and they decide, first, that according to a fair interpretation of the statute it was not the intention of the Legislature to confer judicial power, and, in the second place, that they could not have done so under the Constitution, because all judicial power had been conferred in the manner designated in the organic law. I was about to say that there was another and graver difficulty in the way of giving this board any judicial powers. Mark you, under the law they performed the duties assigned them ex officio, by virtue of their offices, the attorney-general, the secretary of state, the comptroller of public accounts. They are not, like the individuals named in the Louisiana law, persons required to do this thing. There the men are named, but here officers are named. Now who are these officers under the constitution of Florida? They compose a part of what is known there as the administrative department under the organic The powers of the government are divided up into executive, legislative, and judicial departments. Then they put on what they call an administrative department, something a little novel, and something that we were not very well able to bear at the time, but which we had to accept under the conditions that then existed. I say, sir, that the constitution of Florida defines in terms the duties of these officers, and then it was not competent for the Legislature, even if it had the power to do so, to superadd to the duties here given them any judicial function. Why?

There shall be a cabinet of administrative officers-

Says this organic law-consisting of a secretary of state, attorney-general, comptroller, surveyor-general, and superintendent of public instruction—who shall assist the governor in the performance of his duties.

What are the duties of the governor ? We know very well that the What are the duties of the governor? We know very well that the duties of a governor under all constitutions are purely executive, and that in the organic laws of nearly, if not every. State in the Union the powers of government are distributed between three departments, known as the executive, legislative, and judicial. In this very constitution it is furthermore declared that no person properly very constitution it is furthermore declared that no person properly belonging to the executive department shall exercise any duty or authority appertaining to either the legislative or judicial departments. Note the words "properly belonging." I will ask, then, what are the duties of these administrative officers under this organic law? They are put down here as aids to the governor, and the governor is the chief executive of the State. They are to assist him, and that is all, in the performance of his executive duties, and the constitution declares that no person thus situated under any circumstances can be called upon to perform judicial duties without violating the very law which gives existence to his office. How then, I ask, was it possible for the Legislature of Florida to confer upon these men judicial power when they had before them this constitution which tied their hands and their consciences by the oath required to uphold its provisions? Is it to be supposed that the members of the Legislature in 1868 and 1872, with the solemn obligation resting upon their souls, to obey this organic law, went to work when they organized the State government to disregard it in one of its most fundamental principles? I have more charity for the Legislature of that day than to raise such a presumption against their integrity and their ability. I will not presume that when they enacted this statute giving to those men the power to canvass the returns of elections they meant to violate this fundamental law.

The secretary of state

The constitution says-shall keep the records of official acts of the Legislature and executive department of the government, and shall when required, lay the same and all matters relative thereto before either branch of the Legislature, and shall be the custodian of the great seal of the State.

That is the constitutional duty prescribed by the constitution upon this officer. Then the constitution provides:

The attorney-general shall be the legal adviser of the governor and of each of the cabinet officers, and shall perform such other legal duties as the governor may direct or as may be provided by law. He shall be reporter for the supreme court.

These are the officers then upon whom the Legislature cast the duty of ascertaining the result of the late election from the returns before them; but, instead of undertaking to declare the result, they went to work to destroy the effect of over two thousand honest votes of the people under the assumption that they were judicial officers.

The election law of Florida prescribes the duties of the various canvassers in almost the same language. First, we have a section devoted to a canvass by the inspectors; second, a canvass by county officers; and, third, a canvass by the State board. And in each case a certificate is required to be given by each board in precisely the same language, which must contain a statement of the whole number of votes given for each office and the number of votes cast for each person for such office. Now it is a well-settled rule of construction, which I need not bring to the attention of legal gentlemen in this body, that the same words when found repeated in a statute should receive the same construction or interpretation unless it should clearly appear that it was not the intention of the Legislature to employ them in a uniform sense. So that we can readily understand what the Legislature meant by the word "canvass" when we look at the powers of the inspectors whose duties are indicated by this very term the same as those of the State board. It will be remembered that the inspectors in the various counties who are sworn officers are required at the close of the election to canvass the votes cast at such election, and certify the result to the county judge and clerk. What is the difference between the two? The one class of officers are required to canvass the votes cast, the other are required to canvass the votes given as shown by the returns before them, and the duty is devolved upon them in almost identical language. Still we are told that this State board, this self-erected judicial tribunal, was brought into being to refine away the votes of the people and may trample under foot the constitutional privileges of two thousand voters.

The inspectors at the election are the officers who receive the ballots from the voters and who decide all challenges. of Florida they have no authority to refuse a single ballot, and when a voter is challenged and takes the oath required, the inspector must receive his vote. What kind of a construction would it be to say that these officers who presided over the polls, and who have no power to reject votes during the progress of the election, may at its close and because they must canvass the votes cast disregard ballots which on the same day they were compelled to deposit in the box ?

The law says that if the challenged voter takes the oath his ballot must be received; and then it goes on to say that at the close of the election the officers who are thus required to receive them must canvass the votes just the same as the State board are required to canrass the returns of the counties, and the duty is put upon them in the same language in both cases.

the same language in both cases.

The power to reject returns cannot, any more than the power to reject votes, be derived from the right to canvass. The canvass by the State board does not differ in principle from the canvass by the inspectors and county officers. The duty is a purely ministerial one when exercised by either of the three classes of canvassers, and is governed by the same principles. The statute leaves nothing to the discretion of these officers. The canvass by the inspectors must be public. This is to secure a compliance with the law, and if an attempt was made to defeat the will of the people by throwing out any of the ballots found in the box, a remedy could be found in the courts to prevent the wrong. But suppose the inspectors, contrary to their duty, had not counted all the votes cast and gave a certificate based upon a canvass of only half of the ballots? Would there be no redress for such a violation of law? There is not a lawyer in the land who would say that the judicial authority was not competent to give who would say that the judicial authority was not competent to give relief in such a case. And what would such a certificate be worth? It would be utterly void and of no effect. It is only when an officer follows the law that his acts are legal. When he violates it he is a wrong-doer and nobody is bound by his action.

Then look at the duties of the county canvassers. They are required to canvass the precinct returns on the sixth day after the election and to declare from these returns the number of votes given for each office and the persons for whom they were given. They make and sign certificates in duplicate and send them to the secretary of state and the governor of the State.

Here I want to draw the attention of the Senate to a very important point. It will not be affirmed, I suppose, by any Senator that this county board, composed of the clerk, the sheriff, and the county judge, has any judicial authority. Their duty and authority are conferred in precisely the same language as the authority of the final canvassing board and they are required to make the county can be a senated as a senated and they are required to make the county can be senated. ing board, and they are required to make the county canvass on the sixth day after the election, and the State board is required to make the canvass on the thirty-fifth day. If the law intended to give any other or different kind of duty to the State canvassing board than that given to the county board, is it not reasonable to suppose that they would have enlarged the time for the performance of that duty? On the thirty-fifth day after the election the State board is required.

to canvass the county returns, and declare from them who has been elected to any office, and to state the whole number of votes given for each office and the number given for each person for each office. The very same time is fixed by the law for the performance of the duties assigned to the State board that is prescribed for the performance of the duties of the county canvassers, a single day. If the Legislature intended that the State board should exercise judicial powers, hear evidence and arguments touching the legality of the powers, near evidence and arguments touching the legality of the election, the rights of voters, and the duty of officers, it would certainly have made use of different language in regard to the time to be employed for that purpose than it did in reference to the time allotted to the county canvassers. But the law in both cases clearly implies that the duties of both boards may be performed in a single day. We know as a matter of fact that when the board in Florida first entered upon the discharge of judicial functions it took more than a single day to arrive at the conclusion that it did.

It must clearly appear from this view of the law that the duties of the State board were purely ministerial—to canvass the county returns, and state from them the whole number of votes given for each office. This they did not do. We have seen that by the first canvass a majority of 926 was declared for the Hayes electors, and have explained how this was done. The subsequent canvass, made by order of the supreme court, reduced this majority to 206, and gave the State ticket to the democrats.

The proceeding in which this order originated was instituted by George F. Drew, the democratic candidate for governor. The judgment of the court directed the canvassers to canvass and count all the returns on file before them for the office of governor. said about any other office. How came the canvassers to intermeddle with the previous determination in regard to the electoral vote? They were not commanded to do so by the court. If Governor Hayes had 926 majority, why was it not permitted to stand? Why change it to 206? The order of the court only required the canvass to show who had the highest number of votes for the office of governor. Ah, Mr. President, the purpose is too plain. If ever there was any doubt about the unfairness of this business, a scrutiny of this part of the transaction ought to remove it. The first canvass gave the honest vote of Baker and Clay Counties to Samuel J. Tilden, for whom it was intended by the people. The canvass demanded by Mr. Drew related to the counties of Manatee, Jackson, Monroe, and Hamilton, the returns from which had been changed by the board in order to create the majority of 926. If these returns were recanvassed and counted for the office of governor alone, it would have established beyond doubt the right of the Tilden electors to the votes rejected, which, added to the majorities in the other counties, would have shown conclusively that Governor Hayes had lost the State. The board knew that the court would compel them to count the returns from these counties for Drew, and when thus counted the Tilden majorities previously rejected would in law and conscience rise up and claim recognition. Clay and Baker Counties were not in dispute. Why were the returns from them, which at the first canvass were conceded to Drew and Tilden, under an order issued in the interest of Drew alone, recanvassed and the rightful majorities in both taken away from Tilden, who was not before the court and whose interests and rights ought not to have been affected by a proceeding to which he was not a party? Here is the judgment of the court:

was not a party? Here is the judgment of the court:

This day came the parties by their attorneys; and thereupon, the matters of law arising upon the relator's demurrer to the answers, original and amended, of the respondents, being argued, it seems to the court that the said answers and the matter therein contained are not a sufficient answer in law to the alternative writ issued herein, and that said return is insufficient. Therefore it is considered that a peremptory writ be awarded directed to the said Samuel B. McLin, secretary of state; William Archer Cocke, attorney-general; and Clayton A. Cowgill, comptroller, board of canvassers of elections of the State of Florida, commanding them that they forthwith meet and convene and re-assemble as a board of State canvassers in the office of the secretary of state, to canvass and count all the election returns on file in the said office of the secretary of state, of the said election for the office of governor, held on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, and that as such board of State canvassers they canvass and count the returns for said office from each and every of the counties of this State wherein an election was held for said office; and especially that they do canvass and count the neutrum for said office from each said counties of Jackson, Hamilton, Manatee, and Monroe, and that they determine from a canvass and count and examination and tabulation of all the votes east for the said office of governor at said election received at the office of the State, as shown by the election returns of said election received at the office of the State, as shown by the election returns of said election for povernor, as shown by the said returns, and that they do, as such board, make and sign a certificate, as required by law, containing in words and figures written at full length the whole number of rotes given at said election, as shown by said returns for the said office of governor of the State of Florida, and the number of votes given for each person voted for fo

It appears from this judgment that the command to those canvassers was to canvass the returns from all the counties in the State for the office of governor, and for the office of governor alone.

Under this judgment, the canvassers had nothing to do with the electoral vote. They were tied to a naked compliance with the order requiring them to canvass the returns for the office of governer. The legality of the recanvass resulted from the judgment of the supreme court, which commanded it in the interest of the suitor who invoked its jurisdiction. The court had no power to compel or the board to allow the proceedings to go beyond the case made by the pleadings. And how does this case stand before the country? The votes given for Drew and the presidential electors were first canvassed by the state heard indiciably. Democratic maintains in four country were State board judicially. Democratic majorities in four counties were reversed or thrown out by the board, which gave the State and electoral tickets to the republicans. Clay and Baker Counties were counted for the democrats. Drew appealed to the supreme court and obtained a writ of mandamus to compel the canvassers to recanvass and count the returns from the four counties for the office of governor. The writ issued and directed a recanvass. The majorities for the demo-crats in the rejected returns added to those conceded in the first canvass would show a majority of votes for both Tilden and Drew. The board, instead of confining its action to a recanvass of the returns for governor, went on and recanvassed the returns for electors. It gave to Tilden the benefit of the majorities in the four counties the can-vass of whose returns was alone prayed for by Drew. It took away from Tilden his majorities in Clay and Baker Counties, which were conceded in the first canvass, under a judgment directing a recanvass of the entire vote of the State in favor of Drew; and it did this for of the entire vote of the State in lavor of Dew; and it did this for the express purpose of preventing the judgment of the supreme court of Florida, based as it was upon law and justice, which gave Drew his office, from being set up as a precedent in behalf of the Tilden electors, who had been deprived of their rights by them.

Yes, Mr. President, Clay and Baker Counties were in the first canvass counted for the democratic tickets, both State and national, and both showed majorities for those tickets. The returns from four other counties were thrown out. When the canvassers were required to recanvass the returns from the four rejected counties, instead of following the mandate of the supreme court they went and took up the returns from Clay and Baker that they had previously counted in favor of the democratic tickets, and, while including the others for Tilden and Drew, threw out the returns from Baker and Clay.

But, Mr. President, what shall we say of the reasons which were assigned by the board for reversing their first decision in regard to the returns from Clay and Baker Counties? It will be remembered that the true return from Baker County was signed only by the clerk of the circuit court and a justice of the peace, for the reason that the county judge refused to attend the canvass at the clerk's office as the law required him to do. This return was based upon a canvass of the four precinct returns, all that were in the county, and showed 143 votes for Hayes and 238 for Tilden. The county judge's return, which the board rejected at the first canvass as fraudulent and which they accepted at the last canvass as true and honest, was based upon only two of the precinct returns, and showed 89 votes for Tilden and 130 for Hayes

These officers knew positively that the county returns which they accepted as true at the last canvass did not embrace the full vote of Baker County, and that two precinct returns had been omitted from the county judge's return. But the objection to the clerk's return was that it was not signed by the county judge, who refused to attend the canvass. But, sir, the republican county of Duval sent up its returns in the same way as that of the rejected return from Baker, is reduced to the results in the same way as that of the rejected return from Baker, its returns in the same way as that of the rejected return from Baker, signed only by the clerk and a justice of the peace. The democrats objected to that return because the judge had been unlawfully excluded from the canvass; but the board sustained the return because it gave 941 majority to the republican ticket.

Here was a fair test of impartiality and justice and right. Here were two returns coming before this board executed in the same way, we with a democratic painting and the other with a resulting resulting and the same way.

one with a democratic majority and the other with a republican majority; the one executed by a clerk and a justice of the peace in favor of the democrats, the other executed by a clerk and a justice of the peace in favor of the republicans. When they came to the democratic return they rejected it because the return was not valid. When they came to the other they accepted it as in every respect unobjectionable. It must appear that the action of the board was partial and par-

I say this for there could be no other reason when you reflect upon I say this for there could be no other reason when you reflect upon the ground assigned for the rejection of the clerk's return from Baker with its democratic majority. And then look to the reasons given for the rejection of the entire vote of Clay County. On the second canvass the board, you will remember, pretended to act ministerially under the order of the court. At the first canvass the returns from Clay County were accepted and the precinct vote, which was rejected by the county canvassers for technical reasons, was counted. The vote stood 122 for Hayes, 287 for Tilden.

These figures cannot be denied. It seems that when the county board came to canvass the returns from the various precincts in the county they found that the return from one of them was irregular.

county they found that the return from one of them was irregular. It did not appear upon the face of the papers that the inspectors had taken the oath required by the law to be taken. The consequence was that they rejected the vote from that one precinct, but as honest men, anxious to do their full duty and not desirous to commit any fraud upon the rights of the people, while they rejected this return, they certified the reason of their action to the State board. They said, "Here is this honest vote of this district which was returned by us. We cannot include it in our consolidated certificate because we do not find that the oath required by law had been taken by the inspectors, but we are satisfied that the vote was an honest one, and we return it in this way, that the board may decide whether we exceeded our authority or not." This was the position taken by the county canvassing officers with respect to the vote or the return from Clay County. The State board at that time, in the exercise of ap-parent liberality and justice, felt the force of this argument and ex-amined, I suppose, the law and found that the canvassing board below acted erroneously, and they included this return in the vote of Clay County and proclaimed a majority in accordance with that return. The vote was, as I have stated, 122 for Hayes and 287 for Tilden. This appears from their first canvass. No one attempted to impeach the honesty of this vote. Still the vote of the entire county was thrown out on the second canvass, and for what? This will furnish the key to the whole case. Why was the vote from the whole counth thrown out on the recanvass when these same officers were acting under the order of the court? Had anything happened in the mean time to change the character of the case? Was not the recanvass directly under the order of the court and did not the canvassers have the same facts before them? The men who performed this duty were conversent with the law; they had investigated the case; they had rendered their judgment; but now they proposed to reverse it and deprive the people of Clay County of their vote.

Mr. President, it was said of a judge in England, who went to the West Indies in the days of Lord Ellenborough, that his judgments were universally sustained so long as he did not assign any reasons for them. When he went to that distant colony he was in the habit of entering up very short indements without reasons; but after a little of entering up very short judgments without reasons; but after a little while he became more confident of his superior knowledge of the law, and he began to write out his opinions; and as soon as they began to appeal from the colonial courts to Westminster Hall whenever his judgments got there they were generally reversed, not so much for the inherent error of the judgments as on account of the reasons that had been assigned for them. This judgment should be reversed on account of the reasons assigned for it, laying aside the abstract justice of the case, which it clearly violates.

No one attempted to impeach the honesty of this vote. Still, sir, the vote of the entire county was thrown out on the second canvass. And for what \(^{\frac{1}{2}}\) Sir, I dislike to pursue this subject; it gives me no pleasure to follow the devious path of concerted wrong. The return from Clay County was rejected by the board for the reason that it was false and fraudulent, as the county canvassers had omitted in their consolidated certificate the return from one precinct with 23 demo-consolidated certificate the return from one precinct with 23 democratic majority, I think.

Mark the amendment of the election law passed by the Legislature in 1872, upon which the supreme court in the case recently decided gave its opinion that, when any return shall appear to be so false, fraudulent, or irregular that the true state of the vote cannot be ascertained, such return shall not be included in their determination, but shall be put aside. When the board came to Clay County on the second canvass, they, with the full knowledge of all the facts that were certified before them by the local officers, showing no case of fraud whatever, but a mere mistaken judgment, pronounced that return false and fraudulent within the meaning of the amendment of return false and fraudulent within the meaning of the amendment of the statute of 1872. There was no falsity or fraud about it. It was a case of three men who were honestly mistaken in regard to their powers. They did not find a copy of the oath in the papers, but they certify the fact to the State board and invite its impartial and honest judgment, and that board, when called upon to advise and to instruct these officers, pronounced that act to be fraudulent and void which did not have in it a single element of fraud. What is fraud? The law very wisely refuses to define it. Why? Because the indications of fraud cannot escape the perception of man. It is that which every man can detect when he sees it. Everything was open, everything was fair that was done by the county canvassers, and the State board so decided on the first canvass, but on the second omitted this return because it was false and fraudulent. They held that the failure to return one precinct justified the disfranchisement of the county, with a majority of 105 for Tilden, as before stated.

Now, these gentlemen accepted a false return from Baker County which omitted the returns from two precincts and thus made to show

You will remember the history I gave of Baker in the first instance.

When the returns from this county were first presented to the board the clerk's return was received as the honest one, because it embodied the full vote of the county. The board knew there were four vot-ing-places in the county. The clerk canvassed the vote at his office at the time fixed by law and sent to the State board a certificate showing the result. The sheriff and the judge met away from the court-house and canvassed the vote of two precincts in the county in violation of the law, and certified both in favor of Governor Hayes and the republican ticket. In the first canvass this return of the judge and sheriff was pronounced fraudulent and void, because it did not contain the whole vote of Baker County as shown by the precincts' returns.

It was not like the case of Clay, where the inspectors sent up the certificate, showing that they did not include the whole vote in their return because of a misconception in regard to law; but in this case the true precinct returns were intentionally omitted by the judge and the sheriff, and on the first canvass their return was rejected by the canvassing board. On the second canvass in the mandamus proceeding, strange to say, they were adopted as the true return, and the return first pronounced to be valid was rejected, although it was positively known that the clerk's return embodied the full vote of that county. Now, I say if it was competent for the board to reject the return of Clay County because it did not contain a consolidation of all the precinct returns in the county, why was it that the return from Baker County was accepted when it was positively known to the canvassing officers that that return, the last accepted, did not contain all the returns of the precincts in the county? Minds not even skilled in the business of investigation can see at a glance the purpose of all this unfairness and inconsistency.

I have shown the law and constitution of Florida as they bear

I have shown the law and constitution of Florida as they bear upon the subject of elections. I have stated the facts connected with the rejection of the returns by the State canvassers, as I have learned them from the most authentic sources. Under the law, the canvassers had a simple ministerial duty to perform. They were empowered to examine the consolidated returns sent by the county canvassers and to declare from them, and them alone, what persons had received the highest number of votes for the several offices which the people intended to fill at the election. They were required most positively to state the whole, not a part, of the votes given for each office, and the whole number of votes given for each person voted for. They were not even permitted to do this in a general way by saying that this man or that man was duly elected; but the statute required them to put down in figures, written at full length, the exact state of the vote as it appeared from the returns, so that every citizen of the State might see the precise grounds upon which the declared majority was founded. And for fear that any one might suppose that the law intended to confide in the least to the judgment or integrity of the canvassers the secretary of state was required to or integrity of the canvassers the secretary of state was required to record in his office a full statement of the votes shown by the returns and ascertained by the canvassers in the manner pointed out by the statute. Can it be seriously contended that a law thus precise and careful, not only in prescribing the duties of these men but in pointing out the exact manner in which they shall be performed, intended to confer upon them an arbitrary, unlimited power, in every respect at war and inconsistent with the painfully explicit duties which it prescribed? If it be claimed that these canvassers, in the exercise of judicial power, could go behind the county returns to the precinct returns and behind the latter to the election at the polls and from the election pass on to the registration which preceded it, it is fair to ask how and in what manner has this authority been conferred?

Is there any law except the single one alluded to which creates the board and all its powers that can be pointed to as the source of it? Not one. Can the power be implied from the nature of the functions and duties, as I have already shown, imposed upon the board? We know that these functions and duties according to the understanding of the legal profession and the usages and practice of the whole country are in their nature ministerial, and it would be absurd to claim that judicial power, or discretionary power of any kind, can result by implication from an authority strictly ministerial. You might as well say that a part is greater than the whole, as to contend that a person who is invested with a limited power, which he must exercise in a particular way, may disregard the statute which con-fers it, set himself above the source of his authority, and by inference and implication extend the range of his duties to the utmost limits of his own discretion.

The State canvassers under the Florida statute are tied down to a simple examination and consolidation of the returns sent them by county canvassers just as much as the latter are to the returns which they receive from the inspectors of the election. Each class of officers have distinct and co-equal powers. They are not to review, by appeal or otherwise, the action or proceedings of each other. The county canvassers cannot set aside the work of the inspectors. The duties and powers of the latter extend only to the polls at which they preside; but as far as they do go they are binding upon the can-vassers of the county, whose duties begin where the others end. As there are several polls and sets of inspectors in each county, there must be a common organ within such district to consolidate and communicate to the State authorities the vote of the county. The reason of this is obvious. All commissions emanate from the executive of the State. Each county is for many purposes a distinct political organism. Officers in nearly all the States are elected at general elections whose duties and powers are confined to each county. These are called county officers. They are selected by the people of each county, acting separately and distinctly from the people of

Then there are, as we know, another class of officers usually elected at the same time and places, whose duties and powers are co-extensive with the whole State. These are likewise commissoned by the I believe it is only customary and usual to send the county governor. I believe it is only customary and usual to send the county returns to the seat of government when commissions are required to be issued by the governor. But in some cases no such commissions issue, and the local officers' rights are determined by the result of the county election as declared by the county board. This is the case with constables under the Floridalaw. The clerk of the circuit court issues to them certificates of election. The county canvassers' work is conclusive as far as it respects them. It will be remembered that we only elect members of the Legislature and constables under our Floridalaw. All the other officers in the State are appropried by the Florida law. All the other officers in the State are appointed by the authority of the executive. I shall not raise the question of the wisdom of the constitution; but that is the kind of an instrument we

Now, the county canvassers' authority only extends to the county, and as regards State officers whose election depends upon the votes of all the counties, it is proper that the returns of the votes for such officers should be canvassed by officers whose authority is as broad as the limits of the State. Still there is not the slightest difference between the nature and extent of the powers of the two boards, State and county. The one is confined to a smaller district than the other. The county. The one is confined to a smaller district than the other. The county canvassers perform precisely the same duties with respect to the precinct returns which the State canvassers perform in regard to the county returns, and for the same reasons, the want of authority in the local officers to exercise any functions or powers touching the rights of persons residing outside of their counties. It must be plain that the acts of each class of officers are absolutely conclusive and binding upon the other when performed in accordance with the statutes, and he who affirms that the State board has judicial power to go behind the county returns and review the proceedings of the county boards must concede the like power to the latter over the precinct returns, because the duties assigned to each are prescribed in the same language. Such a construction of the statute would defeat the plainest provisions of the law. The inspectors of the election receive the votes and decide challenges. They perform their duties under a solemn oath. The county canvassers are not sworn, but canvass the returns ex officio.

Says the law; and this is a very important article-who shall receive the highest number of votes cast for any office shall be elected to such office.

It does not say that the canvassing board shall declare that. This follows as a legal inference irresistibly from the law. The canvassing board is required to ascertain from the returns who has the highest number of votes actually cast.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to state that that is just what the constitution and laws say in reference to Oregon. I should like to know what the Senator thinks of that.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I have no complaint to make with regard to the Oregon law.

to the Oregon law.

Mr. MITCHELL. Has the Senator any complaint of the action of the executive of Oregon under that law?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I not do think that is pertinent to this question. I may be called to pass upon that case hereafter, and if I am I shall not hesitate to give my opinion.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is pertinent.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am not discussing that question, and I have not bestowed upon it the same thought that I have upon that of Florida.

But how can this be, if two men five hundred miles off have the power to undo what was done at the polls, and say that the person who received the lowest number of votes cast is elected? Who can reconcile the positive provisions of the law which gives the election to the person who has the highest number of votes with a discretionary power on the part of the election officers to reject any votes they ary power on the part of the election officers to reject any votes they please and thus give the election to a minority candidate? Can it be claimed for a moment that the law in providing means to communicate the result at the polls to the seat of government intended to put it in the power of any man to defeat at will the voice of the people? Is it not the object of the law to carry forward from the polls to the State board the several results as indicated by the ballots received under all the restrictions and safeguards which the Legislature thought proper to prescribe? Are we to suppose that the statute, while it states with great exactness the conditions upon which the votes shall be cast and the power of the inspectors over them, meant to give to another class of officers, whose duties in no way relate to the receipt or counting of the ballots, an implied or undefined power to trample alike upon the rights of the voters and the actions of the inspectors? It is as clear as anything can be, that the inspect of the inspectors? It is as clear as anything can be, that the inspectors of the election, and they alone, are charged with the duty of seeing that part of the law carried out which prescribes the conditions under which all votes shall be cast. And it is equally clear that all votes thus cast must be considered by all officers connected with the election as the only avidence which and deads the clear of the see election as the only evidence which can decide the choice of the peo-

The duty and powers of the canvassers are intended to give effect to the votes actually cast. No system of laws worthy the name ever gave to such a board the power to revise or pass judgment upon votes of the people.

Says Judge Cooley-

shall not be deprived of the privilege by the action of the authorities, is a fundamental principle.

And what, I ask, is the difference between depriving a person of the right to vote and throwing out his ballot after he has polled it? That cannot be called an election-

Says the same high authority-where a part of the electors have been allowed to be heard and the others, without being guilty of fraud or negligence, have been excluded.

Apply these principles to the action of the Florida canvassers and you cannot uphold their proceedings. In nearly every instance they selected the returns from one or more precincts and, for reasons in no way impeaching the rights or conduct of the voters, arbitrarily rejected them. What had the honest voters in Hamilton County, whom the board disfranchised, to do with the indiscretions of the two republican inspectors who left the polls for a time in order, as it appears, to make their own conduct a ground for defrauding the people?

Is there a tribunal on earth or a man with the smallest sense of right and justice that would say that four hundred citizens ought to be deprived of their votes because these officers adjourned to take a drink or for any reason neglected their duties? Is this the way to guard the purity and integrity of the ballot? What hope can you have or can any man have for the success of free institutions if it is left in the power of men like these to defeat, by the shallowest trick, the voice of the people. What kind of justice is it to say that the officers appointed to take the sense of the public may discriminate against those whose voice they wish to stifle; select the number and kind of votes that will serve a party end and disregard all others; take away from the majority its majesty and power; set up the few against the many, and with brazen effrontery tell the people that, as their consciences are insensible to sting of shame, their acts and persons are secure through the moderation of our laws and the temper of public opinion?

Over two thousand honest voters of my State who complied with all the requirements of the law in casting their ballots, against whom no charge or even suspicion of crime or fraud was directed, were, by the injustice of this self-constituted board, deprived of the most sacred rights that belong to an American citizen. And this, too, without rights that belong to an American citizen. And this, too, without trial or defense; for, while each of these voters was robbed of one of his highest privileges by the judgment of this board, not one of them had an opportunity of being heard in opposition to the iniquitous proceedings. And yet there are lawyers who dignify the action of these men with the title of judicial judgment.

What is judicial judgment? As I said a while ago it is a judgment which proceeds after notice, and always gives the person whose rights are affected by it an opportunity to be heard. Not one of the voters in my State whose rights were trampled upon had that opportunity before the State board. It is true there were counsel there representing candidates; but the great question was whether the individual voter should have the right to have his ballot counted for the candidate for whom he voted.

date for whom he voted.

I have heard that this board had judicial power. I deny it. They get their authority from an act of the Degislature, and the Legislature had no judicial power to give them. When the people of Florida adopted their constitution, I presume they read it. At least its provisions were intended to be read. I have always heard that it was a cheat and a snare, and if the view taken by some of the powers of this board is true, it certainly is. Article 7 creates the offices of secretary of state, attorney-general, and comptroller, and specifies their duties. (See art.) duties. (See art.)

The one which precedes it vests the whole judicial power of the State in four courts which it specifies, and did not leave a particle of such power to the administrative officers.

These officers by the very words of the constitution are aids of the governor. The latter is intrusted solely with executive duties, and hence the duties of his aids must be of a like character on the same principle that the stream cannot rise above its source.

Then, sir, we have another very important provision in this constitution:

The powers of the government of the State of Florida shall be divided into three departments: legislative, executive, and judicial; and no person properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others.

Now, I say, sir, that it would be doing violence to the words of this election law to give it a construction which would make it unconsti-

When you say that these officers may exercise judicial power although they are appointed as aids to the executive and form his cabinet, you fly in the very face of the constitution, which, for its own wise purposes, has placed all judicial power in other hands. And is not the wisdom of this provision vindicated by what we see in Florida to-day? At the late election the governor was a candidate for re-election. All the officers who controlled it were subject to his cover and under their authority it was conducted. The returns for re-election. All the officers who controlled it were subject to his power, and under their authority it was conducted. The returns which they sent to the seat of government were their own work. Every single certificate from the thirty-nine counties in the State to the State board was a solemn admission made against the interests of the parties making it that the democrats had honestly carried the State. Does anybody doubt that these local officers while discharging their public duties did all in their power to advance the interests of the party to which they belonged? Fortunately for the cause of right and justice, the importance of the election was not foreseer; for if it had been the work which has been so clumsily done at Talla. if it had been, the work which has been so clumsily done at Talla-

But to the question of power in the board. The returns, which as I said were all made up by men of the republican party, although covering huge frauds, were all regular on their face. That they presented the largest vote ever given in the State is admitted; but still, according to the face of these papers, the majority was in favor of the democratic ticket. The influence of the State and Federal administrations was felt throughout the canvass. Every officeholder of both governments yied with each other in their efforts to being sucboth governments vied with each other in their efforts to bring success to their party.

But I mean to show the wisdom of the constitution in denying judicial powers to the State board.

The inspectors and county canvassers, not having the benefit of any light from abroad, followed the law and performed their duties ministerially. They sent forward their returns to the capital, and I am credibly informed that these returns, tested by every rule of law applicable to the subject, did not present the slightest difficulty to a fair and just declaration of the result of the election.

It is true there were two returns from one county, (Baker,) and I admit that the board had to decide between them, and, in order to do so intelligently and justly had a right to look into the facts which so intelligently and justly, had a right to look into the facts which gave rise to these double returns. But this case was plain and simple. The judge of the county refused to meet the clerk of the county at his office at the time fixed by law to canvass the precinct returns. Time and place are matters material in elections. The law required the canvass to be made from the returns in the clerk's office. It could be made in no other way. The clerk called to his aid a justice of the peace; made up the canvass from all the precinct returns in his office, and sent the certificates to the secretary of state. The judge evidently in pursuance of a bad purpose canvassed the returns from two out of four precincts, according to the duplicate certificates in his possession. This was done away from the clerk's office and in a private way. The clerk's return gave a majority to Tilden. The judge's, a majority to Hayes. The State board accepted the clerk's rejudges, a majority to Hayes. The State board accepted the clerk's return as the true one. But after this began the judicial labors of the board. I have stated that the members of the board are by the constitution the cabinet of the governor; that the governor was a candidate for re-election, and upon the decision of these ministers delatitle for re-election, and upon the decision of these limiters depended the future power of his excellency.

Is it possible, sir, that in a case so vitally important to the rights of the people, so open to the operations of intrigue, the power of continuing their own master, at least their patron, it may be themselves, in authority and station has been devolved upon the will and pleasure of this board. Why, no such argument as this can be urged against the Louisiana board, for there the law, obnoxious as it is, makes it at least possible for the men whom it invests with power to hold with an even hand the scales of justice. It is the abuse of that law which now agitates the country. But the power claimed by the Florida board and which has been exercised in violation of all law is founded in a union between favor and patronage, between creator and creature, which destroys every element of independence and leaves its possessor as unfit for judicial fairness as the eastern slave who records the edicts of an oriental master.

When the Legislature of Fiorida gave to certain members of the governor's cabinet the power to canvass the election returns of the counties, it had before it the constitution, which showed that all judicounties, it had before it the constitution, which showed that all judicial power, as I said, at that moment was vested in the several courts then in existence. It was impossible, therefore, for the Legislature to confer such power upon them, more especially as their respective duties had been defined with great explicitness in the constitution. It will not be denied by any one that the power exercised by the canvassers was judicial in its character. They undertook to determine certain matters touching the election which involved determinations of law and fact. They had before them numbers of witnesses whose testimony was given under oath. They heard able and learned arguments, and by their judgment attempted to deprive a large number of citizens of their rights. It is not an open question in the courts of this country that the privilege of voting is a valuable one. All lawyers know that an action will lie and that damages may be recovered against an inspector of election for refusing to receive the vote of a qualified elector. This principle has been asserted in Massavote of a qualified elector. This principle has been asserted in Massachusetts and in other States of the Union. And yet this board, in the exercise of its unwarranted power, without notice or the observance of any of the rules which govern judicial proceedings, tried to destroy the legal effect of more than 2,000 votes by deciding that they could not be counted for the candidates for whom they were given, in consequence, too, of the conduct of the election officers whom the law appointed to facilitate and not to destroy the expression of the public will. Now is it not plain to the most obtuse understanding public will. Now is it not plain to the most obtuse understanding that the question whether the acts or omissions of the officers at the election had the effect stated by the board or not is eminently judicial. Are not our books full of cases in which the highest courts in the land had all their abilities and learning taxed to the utmost in deciding what couduct and irregularities on the part of such officers would vitiate an election? Where do we get our notions of those nice legal distinctions which tell us of the qualities of acts and duties which are directory rather than mandatory in their character, and of the consequences which flow in point of law from both?

Is it not possible that if the Florida board of canvassers had been created under the belief that it would ever be called upon to refine away by judicial judgments the rights and liberties of the people, away by judicial judgments the rights and liberties of the people, our Legislature would have secured us fit persons to decide all vexed questions of law? They certainly saw that there was a provision in questions of law? They certainly saw that there was a provision in our constitution which secured to every citizen whose rights of person or property are imperiled the benefit of a trial and judgment before a person of legal training and education. And it is surely matter of astonishment, if one view of the power of this board be correct, to find that the most insignificant cause, either criminal or civil, must be tried and determined before a man who has been elevated from the law to the heart of the law to the from the bar to the bench, while upon the other hand cases involving the most delicate rights of the citizens in their relations to society and government, and the peace and security of the State, may be summarily disposed of in a judicial way by a majority of a board who are absolutely ignorant of those rules of justice which reason and wisdom have established for the detection of error and the protection of libert v and truth.

There is not a citizen in the country that would be willing to abide the judgment of such a tribunal in a case involving $100 if he could carry it beyond it. And yet it is claimed that its decision, unsustained by law or justice, should be regarded as conclusive upon a question which agitates the minds of forty-five millions of people.

I admit that the laws of Florida must decide all questions arising out of the election there, and are binding upon this Government. But where are we to go to ascertain what the law of the State is 7 Are we bound to accept the decision of the two men acting in violation of law and with no authority to give judicial judgments; or shall we observe the rule which has been followed from the foundation of this Government and accept the decision of the highest tribunal in this Government and accept the decision of the highest tribunal in the State interpreting its own local laws and constitution? The Constitution of the United States has left to the Legislatures of the States the power to appoint electors. The Legislature of my State has provided by law for the election of these officers, and its laws declare that the persons who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be deemed elected to the offices for which they were given. Two things are to be observed in connection with these provisions: First, that it is the duty of every member of this Government to see that the Constitution is not violated and to maintain the right of each State to select in its own way electors for President and Vice-President; second, to observe and respect the laws of the States which provide for the election of electors. None but persons appointed in the manfor the election of electors. nor the election of electors. None but persons appointed in the manner prescribed by the Legislatures of the States can be treated as electors. Every officer must be able to show title to his office from a true legal source. It is well settled in cases of elective officers that the right and title flow from the election by the people and not from the commission of the executive. It is well settled in cases of elective officers that the

The act of March 1, 1792, requires the executive authority in each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors to be made out and certified by a given day. This, as we know, was for the purpose of enabling Congress to ascertain with certainty, and without inquiry beyond an examination of the certificates, who were the legally appointed electors. The very words of the act imply that the electors are not dependent upon the certificate for their legal rights or official character, for the lists are to contain the names of the electors, and are to be delivered on or before the first Wednesday in Decemand are to be delivered on or before the first wednesday in December to the electors. The first section of the same act, as we know, provides for the appointment of the electors within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December. It is very clear that the certificate required by the third section, and which is made out on the first Wednesday in December, can add no legal force or effect to an appointment or election which was to have taken place thirty-four days previous, and which if good at all must have been so on the very day when it was made, because under the law it could not have been made at any other time. Besides, the appointment of electors under the Constitution must be left to the Legislatures of the States, and it is certainly not competent for Congress to invest the governor of a State with any power over such appointment.

The purpose and the only purpose of this part of the law, in my judgment, was to establish a rule of evidence to be observed, for the sake of uniformity and certainty, by the sovereign power of the Union. This is not a law which addresses itself as in ordinary cases to the citizen, when a rule of conduct for them has been adopted; but it is a law the obligation of which rests exclusively upon the power that made it. It is a law of the sovereign and for the sovereign, to aid and make easy the performance of a high constitutional duty. A construction therefore which would prevent the sovereign power from putting aside this rule of convenience, when it stands in the way of the performance of a duty imposed by the Constitution on that power, cannot in my opinion be maintained. Sir, you cannot take away the freedom and independence of this or the other House by act of Congress. You may make laws which will control the citizen, however high he may be in his individual character, but you cannot lay down an absolute rule now which our successors must follow in discharging their duties under the Constitution. They will have the same power to measure their own rights and duties as we have, and it would be destructive of legislative independence to maintain that one Congress has the right to shackle another or tie it down to the observance of any fixed rules in the discharge of its high duties. Such a doctrine, while it violates the Constitution, insults the people. For what is the great principle of our representative system? Is it not that our liberties are more secure under the constantly changing policy of varying opinions and dissimilar judgments than they would be under the stern and unyielding decrees and maxims of permanent establishments, which never receive an impulse from the healthy reactions and changes of popular sentiment.

Sir, a great constitutional duty like that of counting the electoral sir, a great constitutional duty like that of counting the electoral votes, resting as it does solely upon this and the other House of Congress, cannot be controlled by any provisions of law. True it is that the Houses that are called upon to perform this recurring duty may agree between themselves for the time being to any rule they deem wise to be observed in the performance of it. But then it is only a self-imposed obligation, that binds them no longer than they wish to consent to it. It is not in strictness a law; for that is a rule of action prescribed by a superior power for the control of an inferior or sub-ordinate one and which the latter is bound to obey. The Constitu-tion of the United States, following the example of that great parlia-mentary prototype, the English House of Commons, declares that each House of Congress may determine the rules of its proceedings. This, as we know, is an independent power which no other authority in the Government can impair or draw in question. The manner or mode of exercising it belongs exclusively to the bodies upon which it has been conferred. They alone are to judge of its extent and limitations. They may carry out this power in any manner they please. Their intentions and wishes may be embodied in usage or custom or at forth in the case. set forth in express terms on their records. They may fix the occasion and time for the application and continuance of any regulation; and whatever they do in the furtherance of this power can be altered by no authority except their own unfettered will.

The right of each House to determine the rules of its proceeding, which is nothing more nor less than the power of deciding the mode and manner in which it shall perform all its constitutional functions, and manner in which it shall perform all its constitutional functions, rests upon the very same principles of sovereignty and independence which uphold the legislative power of Congress. It is the settled law of this country that one legislature cannot by its own act disarm its successor of any of its powers or rights, unless the constitution has authorized it to be done. This was the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Ohio Life Insurance Company. (16 Howard, 431.)

It follows, therefore, that, if both Houses cannot tie the hands of succeeding Houses by restricting their sovereign power of legislation, they cannot impair or in any manner shackle the separate and independent powers of each succeeding House with which the Constitution has invested it the better to secure complete freedom of action. I argue then that there is no difference whatever between the duties of this body under the Constitution respecting the electoral votes of the States and its other duties, and that it has a perfect right to decide for itself in the one case as well as the other what shall be its rules of proceeding when it comes to ascertain the votes of the States for President and Vice-President.

If it should be found that the third section of the act of Congress of March 1, 1792, can have no greater effect upon the Senate and House than separate rules of these bodies containing like provisions, then it is plain that each House, acting up to the principle of independence which the Constitution has set up for its government, may determine that its hands are free, and in discharging the highest duty confided to it by the people that it is not concluded even by the certificate of to it by the people that it is not concluded even by the certificate of a governor. If the way be open, as I believe it is, for the two Houses of Congress to ascertain the true votes of my State, how, it may be asked, are they to do so in view of the conflicting claims which will be presented before them? Sir, I have always been of opinion, and no argument I have heard has changed it, that electors for President and Vice-President are State officers, although the single duty devolved upon them concerns the whole people. I arrive at this conclusion by a perative kind of resoning. I say they are not officers clusion by a negative kind of reasoning. I say they are not officers of the United States, and if this can be shown they are officers of the States or they are not officers at all.

It would be remarkable if, notwithstanding the plain provision of the Constitution, which declares that no officer of the United States shall be appointed an elector, that when a person not thus dis-qualified is so appointed, he becomes such officer. Officers of the United States are all appointed in the manner prescribed in the Constitution, by the President of the United States and Senate, the heads of Departments, or the courts of law. Besides all officers of the United States are required to take an oath to support the Constitution, and electors are never, I believe, compelled to do so.

The President commissions all officers of the United States, but he never was known to commission an elector. I take it, then, that these officers are representatives of the people of the several States in their political character, and that their obligations are due to those who elected them. But how shall the claims of rival electors be determined? The Legislatures of the States have alone the power of prescribing the manner of their appointment. We have seen that the law of Florida has given to the people the right to elect them, and the question is who have the people selected? It will not be denied the persons who have received the highest number of votes, and no others, had a right to cast the vote of the State. The Louisiana law is not the law there. There are some things which all the departments of the General Government will take notice of without special proof. Among these are the laws and public acts of the governments of the States. The courts of the Union take notice of them, and the legislative department, which is governed less by technicalities than the courts, cannot be more strict.

We know that an election was held in Florida on the 7th of November 1 and 1 and 2 and 2 and 3 and 3 ber last for President and Vice-President of the United States. The returns of that election have been made and are now part of the records of the State. They have been made and are now part of the records of the State. They have been publicly canvassed by the officers designated by law for the performance of that duty. These officers arrogated to themselves powers which the law did not confer upon them, and instead of giving the result of the election from all the returns before them came to a conclusion from a consideration and returns before them came to a conclusion from a consideration and review of only a part. This they have avowed in the most solemn public manner and under oath in a judicial proceeding. The record of their own proceedings also shows that the return they made was false and illegal. It is also well known that the certificates which were issued by the governor are based upon that return and are also illegal and void. It is a wonder that the mysterious power of divine justice is not put forth to prevent the emblem of its majesty and purity from bearing attestation to the greatest of public lies. Sir, the seal of Florida is sadly out of place on that paper which is brought the seal of Florida is sadly out of place on that paper which is brought up here to give effect to a fraud upon her people. It never was designed for such a purpose as that. The emblem which it bears was intended to remind the officials who should affix it that its verity and power resulted from its being the symbol of justice and truth. It can impart no false character to anything. God in his wisdom and goodness has so arranged the moral government of the universe that it is not in the power of the wit of man to shield by his devices the best schemes of trickery and fraud. All the forms and solemnities of the law when employed for such a purpose are considered at best as but links in the chain of falsehood and deception.

The most conclusive judgments and decrees, the most veritable records and parchments, though they are covered all over with ribbons and seals, cannot when they shield fraud stand one moment in the way of the scrutiny and condemnation of justice. And are we to be told that this great principle of divine equity, which is as broad as God's universe and may be traced to the remotest regions and the highest and lowest tribugals can have no place here in this the only highest and lowest tribunals, can have no place here in this the only living temple of popular liberty? Sir, I do not, I cannot believe it.

And what is the law and justice of this case as it stands now?

I have said that the vote of Florida is known to the whole people.

It is a great public fact which cannot be hid. There is not the slightest difference of opinion between any two persons in the country as to what the actual vote of the State is. The official papers and returns show this with unerring certainty. The whole controversy turned upon the legal powers of the canvassing board under the law of the State. The highest judicial authority there has settled this question, or it cannot be settled at all. We hear of the want of authority in the State courts to expound their own local laws and constitutions and of the interference of Federal courts. This is a strange doctrine. It is an elementary principle, applicable alike to the State and Federal Governments, that the judicial power is co-extensive with the legislative. What does this mean if it does not imply that any laws which it is competent for the Legislature to enact the judicial power of the State may expound and interpret. It is a great public fact which cannot be hid. There is not the slight-power of the State may expound and interpret.

Can it be denied that the Legislature of Florida had a right to provide by law for the election of electors? The Constitution of the United States has made it its duty to do so. It has not separated the election of these persons from that of other State officers; both are conducted under the same law. The power of the Legislature to enact this law will not be disputed by any man in the country. The persons whom it designates to canvass the returns of all elections claimed that this statute invested them with judicial powers, and they exercised them to the prejudice of the citizen. The citizen appealed to the highest court in the State against the board in a well-known proceeding, often before resorted to in other States in like cases. The constitution of the State was invoked for the protection of the suitor. The board relied upon its own interpretation of the statute. The constitution and statutes were critically examined, and the supreme court decided that the Legislature did not confer upon the board the power which it claimed, and that it was not within its power to confer it under the constitution. According to this interpretation of the law the face of the returns ought to decide the election. These returns show a majority for the whole democratic ticket, State and national, and they will remain a perpetual record either to agitate the fears or to quiet the doubts of the man who shall found upon them a title to the Presidency.

I have said that we must look to the laws of Florida for a decision of this question. The controversy turns upon a purely legal proposition. If we accept the law as laid down by the supreme court of the State, there is an end to the whole controversy. That law is that the vote actually cast and returned determines the election. This is the law of the State as announced by her highest tribunal, and ought in my judgment to settle forever the question of title between the two sets of electors. There can be but two grounds taken in re-gard to this part of the case.

First. That the judgment of the supreme court of the State is obligatory upon all parties, and especially binding upon us. Second. That the authority of the canvassing board and the action of the governor based upon it are superior in legal effect and dignity to the decision of the court. In support of the first proposition little need be said. It is upheld by a long line of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the opinions of distinguished members of this body.

The Senator from Indiana stated this doctrine very forcibly last year in the Pinchback case, which was one that did not call for its application; and that opinion is as follows:

application; and that opinion is as follows:

This is a question that rises above all party. Party considerations are trifling and contemptible when brought into connection with the decision of questions of this character. This is the true doctrine upon which the State governments alone can be preserved. I am inflexibly determined, so far as my own action is concerned, that the true province of the State shall not be infringed; that State rights shall be preserved in all their integrity, because the States have rights sacred, unapproachable, and that ought to be inviolable; and among these, and indispensable to the existence of the State, is the right through their own tribunals to determine who are their officers, to determine by their own courts, under the special tribunals that may be created for that purpose, who is the governor of the State, who compose the members of the Legislature, who are entitled to sit upon the bench and to administer the laws; because if the Government of the United States may enter into the consideration of the questions, may review State elections and determine who has been elected a member of the Legislature or the governor or the treasure of the State, then indeed the State governments exist only by sufferance. Then indeed the Government of the United States is supreme. Then indeed the contralization.

That is the doctrine for which I contend now, and it can be applied at this time without clashing with the exclusive right of the Senate under the Constitution to judge of the elections and returns of its members. The Supreme Court of the United States has held in a number of cases that the decision of the highest court of a State expounding its own local laws and constitution is just as binding as though such decision was incorporated into the text of the statute.

We are to read the decision of the supreme court of Florida as though it was a part of the election law of that State. What would be the state of the case if at the time the State canvassers usurped judicial powers the statute under which they acted was as clear and explicit as the decision of the court has made it? Suppose the language of the court in their late opinion was the language of the Legislature in 1872, and that the canvassers despite this verbal explicitness had gone on and violated the law, is there a lawyer or a citizen in the country who would say that any advantage could result to any one from such a palpable wrong? Such a clear, unmistakable usurpation as that would be condemned here and elsewhere, and no man would attempt to justify it. The case as it now stands is just as strong in point of law against the canvassers as it would be under the strong in point of law against the canvassers as it would be under the facts supposed. It is true that the degree of moral guilt would be greater where the duty violated was plain than in a case where its obscurity would justify the presumption of unintentional error.

But the intentions of the canvassers cannot by any possibility affect the question of power, or alter in the least the legal quality of their acts or the consequences which the law forces from them.

And what authority is there for setting the judgment of the board above that of the court? It has been said that the supreme court had no jurisdiction over the canvassers. But who is to decide between them? If this board is omnipotent, who made it so? All its powers are derived from the Legislature. It has none beyond. Will any one affirm that the Legislature may create a board of State can-vassers, invest it with judicial powers, and withdraw from the su-preme court all jurisdiction over it? That is, the Legislature may not only violate the constitution, but go further, and say that no one shall say that it has done so. But the Legislature did not do this. It passed a simple and plain law, similar in principle and detail to the laws of other States on the subject of elections, and the supreme court gave to it a judicial construction adverse to the opinions of the canvassing board.

Mr. Webster said in his day that a statute was just what it was judicially ascertained to be; and that is the case here. This power has been exercised in nearly every State of the Union; but it seems that we are in such a state in the South that everything which is done there is called in question or impeached for some reason or other if it does not advance the interest or suit the opinions of outsiders.

While on that subject, I am reminded of the celebrated passage in one of the greatest orations of Mr. Burke, when he undertakes to speak of geographical morality. Speaking of the argument which was made by the coursel of Hastings, that it was proper to do certain things in India which would not be proper in England, he said:

things in India which would not be proper in England, he said:

My lords, we positively deny that principle. I am authorized and called upon to deny it. And having stated at large what he means by saying that the same actions have not the same qualities in Asia and in Europe, we are to let your lordships know that these gentlemen have formed a plan of geographical morality by which the duties of men, in public and in private situations, are not to be governed by their relation to the great Governor of the universe, or by their relation to mankind, but by climates, degrees of longitude, parallels not of hife but of latitudes; as if, when you have crossed the equinoctial, all the virtues die, as they say some insects die when they cross the line; as if there were a kind of baptism, like that practiced by seamen, by which they unbaptize themselves of all that they learned in Europe, and after which a new order and system of things commenced.—Burke's Works, volume 3, pages 325, 326.

The records of my State held, an election in November last which

The people of my State held an election in November last which for peace, order, and general fairness was not surpassed by any in the country. As soon as it became known that the vote of Florida if decountry. As soon as it became known that the vote of riorida it declared one way would settle the presidential contest, and before the official count took place, a small Army of regular troops was hurried there, as if there was an enemy to meet who had invaded the integrity of our soil. And what did they find upon their arrival at Tallahassee? They found a country blessed with the rarest gifts ever bestowed by nature upon any land; a climate salubrious, mild, and healthful; a soil teeming with fertility on every hand and offering the finest possible prospects to capital and labor. They found, also the finest possible prospects to capital and labor. They found, also, the still-remaining traces of wealth and happiness in the neglected appearance of stately homes, the abodes of independence, culture, and hospitality.

But they also saw what surprised them more than all this: they saw eaceful, law-abiding citizens, distinguished alike for moderation and intelligence, chastened by poverty and misrule, and struggling to establish an honest government through the peaceful agencies of the law and Constitution. They found much to admire, more to deplore; but they did not find what their hurried and warlike mission led them to expect, a single enemy to the peace and liberty of the country. The votes in Florida were counted and recounted. The first gave the whole election to the republicans. The last surrenders the State ticket and one member of Congress to the democrats. The electoral vote was declared for Governor Hayes. It is curious to see how these results have been reached. The canvassers professed to obey the court. The object of the proceeding by mandamus was to compel the board to canvass and count the returns from four counties which were thrown out on the first canvass. These counties are Jackson, Monroe, Manatee, and Hamilton. There was no issue raised by the pleadings in regard to the action of the board touching the returns from the other counties. No change in the canvass was asked for except in regard to the returns from the counties named.

Now is it not plain that if these men intended to act fairly they

Now is it not plain that, if these men intended to act fairly, they would have been content with a literal compliance with the law, and have recanvassed the disputed returns only? But when they found, as they did, that by canvassing the rejected returns in accordance with the order of the court, and permitting all the others to stand as they were under the decision of the first canvass, it would appear to the whole world that the Tilden electors had a majority of ninety-four on whole world that the Tilden electors had a majority of ninety-four on the face of the papers, this was not to be permitted to appear under official sanction under any circumstances, although every man of intelligence in the State of both parties knew that this was the true state of the vote according to the returns. But how was the Hayes majority maintained? The false return from Baker County, which had been rejected at the former sitting, was substituted for the true one, the former containing, as everybody knew, the vote of but half the county, and the latter of the whole.

The entire return from Clay County, which no one chiested to at

The entire return from Clay County, which no one objected to at the former meeting, was thrown out, with its 165 democratic major-ity, and thus the State was confirmed to Governor Hayes. Sir, such tricks and manipulations as these would not attract much notice if they only concerned the ordinary interests of men. But when we find the first office in the world in point of dignity and power and the liberties and peace of forty-five million of freemen trifled with by reckless men as they would deal with a common gambling-stake, it is time that we at least were asserting and exhibiting in the interest of the Republic something of the independence, the statesmanship, I might add the patriotism, which the founders of the Constitution so confidently expected would result from the creation of the high offices we now occupy. For my part I cannot be brought to feel that this is a purely party contest. I know too well the force and cogency of party feeling and passions to underestimate their hold upon the human heart. And yet occasions have arisen when the love of country and the love of justice were powerful enough to extinguish the attachments of party and to force strong men, and weak men too, to give up the interests of a sect for the welfare of a nation.

When the great contest of 1801 was pending and the cause of popular government was trembling in the balance, Hamilton wrote to Morris: "If there be a man in the world I ought to hate, it is Jefferson." And still be pleaded for the latter's election harder than any republican. For, said he, "in a case like this it would be base to listen to personal considerations." And do we not know that the most important event of the seventeenth century, and which did more to secure the liberties of the human race (except our own Revolution) than any other, was effected by the mutual sacrifices of par-ties, who in that moment of their country's peril buried their animosities and passions and staked everything to preserve the liberties of England.

How well does Lord Bolingbroke record their patriotism:

Though the king was not the better for his experience, parties were. Both saw their errors. The tories stopped short in the pursuit of a bad principle. The whigs reformed the abuses of a good one. Both had sacrificed their party to their country, but sacrificed on this occasion their party to their country.

We have shown to the world recently the great perfection we have reached in science and art. We ought to be able to exhibit also increased capacity and skill in the domain of popular government, for to what purpose do we labor to improve ourselves in knowledge and power unless we have the virtue and patriotism to secure protection to the fruits of our toil. In this great crisis it is easy to stir up bad passions and obscure the light of reason, now so much needed, by par-

What all desire to know is the truth. I do not believe that it is in the power of any man or set of men to prevent it reaching the minds of the people or from asserting its majesty here. The petty shuffling and trickery of returning boards may for the moment give rise to doubts and uncertainty. An anxious and excited public may have doubts and uncertainty. An anxious and excited public may have been mislead by their partisan judgments and lent ear to their deceptive arguments; but the sober second thought will come to dispet the mists of error, just as the rising sun overcomes with light and joy the darkness of the morning. Be assured that no one will in that hour of triumph be found powerful or brave enough to oppose the decrees of God's divine minister. The living principles of justice, which for the wisest of purposes is planted in every human heart, will be touched by the first and faintest revelations of error. Truth, sir, will not stand in need of argument or persuasion. These are shifts which error uses at times against her power. She will assert her supremacy over the heart and conscience of man. The virtuous and strong will embrace her as they would an old, familiar friend—the best guide of their youth and manhood. The wayward and indifferent may turn away from her at first as from one whom they had not seen from their childhood. But even they, sir, will at length recognize her authority and power. They will be reminded of the maxims of their early life instilled into their youthful hearts by the affectionate tones of a lovinstilled into their youthful nearts by the allectionate tones of a loving mother. The testament of a dying father, delivered in the half andible whispers of approaching death, will recur to them and urge a fulfillment of its sacred injunctions. But if all these should fail, the almighty Power itself, unwilling to stake the cause of justice upon the failure of its divine agencies, will interpose directly for the protection of truth and the overthrow of falsehood and error.

PACIFIC RAILROAD ACTS.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that all pending orders be postponed and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 984, the railroad bill that I gave notice this morning that I would ask the Senate to take up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (S. No. 934) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to expresse the Government the rese of the same for postal miliand to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, miliand to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Whole.

Mr. THURMAN. Now I am willing, if there is any other business that any Senator wishes to transact, that this bill may be considered as passed by infomally for the transaction of that business.

Mr. EDMUND 3. There is nothing but an executive session.

Mr. THURMAN. Then it is not necessary to say anything on the subject. I want this bill to be the unfinished business of to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WEST. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 12, noes 14;

no quorum voting.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to ask a question. This is a proposition, I understand, to adjourn until Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be until Monday next.

Mr. BAYARD. I am under the impression that it would be a very serious matter to subtract one day now from the legislative business of the country. I do not think that day can be spared with the amount of business yet before Congress—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the Senator from Delaware that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. HAMLIN. O, yes, it is.
Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Chair to decide.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. INGALLS. The Chair is very badly advised.

Mr. BAYARD. This is not a motion simply to adjourn, but a motion to adjourn to a day certain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will read the forty-third rule, which relates to this subject.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

43. When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but— To adjourn. To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day

To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain.

To take a recess,
To proceed to the consideration of executive business,
To lay on the table,
To postpone indefinitely,
To postpone to a day certain,
To commit,
To amend;
which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to executive business, and to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

Mr. BAYARD. The decision of the Chair, I apprehend, is based on the new rules of the Senate, of which I have not yet been furnished with a copy. Do I understand the Chair, upon an examination of the rule as read by the Clerk, to decide that a motion to adjourn to a day certain, or to fix the day to which the Senate shall adjourn, is not debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the decision of the Chair. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, this is the first time that we have had this rule up, and I think we had better settle it wisely. I am, in my judgment, very clear that the construction of the Chair is wrong in relation to the rule as it now stands. I think the rule as it now stands has an application only to the simple motion for adjournment, which is not debatable; it never was; but the motion fixing to what day we shal! adjourn is not excluded from debate by the terms or the spirit of this rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Maine has concluded his remarks, the roll-call will proceed.

Mr. HAMLIN. I raise no further question.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9, nays

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Hamilton, Mitchell, Patterson, Sargent, and West—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Blaine, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Chaffee, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Edmunds, Frelinghaysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon. Paddock, Price, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sharon, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Withers, and Wright—39.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Barnum, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Ferry, Harvey, Hitchcock, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Logan, Morrill, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Saulsbury, Spencer, Teller, Walleigh, Whyte, and Windom—26.

So the motion was not agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. Grant, Jr., his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 25th instant approved and signed the act (S. No. 1040) to authorize sundry allowances to James Atkins, late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Georgia, in the settlement of his accounts.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that when the Senate adjourn it be to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow instead of twelve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. INGALLS. Before that motion is put I ask leave to offer a resolution to amend Rule 43, which will lie over under the rules one day for consideration. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved. That Rule 43 be so amended as to read, after the word "arranged," in line 13, as follows:

Motions to adjourn, to take a recess, to proceed to executive business, and to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I renew my motion for an ex ecutive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the con sideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 26, 1877.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The SPEAKER. The Journal of yesterday will be read.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of yesterday may be read to-morrow, when the Journal of to-day is read, with the same opportunity for correction as if it were read now.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DISTRIBUTION OF MILITARY FORCES.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following as the committee under the resolution of Mr. Wood, of New York, for the purpose of inquiring into the matters embraced in the message of the President relative to the disposition of the military forces: Mr. Wood of New York, Mr. Goode, Mr. Southard, Mr. Throckmorton, Mr. Caldwell of Alabama, Mr. Smith of Georgia, Mr. Harrison, Mr. Kasson, Mr. Foster, Mr. Eames, and Mr. Page.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

The House according to order, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. MILLS. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Eleven minutes.

Mr. LAMAR. I do not think I had quite occupied all the time accorded to me

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute remaining of his twenty minutes. The gentleman from Texas has eleven minutes, one minute of which he had previously yielded to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]
Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. As under the arrangement of speeches I shall be recognized very soon, I would like to yield my time to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. Except by consent of the House, the time of the

The SPEAKER. Except by consent of the House, the time of the gentleman from Texas must run without interruption. But the Chair asks consent for the arrangement suggested, so that the gentleman from Mississippi may now occupy eleven minutes, the Chair recognizing subsequently the gentleman from Texas for his remaining ten minutes. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, I have listened, sir, with great pleasure to the able argument just submitted to the House by the gentleman from Texas, mixed, however, with regret that I am forced to combat the views and to oppose the course of one with whom I have so long had warm political sympathies, for whose talents I entertain so high a respect, and in whose patriotism and integrity I have such perfect confidence. If I understand his position properly he holds that this bill, by requiring a concurrent vote of the Senate and House to reject the conclusion of the commission, deprives either House of that which is not only its constitutional power but its constitutional duty; that is not only its constitutional power but its constitutional duty; that is, to exercise an effective veto upon any act of legislation which it may disapprove.

Now, the fallacy here lies in the assumption that a decision of either Senate or House upon any question in counting the electoral vote or witnessing that count is a legislative act by a legislative body. It is nothing of the sort.

When the Constitution declares that the vote shall be counted in the presence of the Senate and House, it does not bring them together as a Congress or a Legislature in any sense. They are the Senate and House, it is true, but only as those words describe the constituents of the assembly. They are as separate and distinct a body from the Senate and House in Congress assembled as a body composed of any other constituents would be

Mr. MILLS. In order that my friend may understand me exactly, state that the tribunal is one ordained by the Constitution and clothed with both legislative and judicial powers.

Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir, I understand. The gentleman says it is a body ordained by the Constitution and clothed with legislative powers and judicial powers, and it is from this proposition, as he states it, that I dissent. Now, sir, if as the gentleman contends it is a body under the Constitution clothed with legislative powers it can do no act nor adopt any resolution nor make any order or take a concurrent vote without having the President of the United States to approve such action. For such is the requirement of the Constitution prove such action. For such is the requirement of the Constitution as to all proceedings of the two Houses when acting as a legislature. But, I repeat, it is no legislature in the contemplation of the Constitution. It cannot perform any legislative act. Could a bill be introduced and passed in such an assembly? It could not even make an appropriation to pay its employés. The very tellers, by whom the count is made, are appointed for it by the two Houses severally when in session as branches of Congress. It is an organized body provided by the Constitution, called into being once in every four years, the two Houses being its constituent parts, but it has only a single function, and that is to count the electoral vote, as one party contends, or to witness that count, as the other party holds. The method therefore which this bill provides for ascertaining the legal votes which one but to which this bill provides for ascertaining the legal votes which ought to be counted, and distinguishing them from the illegal votes which ought not to be counted, may be a good or bad method, a wise or foolish method, but an unconstitutional one it is not. For, in the first place, whatever of power is given to this commission is not given to it by the body intrusted with the duty of counting the electoral vote, but by Congress, by regular legislation of the Senate and House with the approval of the President.

If I am right in the proposition that the duty to be performed in counting the electoral vote does not attach to the character of the Senate and House as the National Legislature, but is the single function of a special organization provided by the Constitution, I think it cannot be doubted that Congress may by law prescribe the means and agencies whereby the assemblage may perform its function with facility and efficiency. If in order to perfect the machinery of that special organization Congress by law supplements it with this commission, it cannot be objected to unless it violates some constitutional provision as to its character. The power given to this commission is not the power intrusted the Senate and House thus assembled of determining who has received a majority of votes, but is simply the power to test the genuineness of a certain class of contested votes, power to test the genuineness of a certain class of contested votes, the result of which the two Houses finally determine. Has Congress not the power to do this? Why, sir, the law of 1792 provides the means by which the President of the Senate shall be guided in receiving the electoral certificates, and requires that the certificate of the vote from each electoral college shall be attested by the governor of each State. Does that law substitute the governor for the Senate and House or infigure upon their power? So wheat the certificate and and House or infringe upon their power? So where two returns come from the same State, this bill submits them to the scrutiny of the commission and requires its attestation to the genuineness of the one which is to be counted, unless the Senate and House determine to reject the finding of the commission.

I desire to examine for a moment the position which has been pressed by gentlemen, in this discussion, that the President of the Senate has the right not only to open the certificates but to count the votes. For the sake of the argument let us admit this assumed pre-rogative of that officer with whatever of power may be incident to its exercise. It is certain that if he has the right to count the vote its exercise. It is certain that if he has the right to count the vote he has the right to count it only "in the presence of the Senate and House." Now, sir, give to these words of the Constitution the very minimum of significance which gentlemen have allowed them. Say that they mean only the two Houses shall be present as witnesses, and these words are replete with positive and affirmative power. If they are witnesses surely no one will pretend that they are blind witnesses and deaf and dumb. Sir, if these two Houses are present under a constitutional duty to witness the count, are they not under a correlative obligation to refuse to witness that which they hold to be not a count? If either of these witnesses denies that it is an honest count, the count is not a legal one. Suppose each of these honest count, the count is not a legal one. Suppose each of these two Houses retire to its own chamber and there puts on record that it has not witnessed a count but a fraud and a lie, what is the result? It has not witnessed a count but a fraud and a he, what is the result? Why, sir, the whole proceeding becomes null and void. It is like the case of a man who is about to make his will. He and he alone has the power to make it; but the law requires him to make it in the presence of three witnesses. If the witnesses, or any one of them, refuses to attest, and swears that the signature is not genuine, or that the testator was not of sane or disposing mind, what becomes of the validity of the will? If, then, the Senate or the House refuses to testify to the count, or if they declare upon record that what purported to be a count was a cheating, deceptive, fraudulent pretense, what, I ask again, becomes of the validity of the count?

Surely the two Houses alone can testify whether the right vote was counted. If, therefore, the assumed right of the President of the Senate be granted the count cannot result in an election unless the witnesses, the Senate and the House, agree in giving their testimony to its correctness. But to do all this implies the right to discriminate the legal from the illegal vote. To accomplish this result it is proposed by this bill that Congress, under its power to pass all laws necessary and proper to the execution of any power vested in any depart-ment of the Government, shall provide a method by which in case of two certificates the Senate and House may ascertain the legal vote which ought to be counted.

Believing this bill to be constitutional, I shall support it for reasons which I will now give as well as I can in the short time allotted to

My first reason is that it furnishes a provision which secures our Government against what has been considered by all our wisest states men as the weakest and therefore the most dangerous point in our system. They have feared that the election of President, in which nearly all the honors and emoluments of Government are staked as prizes to be contended for, would soon degenerate into a struggle and contest for these honors and emoluments, in which party ascendancy and party triumph will be objects of far greater solicitude than the prosperity and good of the country. This apprehension was twentyfive years ago expressed by a great American statesman in words which seem to be peculiarly appropriate to the present condition of public affairs. Speaking of the vast and growing patronage of the President and the number of offices of distinction and profit in his control, he

These, and especially the latter, have made the election of President the great and absorbing object of party struggles; and on this the appeal to force will be made whenever the violence of the struggle and the corruption of parties will no longer submit to the decision of the ballot-box. If it comes to this it will be in all probability in a contested election, when the question will be, which is the President! The incumbent, if he should be one of the candidates; or, if not, the candidate of the party in possession of power, or of the party endeavoring to obtain possession of power! On such an issue, the appeal to force would make the candidate of the successful party master of the whole. The contest would put an end, virtually, to the elective character of the department. The form of an election might, for a time, be preserved; but the ballot-box would be much less relied on for the decision than the sword and bayonet. In time, even the form would cease, and the successor be appointed by the incumbent; and thus the absolute form of a popular election would end in the absolute form of a monarchical government.—Cathoun on the Constitution of the United States, page 378.

Sir, this measure, unanimously recommended by men representing both political parties, I regard as certain proof that in this Congress devotion to party is not stronger than devotion to the country, and that the promotion of the prosperity and interest of the country are objects of deeper and more intense solicitude than all the honors and emoluments which may be reaped as the rewards and spoils of a presidential triumph. Its enactment into a law will be a grand triumph of patriotism, nationality, harmony, and zeal for the public good over faction, selfishness, and the struggle for party ascendancy. For this reason alone I would give my support to this bill.

I proceed to my next reason. As I understand the measure it rests on three propositions: First, that the President of the Senate has not the right to decide what votes to count and what to reject; second, that both the Senate and the House have the right to decide and direct what is an honest count of legal votes; third, that, as neither can surrender this right to the other and that there are differences of opinion as to the extent of this power whether it is limited to the ascertainment of the authenticity of the certified returns or extends to the right of going behind them, it provides for a tribunal to de-cide these questions in cases of conflicting returns and to determine which return is the true and which of the controverted votes are the proper ones to be counted. In other words, they will take the advice commission the character of which will guarantee a thoroughly considered and impartial opinion. Upon that opinion the two Houses assembled will finally act.

Now, sir, if I had doubts of the wisdom of this plan, which I have not, I would accept it in preference to the alternative which is now not, I would accept it in preference to the alternative which is now before us. If no mode of adjusting or reconciling the present differences can be found, what is the result? Why that the next President will have to be inaugurated by a method and through processes and agencies advocated and pressed by one party alone with the view to a single object, and that is the consummation of its own triumph, to which it believes itself entitled. However this presidential contested election may be ended, unless this bill passes, one or the other party must determine to submit to what it believes to be a fraudulent perversion of law, Constitution, and right, or to resist by force. Either of these results would be an incalculable calamity. In case of submission the whole moral force of the Government would be destroyed. sion the whole moral force of the Government would be destroyed. Both to those who win and those who lose, the Constitution will have become a mere weapon of party warfare, and the manipulation of a venal and corrupt popular vote will be perfected in the hands of bold and bad political adventurers, and in all succeeding elections the forms of constitutional procedure will be more and more recklessly disregarded until finally the result will be determined, not by the bailot, but by sword and bayonet.

As to the alternative of resistance there is no necessity to pretend to ignore it, for we all know that a good deal has been said about it, both by those who would scorn to think it possible and those whom (I am sorry to say it) would be glad to hear it threatened. Now, sir, the man who says that he despises such indications, who feels a contempt for the menace of civil war, no matter from what quarter it comes, permits himself to overlook one of the most important features in the problem of government, the contentment, the harmony, and repose and security of the society for which he legislates; and he forgets the first lesson in the elementary book of practical politics.

For one, I am not unwilling to say that the former alternative (of submission) would be the one adopted and that resistance would not be made, at least by the democratic party. And in saying this, I wish to repel the disparagement which has been expressed of the courage and patriotism of our northern political associates and friends which we sometimes hear. I believe them to be wanting in neither. As to the charge that in the past they have encouraged us with promises of support that were not fulfilled, I deny it. They did sympathize with us as to the causes which provoked our secession. But while a few public men made extravagant declarations as to what they would do in a certain event, our northern democratic friends as a party pleaded with us to remain and defend our institutions with their support inside of the Union. They did not as a party give assurances of co-operation and aid to us against their own States should war result from our secession. And, sir, if there existed with us at that time any bitter feeling of disappointment toward our former political associates, it has been effaced by their undeviating fidelity since the war to the constitutional rights of our people and by their unwavering support and sympathy, coming up on every question as true as the needle to the pole, without the needle's variations. No, sir, whatever of responsibility the South incurred in that movement she has no desire to shrink from. The sorrowful lesson we have to teach our children is all our own. It is that we undertook a great political movement which time and the fortunes of war disclosed that we had not the strength and resources to carry on to a successful consummation. Our vindication—and a generous victor will not deny us that—lies in our solemn conviction that we were defending the institutions and the principles of constitutional liberty, the heritage of the fathers of the Republic. It was this sentiment which inspired the courage of our soldiers in battle and now renders our section all the more precious solders in battle and now renders our section all the more prectous to us in defeat, giving her to our eyes at least dignity in her desolation and beauty and majesty even in her ruin and woe.

I repeat, this bill avoids the necessity of any submission of the defeated party to what it may consider either fraud or force. The result, whatever it may be, will have been reached by the patriotic consent of both parties. And if it involves any addition to the methods heretofore observed, it will have been an addition fairly discussed, openly and legally adopted, ratified by the will and approved by the good sense of the whole people. It leaves the frame-work of the Constitution unshaken, the sanctity of law inviolate. Indeed, it is so in harmony with the genius of the Constitution, so promotive of the scheme of its framers, that had this commission of reference been part of the original Constitution itself, there would have been no language too extravagant to describe its far-sighted wisdom.

To have solved so dangerous and difficult a question so simply, so calmly, and so justly is the highest tribute which can be paid to those principles of constitutional liberty which have trained the American people to such a possibility. The spirit in which the bill has been framed by its authors of both parties is no slight guarantee of the fairness with which the representative men of both political parties will administer its provisions; and if I cannot rely upon the patience and ability and the justice which the members of the Supreme Court and ability and the justice which the members of the Supreme Court will bring to the discharge of perhaps the most solemn duty ever imposed upon the magistrates of a free country, with what confidence could I accept or ask others to accept the decision of the same question by a mere party majority either of the Senate or the House?

There is another consideration which commends this bill to my support. It cannot be denied that this presidential campaign has been marked by some painful characteristics. It cannot be denied that strong sectional prejudices and passions were appealed to and excited in its progress. It cannot be denied that a large majority of Northern States were found on one side and that an almost unbroken body of Southern States were found on the other. Now, sir, in such an issue, in the presence of such parties, in full view of all the unjust and unconthe presence of such parties, in full view of all the unjust and unconthe presence of such parties, in full view of all the unjust and unconstitutional action to which party passion has stimulated party power, I feel that this bill is a declaration that in the future this tyranny of force must cease; that hereafter in any conflicts to which the South as a part of the Union must be necessarily a party, the sword shall not be thrown into the scales of justice nor military power be permitted to silence the law, but that all questions of difference must be referred to the arbitration of reason. I feel that my section at least has been permitted to stand forth once more in the pure air of free dis-cussion, and that whatever be the decision, we have been allowed to appeal to men acknowledging a common citizenship under an equal

Nor does the fact that the justices of the Supreme Court are made Nor does the fact that the justices of the Supreme Court are made parties in this commission lessen my conviction of its propriety or weaken the sentiment of approval with which I regard it. I have no fear of disturbing the balance of constitutional powers, nor have I any mistrust of the spirit of honest impartiality in which that duty will be discharged. I listen with no patience to imputations upon this august tribunal. I cannot forget that one of the greatest of American statesmen, the man who least of all who have left their mark on our constitutional history, was disposed to compromise either rights or duties, who spoke of such compromise as shifting-sands and the Constitution as a rock of support, taught me this confidence. When in 1848 the question of the power of Congress over slavery in when in 1848 the question of the power of Congress over slavery in the Territories was perplexing our councils and presaging the civil troubles which came upon us afterward, it was proposed in the Clay-ton compromise to refer that question, political and sectional as it was, to the Supreme Court for decision; that reference was warmly supported by Mr. Calhoun, who declared that such a reference was leaving it where it ought to be left, to the Constitution.

And, sir, so we may say that this measure refers this question to the tribunal of the Constitution.

Sir, I do know that in the dark hour of our distress it was from that court, just as it is now constituted, and from it alone of all the departments of this Federal Government, that we of the South have had protection against the legislation that forgot the Constitution in the vengeful spirit of its harsh and oppressive provisions. Its decisions in the Slaughter-house and other cases justified us in believing that there was one refuge for those who claimed that protection.

An additional recommendation (and I confess it is no light one) of this plan to my support is that to a certain extent it frees either candidate from the exactions of party obligation. It is true that either will have owed his elevation to the party which supported him, but the closeness of the contest, the possibility of a failure in the election, the scrutiny of all the doubtful and dishonorable elements which unavoidably mix in a great popular vote, the solemn recognition by such a court of the awful responsibility which they are about to place in the hands of him whom they shall confirm—all these incidents so impressive and so unusual cannot fail to teach the coming President that he is not the President of a party but of the people; that the fortunes and the character of a great commonwealth depend upon the elevation, the purity, the patriotism of his administration; that the conscience of the country cries aloud for the old-fashioned honesty of its past honorable life, and that everywhere over this vast continent, amid the distraction of party passion and the honest perplexity of political differences, the popular heart is yearning for "the old good nature and the old good humor. [Applause.]

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, at the threshold of the second.

ond century of our national existence the country stands confronted by a question which agitates the public mind, paralyzes industry, and threatens revolution. It is a question which gives pause to pa-triotic thought and leads many to despair of the preservation of the republic. Although a similar question—the count of the electoral votes—has statedly recurred at the expiration of periods of four years since 1789, it has never happened that party interest and success seemed to depend upon a particular construction of the Constitution in reference to such count. The propriety and necessity of adopting the pending bill, reported by the joint committee of the two Houses, depend upon the question whether the Constitution itself has devolved the count upon some specific officer or department of the Government; and, if so, whether a rule of decision is provided for every question known to be involved in the count of the electoral votes. In the consideration of these questions I think the discussion of the following propositions is involved:

What officer or department of the Government, if any, is clothed with the power under the Constitution to count the electoral votes and declare the result?

In making such count is such officer or department of the Government clothed with power to reject the electoral vote or votes of a

If an electoral vote or votes may be rejected how and under what circumstances may it be done?

These are questions of the most delicate and important character, both in their bearing on the relation of the States to the National Government and in their bearing on the relation of the legislative and executive departments of the General Government to each other. They involve considerations the correct solution of which is essential to the harmonious working of the State and National Governments and vital to the peace and permanence of the Union. In the presence of such tremendous interests party spirit should stand rebuked, all passion, bitterness and excitement should be hushed into silence. Any attempt by partisan conventions and inflammatory and warlike threats to influence or overawe the tribunal charged by the Constitution with the duty of deciding these great questions is a crime of the most flagrant character. It is the highest political crime; it is a mistake. The people want peace; they want a right decision in the interest of peace. But with agitation and excitement aroused by partisan criminations, a single indiscretion may light a torch which will explode the magazine of latent passion and envelope the country in the flames of civil discord. Partisan conventions, local, State, and national, are a menace to peace and good order whenever society is agitated by conflicting emotions or is nearly evenly divided on questions of great public interest.

If a national convention of the character suggested by some Jacobin spirits, anxious for cheap notoriety, did convene, if it did not throw the nation into anarchy it would greatly augment the chances of that calamity. It is a gratifying and hopeful sign, full of inspiration for the lover of his country, that the great and patriotic masses of our countrymen of all parties remain calm and serene amid this storm. I take it as an admonition to their representatives to occupy the same high and patriotic ground. For one I shall endeavor to do it. The success of this or that party is of little moment so long as peace is preserved and the Constitution in all its parts maintained, respected, and cheerfully obeyed. Parties may rise and fall without detriment, nay, with profit to the country. The fabric of constitutional government erected by the wisdom and sanctified by the toil and blood of our fathers cannot fall without ruin and disaster to the people. Any attampt by agree to decide questions of constitutional law must end attempt by arms to decide questions of constitutional law must end in the destruction of the Constitution itself. It must plunge the people into a gulf shoreless and fathomless, lighted only by the glare and murky with the sulphurous smoke of battle. The highest patriotism, the highest statesmanship, alike demand that these questions shall be settled in the forum of debate and by the light of reason.

I propose to examine these questions, anxious alone to reach a correct conclusion. A sense of patriotic duty impels me to seek the true meaning of the Constitution, and when I have ascertained what I believe it is I shall be governed by it.

First. What officer or department of the Government, if any, is clothed with the power under the Constitution to count the electoral votes and declare the result? The only language in the Constitution directly bearing on the energies is as follows: directly bearing on the question is as follows:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. Article 12.

What is the meaning of this language? There has been a divergence of opinion on the question dating back to a period almost contemporaneous with the adoption of the Constitution. Many men of learning and eminence have at different periods insisted that the right and duty of counting the electoral vote are devolved on the President and duty of counting the electoral vote are devolved on the President of the Senate. Of this number, some have contended that the count is purely ministerial, involving only an arithmetical compilation of numbers and a declaration of the result thus arrived at. They argue that a fair construction of the different clauses of the Constitution establishes the conclusion that the election of the President and Vice-President was intended to be confided to the States; that the States are exclusively and without power of review vested with power to appoint electors of President and Vice-President in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct: that the States were igalous of the Legislature thereof may direct; that the States were jealous of the exertion of national authority and would never have consented to the exertion of national authority and would never have consented to grant to the General Government a right to review the decision of State, and perhaps to defeat its right to have any voice in so important and interesting a function as that of choosing a Chief Magistrate; that to concede to the President of the Senate any jurisdiction or discretionary power would enable one man, perhaps chosen from among the body of the people for the sole purpose, to override the clearly expressed will of the people and thus defeat the very object sought to be accomplished by the framers of the Constitution; that the authors of the Constitution and the people who adopted it could never have meant to place such vast power in the hands of any one man, however exalted his station. Hence this class of reasoners have strenuously maintained that, while the President of the Senate alone possessed the constitutional power to open and count the electoral votes, he must count the votes as they were transmitted to him if votes, he must count the votes as they were transmitted to him if authenticated in due form; that the remedy for fraud or other wrong was by an appeal to the people when another opportunity occurred for the exercise of their constitutional power in choosing presidential electors.

Another electors

Another class of reasoners, who maintain that the President of the Another class of reasoners, who maintain that the Frestdent of the Senate is vested with the power of counting the electoral vote, insist, however, that he is possessed of limited judicial powers in the execution of this duty. They argue that, being in direct terms charged with the duty of opening all the certificates of electoral votes, he must have the power of deciding what are such certificates as are meant by the Constitution; that, as there can be only one electoral college lawfully appointed by a State, when there are transmitted to him there are transmitted. to him two or more sets of papers purporting to be certificates, he must decide between them and ascertain, open, and count the gen-nine; that, to enable him to do this, he may officially take notice of the result of the election in each State, to determine who were ap-pointed electors, whether they were eligible to be appointed, and the genuineness of their signatures to the certificates of votes; that he may acquire this knowledge historically or in such other manner as he shall think best; that it could not have been intended to have every certificate apparently in due form counted without any power to inquire into its authenticity; that such a construction of the Constitution would invite its own overthrow by opening the door to the reception of fraudulent votes without any power of correcting the

This divergence in the views of those who maintain the power of the President of the Senate to count the electoral votes and the dangerous consequences which might and doubtless would result in practice from carrying either of the above theories to its logical conclusions would seem to throw doubt upon the existence of such power; and this doubt is confirmed by giving attention to the principal arguments adduced to prove the existence of this power in the President of the Senate. Those who maintain that he is clothed with this power argue that the Constitution does not give the power to the Senate and House in terms to count the votes or to decide any question in regard to that matter; that the "counting the electoral vote" is not the exercise of any legislative power; that Congress cannot take the power by implication, for it has no implied powers, except such as are necessary to carry out and put in operation those expressed; that the Constitution of the United States is a delegation of power, and is distinguished from a State constitution, which is a reserration of power, and that it thence follows that Congress can do only those things which it is authorized to do, while a State Legislature may do anything not prohibited; that there is no express power granted the two Houses except to be present; that the being present implies a mere passive state or condition; that the only affirmative act specially required to be performed is by the President of the Senate, who is to open the certificates; that to open the certificates does not mean simply to break the seals, but to publish and make known the contents and declare the result.

The foregoing I believe is a fair summary of the arguments adduced to prove that the Constitution has invested the power in the President of the Senate, to the exclusion of Congress, to open, count, and declare the result of the electoral votes. If he is clothed with this great power, it cannot be delegated or surrendered by him, nor can Congress challenge or interfere with his exercise of it. He must hold it irrevocably, except there be an amendment of the Constitution, for weal or woe. It is true that nearly fifty years ago Chancellor Kent cautiously expressed the opinion that in the absence of legislation the President of the Senate was to count the votes. So believed

Henry Clay, who declared-

Unless the two Houses of Congress agree upon a different method the President of the Senate would proceed to open and count the votes.

Such, too, was the practice from 1789 to 1825. On each occasion between those periods the President of the Senate gave a certificate to the officers elected, declaring that he had counted the votes. He seems to have overlooked the real difficulty. If the Constitution invests him with the power to count he must exercise the power, and no legislation can place the right or power elsewhere. If the Constitution does not give him the power to count then he can acquire it only by the act or consent of Congress, in which case he would perform the duty as the mere hand or organ of Congress. I believe that if Congress failed to make provision to regulate the count, and both Houses met in the manner provided by the Constitution to attend the count, the President of the Senate would be authorized to count the votes on the principle of implied consent and to effectuate the obvious purpose of the convention. Perhaps this is what the learned judge meant, and, if so, I assent to it.

The Constitution clearly requires the President of the Senate as such to perform only one single act in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives. He must open all the certificates transmitted to him. He has no discretion to open some and fail to open others. All must be opened in the presence of the two Houses. After the certificates are opened one additional thing remains to be done: "The votes shall then be counted." The Constitution does not in terms say who shall count them or what scrutiny they shall undergo. terms say who shall count them or what scrutiny they shall undergo. The framers of the Constitution, in reference to every other officer who was to perform any important constitutional functions, have designated him by name in connection with the enumeration of his powers. If this, the greatest power which can be delegated to man, was intended to be confided to the President of the Senate, it is marvelous that he is not directly charged with it, as he is with all his other powers of less importance. The sages of the Constitution were too cautious and apt in legal phraseology to have adopted the language used if they had intended to confer this power on him. The apt and natural language to have conferred the power would have been: "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and then count the votes." then count the votes.'

We find a duty enjoined, "the votes shall then be counted," but how or by whom is not stated. The imposition of a duty must of necessity imply the power in some officer or department of the Government to perform it. It cannot execute itself. Hence the power, the right to count rests somewhere and somebody must execute the duty. The power to count not being in terms confided to any par-ticular officer, it must reside in some one of the great departments of ticular officer, it must reside in some one of the great departments of the Government. It is in its nature a political power, and hence it must reside in Congress as the repository of that power. No one I apprehend will insist that the power resides in either the executive or judicial departments of the Government. The power resides in the Government of the United States to count; it is vested there in apt and suitable words. The powers vested in the Government can only be exerted and executed by Congress, unless some officer or department is in express terms clothed with them. Every power conferred by the Constitution, unless specifically and in terms confided elsewhere, must reside in Congress. It is the great reservoir in which is absorbed every power not otherwise appropriated or reserved. This is a political axiom necessarily resulting from our form of representative Government.

This is a pointest axiom necessarily resulting from our form of representative Government.

This principle perhaps can be demonstrated with equal precision in another way. The power to count the votes is vested by the Constitution somewhere in the Government of the United States. It cannot be claimed to exist elsewhere. The power, the duty is "the votes shall then be counted." Now the Constitution in express terms provides thatThe Congress shall have power * * * to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Here is the constitutional power to count the votes granted. No person is in terms empowered to do it. Congress shall have power, the Constitution declares, to make all laws necessary to carry into execution all powers vested in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. To my mind the conclusion is irresistible that this power to count can be carried into execution by no other officer or department of the Government but Congress.

But it is argued that the precedents, the practical contemporaneous construction of the Constitution are otherwise; that for many years after the adoption of the Constitution, while the framers of it were living actors in giving form and character to our institutions, the President of the Senate invariably counted the electoral votes. I do not think upon any fair construction of the precedents that they will sustain this view. The first count of the electoral votes in 1789 is claimed to be a precedent sustaining the right of the President of the Senate to count. This count was made by John Langdon, President pro tempore of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses of Conpro tempore of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses of Congress. It was necessary, in order to set in motion the new government, to elect a President of the Senate at least for the purpose of opening the certificates. He was elected for the purpose of both opening and counting the electoral votes. The House was notified of the purpose of Mr. Langdon's election. The House resolution on the subject is not reported, but the substance of it is contained in the message of the House to the Senate through one of its members, Mr. Ellsworth. He said to the Senate that the House is ready to meet the Senate that the Gounting of the votes of the Ellsworth. He said to the Senate that the House is ready to meet the Senate to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the President and Vice-President of the United States. It therefore appears that both the Senate and House by vote authorized the President pro tempore of the Senate to count as well as to open the votes of the electors. True, the authority to count was not conferred by direct formal enactment; but the action of the two Houses, although informal, was a sufficient authority to have constituted him their agent to count the votes. Hence, this cannot fairly be claimed as settling any construction of the Constitution favorable to the powers of the President of the Senate in opposition to that of to the powers of the President of the Senate in opposition to that of

At the second and every subsequent presidential election the Senate and House have always, without question, asserted and exercised ate and House have always, without question, asserted and exercised the right to ascertain the mode of examining the votes of President and Vice-President. This power to examine the votes involves the right of control and the power of judgment. The particular mode of examination has been by tellers appointed by each House. The tellers have always received the certificates and made a list of the votes. The proceedings had in 1793 show clearly enough that the power of the President of the Senate to count the electoral votes was practically decided.

tically denied. The record says:

The two Houses having accordingly assembled, the certificates of the electors of the fifteen States in the Union which came by express, were by the Vice-President opened, read, and delivered to the tellers appointed for the purpose, who, having examined and ascertained the votes, presented a list of them to the Vice-President, which list was read to the two Houses.

The practice then adopted has always since been substantially followed. The two Houses, through their tellers, have always examined and ascertained the votes and presented a list of them to the President of the Senate. If any doubt existed as to the true construc-President of the Senate. If any doubt existed as to the true construction of the Constitution, the Senate and House have so long and uniformly asserted a paramount and supervisory power over the count that it cannot now be questioned. It is not only a contemporaneous construction of the Constitution, but it has been the continuous and uniform practice since. The question of the power of Congress to control and regulate the subject of counting the votes of the electors came before Congress distinctly in 1800. While many distinguished men discussed the question of providing by law for deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President and for determining the legality or illegality of the votes given for these officers in the different States, very few asserted the power of the President of the Senate over the count of the electoral votes. Mr. Pinckney, who opposed legislation on the foregoing subjects, stated that—

It is made their duty to count over the votes in a convention of both Houses, and for the President of the Senate to declare who has the majority of the votes of the electors transmitted.

And the Senate by a vote of 16 to 12 asserted the power of Congress over the whole subject of deciding disputed elections and determining over the whole subject of deciding disputed elections and determining the legality or illegality of electoral votes. The House by the decisive vote of 73 to 15 asserted the same doctrine.

Again, in 1824 the Senate passed a bill asserting the same principle. The bill went to the House, was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and reported back to the House favorably and without amendment by that great constitutional lawyer, Daniel Webster. Thus the Senate and the Judiciary Committee of the House were committed to the doctrine asserted by so extends a majority of the House with 1800.

the doctrine asserted by so strong a majority of the House in 1800.

If any further proof were needed that Congress is possessed of the power to count the votes of electors and determine their legality or illegality, it is afforded by the uniform practice of the Senate and House to assert and exercise such power whenever an electoral vote has been discreted. been disputed. It was asserted in 1817 upon the occasion of exception being taken to the electoral vote of Indiana. It was again asserted in 1821 upon the occasion of exception being taken to the electoral vote of Missouri. It was again asserted in 1837 upon the occasion of exception being taken to the electoral vote of Michigan. The fact relied upon to invalidate the electoral vote of these States was that they had not been invalidate the electoral vote of these States was that they had not been formally declared by act of Congress admitted into the Union before the appointing of their electors. The power of Congress to inquire into electoral votes and supervise and control the count was again asserted in 1857 on the occasion of exception being taken to the electoral vote of Wisconsin. The ground of exception was that the electoral vote of Wisconsin. The ground of exception was that the electoral 1856, as required by law. The electors had been delayed by a severe snow-storm and were unable to meet until the day after the time fixed by law for so doing. Here are four distinct occasions when exceptions were taken to electoral votes, and on each occasion the Senate retired to its Chamber and the two. Honses separately considered the objectors. to its Chamber and the two Houses separately considered the objec-

Had Congress on these several occasions believed that the power to count the votes of the electors was vested in the President of the Senate, and not in it, and that the sole function of the two Houses be present at the count, it seems incredible that they should

was to be present at the count, it seems incredible that they should have taken the action they did.

The action of Congress in 1865 growing out of the unsettled and anomalous condition of the States lately in rebellion led to the adoption of the twenty-second joint rule of the two Houses. The action thus taken could only be vindicated on the theory that Congress possessed full and ample authority over the whole subject. While I cannot doubt-that some of the principles embodied in the twenty-second joint rule were wrong and violative of the true intent of the Constitution, I do not entertain this opinion from any belief that Congress does not possess constitutional authority over the count. The provision in the joint rule that no electoral vote could be counted without the consent of both Houses seems to me to be a doctrine ill-founded in law and most dangerous in its tendencies. Such a principle founded in law and most dangerous in its tendencies. Such a principle never ought to have been adopted, and its abrogation by the Senate was justified by a due regard for the Constitution and the rights and dignity of the States.

Such uniformity and weight of authority leave no doubt upon my mind that the power to count the electoral votes resides in Congress. And this power, correctly speaking, is neither judicial nor ministerial, but political.

may be and doubtless is true that the thought lying in the minds of the framers of the Constitution never touched the questions now confronting us. When the Constitution was framed there were thirteen States each with perfect organization. A national government was about to be instituted. It was believed that the States could be safely trusted with the appointment of electors. It was expected that the States would choose electors from its citizens most eminent in ability and weighty in character; that the electors, animated by a lofty sense of patriotic duty, and from a calm and dispassionate survey of the interests of the whole country, would select a President and Vice-President from its most illustrious citizens, and not confine their choice to previously designated candidates of party conven-

It doubtless never entered the minds of the sages of the Constitu-tion that more than one electoral college would claim to be appointed in any State, nor that two sets of certificates from rival electoral col-leges would ever be transmitted to the President of the Senate. They provided for a condition of peace and good order; for an honest vote as well as an honest count and an honest return. Entertaining such sentiments, the count would be considered a duty involving little or no difficulty. It would involve no inquiry; it would require no investigation. It would be a duty which could as well be performed by a clerk or a page, as by a Washington or a Lincoln. It could as well be intrusted to the President of the Senate as to Congress or the Supreme Court. Perhaps it is fortunate that the fathers did not foresee the evil times on which we are fallen. It would have been another and perhaps fatal obstacle to the formation of a national government.

While such was the underlying thought, it is but another proof While such was the underlying thought, it is but another proof that national life and growth enlarge or narrow the construction of general constitutional expressions so as to adapt them to the various conditions and novel questions constantly arising in the progress of nations. It demonstrates that national life and growth flow in no predetermined channels; and that they build wisest who build to meet the largest variety of human contingencies.

Second. In making such count is Congress vested with power to reject the latteral votes of a State and if so lower and under what reject the electoral vote of a State; and, if so, how and under what circumstances may it be done?

In considering this proposition we find ourselves confronted by arious theories. By one class of reasoners it is argued that no vote various theories. can be counted without the consent of Congress first obtained; that this consent is always implied when a vote is counted and recorded on the Journals of the two Houses without objection; that where on the Journals of the two Houses without objection; that where objection is made by any member of Congress to an electoral vote, it cannot be counted without an express decision of Congress in favor of it. By some it is claimed that the two Houses meet for this purpose in joint convention and that the votes of the Senators and Representatives are to be taken per capita. By another class it is claimed that the Houses meet in their separate organic capacities; that when any question arises for consideration the two bodies must separate, deliberate, and vote in their respective Chambers; that unless both Houses concur in overruling the objection, it must prevail and the vote be lost; that in determining what votes shall be counted the Congress may go behind the authentication of the electoral college, Congress may go behind the authentication of the electoral college, behind the certificate of the governor and secretary of state, behind the seal of State, behind the returns of the State returning or canvassing board, and inquire for itself what was the true state of the vote for electors; that Congress may investigate all questions of fraud and violence attending the election in a State, and if a different conclusion is reached on that question from that reached by the State tribunals, it may reverse and nullify such decision; that in the last analysis Congress is to determine for itself whether the State has appointed electors and who were so appointed; that in prosecuting this inquiry it possesses a final and uncontrollable authority, so that this inquiry it possesses a final and uncontrollable authority, so that it may in its own good pleasure, and for such reasons as seem to it sufficient, reject the votes of any or all of the States, however regular and complete their authentication. This class of reasoners hold that it is a great national returning board, vested with unlimited power, and that it may count in or out whom it pleases by rejecting the electoral votes of States, and that it may wholly defeat an election by the people, and, by throwing the election into the House always draw to itself the power of choosing a President.

Another class of reasoners argue that the election of a President

Another class of reasoners argue that the election of a President was confided exclusively to the States; that it was intended to remove the election as far as possible from the influence or control of any department of the National Government; that the States were jealous of the exertion of any influence in this important function by Congress; that this jealousy is made manifest by forbidding the ap-pointment of any Senator or Representative in Congress as an elector, and by providing that when the election of a President should devolve upon the House the Representatives should vote not in their ordivoive upon the House the Representatives should vote not in their ordinary capacity, but as the delegates of their States and as a secondary electoral college; that the sole duty of Congress is to count the electoral votes; that the duty to count does not include the power to reject; that the only power possessed by Congress is to ascertain whether the votes laid before it are so authenticated as to furnish prima facie evidence of their genuineness; that there is no power vested in Congress to control or reverse the action of the proper tribunals of the States; that Congress may examine the directions of the Legislature, and if the proper tribunal created by the State has decided that certain persons have been appointed electors their appointment is binding on Congress and can only be questioned by a proper tribunal authorized by the State to hear and decide such a contest; that, in fine, the power of Congress is, first, to count only such votes as the President of the Senate opens and lays before it, and, second, in mak-

President of the Senate opens and may before u, and, second, it making such count its duty is merely ministerial.

These widely divergent views show the difficulty to be encountered in settling such grave and delicate constitutional questions in a numerous political body animated by party hopes and passions. It seems to me, however, that some questions on this subject may be considered or satisfied.

1. The two Houses meet in their separate organic character and so not mingled in one common mass as a joint convention. This are not mingled in one common mass as a joint convention. This conclusion seems inevitable from the language of the Constitution, "the Senate and House of Representatives" are to meet as such. Again, the uniform and unvarying practice of Congress from the organization of the Government recognizes the integral character of each body. On every occasion when any question has arisen for consideration during the count the two Houses have separated. These considerations seem decisive of the question.

2. As the duty enjoined upon the two Houses is to count the votes it would seem to follow that the dissent of one House could not defeat the performance of this constitutional duty. The objection to a vote is in the nature of an exception, and on principle and authora vote is in the nature of an exception, and on principle and authority the supervising tribunal cannot upon an equal division sustain such exception. On an equal division the vote must stand and the exception fail. This conclusion would seem to be strengthened from the fact that the Houses act separately; that they are equal and possessed of co-ordinate power. If the House of Representatives may by its dissent defeat the vote of a State, these consequences would follow: (1) Greater effect is attributed to the negation of the House than to the affirmation of the Senate, otherwise the prima facie right of the State to have its vote counted could not be overcome thereby; (2) the House, which is vested with power to elect a President on the failure of the electoral college to elect, could always create the contingency and thus for ever defeat any election by the people in the mode provided by the Constitution. This last consideration would seem a conclusive answer to the claim that no vote can be counted without the concurrence of the House.

It seems incredible that the authors of the Constitution, who were of itseems incredible that the authors of the Constitution, who were so jealous of the rights of the people of the States to elect a President and Vice-President without congressional control that they forbade the appointment of a Representative as an elector, should have purposely put the power into the hands of the Representatives of always defeating the very object sought with so much care to be accomplished. It would have better comported with the wisdom attributed to them, if they did intend to grant this power to the House, to have in the first instance confided the appointment of a President to the Representatives. This claim of the House is manifestly unfounded. No such folly can be attributed to them. Nor ought this question longer to be considered an open one. On the 1st of May, 1800, the House of Representatives passed an act prescribing the mode of counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. The bill came from the Senate and was greatly United States. The bill came from the Senate and was greatly changed in the House by amendment. In the eighth section of the act it is provided as follows:

And if the two Houses have concurred in rejecting the vote or votes objected to, such vote or votes shall not be counted; but unless both Houses concur such vote or votes shall be counted.

The bill passed the House by a vote of 52 ayes to 37 noes.

On the 2d of May, 1800, the Senate took into consideration the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill for deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President, and they were referred to Messrs. Ross, Dexter, and Livermore to report thereon. On the 8th of May, 1800, Mr. Ross, from that committee, reported amendments thereto. Among others, in section 8, to strike out of the above-quoted clause the word "rejecting" and insert in lieu thereof the word "admitting;" so that the clause would read:

And if the two Houses have concurred in admitting the vote or votes objected to, such vote or votes shall be counted; but unless both Houses concur, such vote or votes shall not be counted.

The amendment was adopted in the Senate by a vote of 15 for to 11 against it. Some other amendments reported were agreed to in the Senate, and the bill, as amended, passed by a vote of 16 for to 11 against the measure. On the 9th of May, 1800, the House received the bill with the Senate amendments, one of which, "respecting the election of President," was, instead of the word "rejecting" (in the bill) any vote or votes by a concurrent vote of the two Houses, the word "admitting" was proposed by the Senate.

Mr. Harper and Mr. Bayard hoped the House would not concur, as this amendment very materially changed the principle of the bill, inasmuch as it would put it in the power of one or two members of either House to require the majority of both Houses to admit a vote inasmuch as it would put it in the power of one or two members of either House to require the majority of both Houses to admit a vote or votes in default of which the whole votes of a State might be totally rejected; that this was contrary to the former will of the House after mature deliberation. The yeas and nays were called by Mr. Nicholas on the question, "Shall the amendments of the Senate be concurred in?" and was decided in the negative—yeas 15, nays 73. The Senate by the vote of 16 yeas to 11 nays adhered to their amendments. The House adhered to their disagreement and refused to recede and the bill was lost. It will be borne in mind that this occasion. ments. The House adhered to their disagreement and refused to recede, and the bill was lost. It will be borne in mind that this occurred within eleven years from the time of the adoption of the Constitution, when many of the great men who had participated in its framing and adoption were still in public life. The Senate was nearly evenly balanced on the question, while the vote of the House stood almost five to one in favor of the doctrine that an electoral vote could only be rejected by the concurrence of both Houses. It will also be observed by an examination of the recorded vote that both in the Senate and the House the division was very closely on party lines; the federalists voting in favor of the doctrine that each House must concurr to justify the reception of an electoral vote, and the republicans voting that it required the concurrent vote of the two Houses to reject it. to reject it. It may seem surprising to some that the democracy of to-day stand on the ground occupied by the old federal party in the days of the alien and sedition laws. It is only another proof that a political organization may be held together by the cohesive attraction of public plunder long after every distinctive principle of the party has perished. It may be said of the democratic party, Stat nominis magni umbra. It stands the shadow of a great name—the substance, the reality, are forever dead. This solemn and authoritative contemporaneous decision of the power of the House under the Constitution could be a found to the constitution of great party available to the constitution of the power of the standard party and the constitution of great party available. ought to bind us. Surely in time of great party excitement we can do no better than to stand where the fathers stood by so overwhelming a majority.

Nor is this the only solemn precedent we have for our guidance on this question. On the 16th of December, 1823, Mr. Eaton, a Senator from Tennessee, offered a resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee of that body to inquire if any, and what, amendments are necessary to an act entitled "An act relative to the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President in case of vacancies in the offices of both President and Vice-President," passed the 1st of March, 1792. This resolution was agreed to. On the 4th of March, 1824, Mr. Van Buren, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported to the Senate a bill "in addition to the act relative to the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States." This bill contained a provision in the fifth section as follows: vision in the fifth section as follows:

And if the two Houses have concurred in rejecting the vote or votes objected to such vote or votes shall not be counted; but unless both Houses concur such vote or votes shall be counted.

This passed the Senate April 19, 1842, and was sent to the House. It was there referred to the Judiciary Committee, and on the 10th of May it was reported to the House without amendment by Mr. Webster. It was committed to the Committee of the Whole House, where it was never considered. The only exception to the doctrine that it required the concurrence of both Houses to reject a vote or votes is found in the twenty-second joint rule, a rule growing out of the exigencies of the war. This feature of the rule received no serious consideration at the time of its adoption. When attention was drawn to it this feature met the strongest reprobation, and before the commencement of the last campaign it was repudiated by the Senate. Senators of all political opinions united in condemnation of it. It cannot prove profitable to protract the discussion of this question

If any doubt existed as to the true intent and meaning of the Constitution, looking alone to the language employed, none can be left when we examine it in the light shed upon it by the great and illustrious men who were living actors in the great drama of setting in motion the Government under the Constitution. Penetrated by a pro-found knowledge of the instrument they fashioned, they left as a dying testimony to posterity the solemn judgment that the concurrence of both Houses of Congress was required to justify the rejection of an electoral vote. Let us be wise and heed their voice.

3. This brings me to consider under what circumstances an electoral vote may be rejected. Admitting as I do that by the concurrence of the two Houses an electoral vote or votes may be rejected, still it of the two Houses an electoral vote or votes may be rejected, still it must be evident that Congress must be governed by fixed and settled principles of law and fact to justify such rejection. It would be abhorrent to our sense of justice and repugnant to the soundest principles of constitutional law to admit that Congress possessed an arbitrary and uncontrollable power over this subject. Their decision must be reached by legal methods, and in pursuance of the powers delegated to them in the Constitution. The consideration of this question necessarily turns upon the following words found in the Constitution:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.—Article 2, section 1.

to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.—Article 2, section 1.

The statement of a few elementary principles will aid us in this discussion. The powers possessed by Congress are delegated to it in the Constitution by the people of the States. Its powers are distinguished from those possessed by a State Legislature in this, that the Legislature of the State is possessed of complete and sovereign power, except in so far as its power is limited by constitutional inhibition. The Congress possesses no powers except such as are conferred upon it in express terms or by fair implication. The powers of the State Legislature are inherent; the powers of Congress are delegated. the State Legislature are inherent; the powers of Congress are delegated and derivative from the people of the States. Whenever Congress would do a lawful act it must find its warrant of authority in the Constitution.

It is admitted that in the enumeration of powers granted to Congress in article 1, section 8, of the Constitution no authority is con-ferred upon it in relation to the election of a President and Vice-President. The whole power of Congress over the subject must rest upon those clauses of the Constitution found in article 2, section 1, article 12, and article 14, section 3. The twelfth article relates so far as electors are concerned to the manner in which they are to perform their duties, and is unimportant in this discussion. The third section of the fourteenth article declares that certain classes of persons who have been engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof, shall not be electors. Hence if Congress possesses any power in relation to the appointment of electors it must be found in the clause in article 2,

It has been argued that the right of the States to appoint electors is delegated to it by the Constitution, and that in consequence Congress has the right to supervise the action of the States in the execution of the power. I do not concede that this right of supervision would follow if we were to admit that the power in the State was delegated to it. On the theory that the power of the State has been delegated to it, the legislature would necessarily possess the same authority over the subject as Congress would if this power had been delegated to it. The people, acting by States for the accomplishment of certain ob-jects, delegated certain powers to one body and certain other powers jects, delegated certain powers to one body and certain other powers to another body. Each delegated body deduces its power from a common principal, and neither can interfere with the other in the execution of the delegated powers unless by express authority. Where a common source of power, i.e., the people in the Constitution, charges one delegated body with the performance of a specific duty, no other delegated body charged with the performance of other duties can claim any implied power to interfere with or supervise the execution of the duty devolved upon the other body. The two stand exactly equal. They deduce their powers each from the same common source. Each is co-ordinate, and must be wholly independent of the other in the execution of the duties confided to it by the same constitution. Hence Congress deducing its authority from the same constitution. Hence Congress, deducing its authority from the same constitution. Hence Congress, deducing its authority from the same common source as the State, cannot be possessed of power over the State in relation to the appointment of electors unless this paramount power is given in terms to it. But it is admitted that it is nowhere given in terms. Thus much on the theory that the power of the States to appoint electors is in the proper sense a delegated power. But it seems to me clear that the power possessed by the States is in no sense a delegated power. The States, i. e., the original thirteen, existed before the Constitution was framed. These States each had an inherent right to have a voice in the selection of any expression.

had an inherent right to have a voice in the selection of any common ruler over the whole. This right was clear and undeniable. Unless the people of the States surrendered this right to a common government about to be established under the Constitution, they have never parted with it. This, manifestly, would be true as regards the original thirteen States of the Union. The States since admitted possess, by the express language of the Constitution in this regard, all the rights, dignity, and equality of the original States of the Union. Hence it follows that, unless the power of appointing the electors of President or Vice-President, or of supervising their appointment by the States has been in terms delegated to Congress, it remains in each State. The framers of the Constitution, jealous of the rights of the States and anxious to retain every power not inconsistent with the existence of the Government about to be organized by them, in express terms declared that this original inherent power of the States should still remain in and be executed by them. It is an abuse of terms of modern growth and of more degenerate times to speak about the Constitution delegating rights or powers to the States. The States were the source of all power. Such power as was not specifically delegated to the General Government still remains with the States or the people thereof. And that there should exist no doubt on this question the sages of the Constitution set it at rest. Article 10 pro-

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohib ited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

The power to appoint electors of President and Vice-President is not delegated to the United States. It is not prohibited to the States. Hence it remains where it existed, in the States respectively. This conclusion is inevitable both upon principle and from the explicit language of the Constitution. The power to appoint electors then being a right absolutely reserved to the States, it is a power above and beyond Federal control. In reference to this there was no conflict of opinion among the great men fresh from their labors in framing the Constitution. In March, 1800, Mr. Pinckney said:

lifet of opinion among the great men fresh from their labors in framing the Constitution. In March, 1800, Mr. Pinckney said:

Knowing that it was the intention of the Constitution to make the President completely independent of the Federal Legislature, I well remember it was the object, as it is at present not only the spirit but the letter of that instrument, to give to Congress no interference in or control over the election of a President. It is made their duty to count over the votes in a convention of both Houses, and for the President of the Senate to declare who has a majority of the votes of the electors transmitted. It never was intended, nor could it have been safe, in the Constitution to have given to Congress thus assembled in convention the right to object to any vote, or even to question whether they were constitutionally or properly given. This right of determining on the manner in which the electors shall vote, the inquiry into the qualifications, and the guards that are necessary to prevent disqualified or improper men voting, and to insure the votes being legally given, rests and is exclusively vested in the State Legislatures. If it is necessary to have guards against improper election of electors and to institute tribunals to inquire into their qualifications, with the State Legislatures, and with them alone, rests the power to institute them, and they must exercise it. To give to Congress, even when assembled in convention, a right to reject or admit the votes of States, would have been so gross and dangerous an absurdity as the framers of the Constitution never could have been guilty of. How could they expect that in deciding on the election of a President, particularly where such election was strongly contested, that party spirit would not prevail and govern every decision! Did they not know how easy it was to raise objections against the votes of particular elections, and that in determining upon these it was more than probable that members would recollect their sides, their favorite can

Attention to the language of the Constitution will show the extent of the power of Congress to make inquiry into this subject. "Each State shall appoint electors," &c. Congress must have power to determine whether the electors are appointed by a State of the Union. That is a political question which is open to inquiry where it has not been settled so as not to be irrevocably set at rest. Whenever all three of the great departments of the Government have recognized the existence of a State as a member of the Union, its State existence can-not be questioned by a single department. Would it be competent for Congress alone to deny that Indiana is a State of the Union? question is open to Congress further than to inquire whether a State has been admitted into the Union, and when admitted its right to be recognized as a State is beyond the power of Congress except by law. Hence no question is open on this head so far as Florida and Louisiana are concerned.

2. The State shall appoint electors "in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct." Congress certainly can do no more than to 2. The State shall appoint electors "in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct." Congress certainly can do no more than to examine the directions of the State Legislature to see in what manner the electors are directed to be appointed. The manner of their appointment is absolutely and without power of review reserved to the State Legislature. The mode of appointment may be very foolish or very wise, but the right is not given to us to sit in judgment upon it. The Legislature may itself appoint the electors as has often land. it. The Legislature may itself appoint the electors, as has often happened. It may confide the appointment to the governor, or, as often happens, to a majority of the electors appointed when a vacancy

It may confide the appointment to a returning board, if you please, and the appointment is as constitutionally binding as though every man, woman, and child in the State had concurred in it.

But it is argued that in Louisiana the Legislature directed the appointment of electors by popular vote and declared that the persons having a majority of votes should be appointed electors; that the returning board of that State has overturned the will of the State as expressed at the heallet have and appoint the state as expressed at the ballot-box, and wrongfully given the certificates of election to the men who received a minority of the votes; that the character of the men composing the returning board is bad, so bad that nobody has any confidence in anything they may do. It will not be necessary to spend much time in disposing of the question of character. If I were disposed to indulge in the argumentum ad hominem, I think I could easily demonstrate that in all the essentials of manhood they were quite the peers of many men who with extended hood they were quite the peers of many men who with extended palms and upturned eyes were calling Heaven to witness that no such infamous men ever before held official position.

But it seems to me puerile to attempt to impeach the decision of a court of competent jurisdiction by attacking the character of the judge. It would be a novel spectacle indeed for an attorney to urge an appellate court to nullify the decision of the court below because the judge's character was not as spotless as the fastidious tastes of the appellant's attorney might demand. An attorney who would induce in such discussion in a court would be esteemed at the least dulge in such discussion in a court would be esteemed at the least unwise. It would be indelicate to characterize the same practice when indulged in here when the gravest and most delicate constitutional questions are under consideration. It is sufficient to say that the question of character has nothing to do with the discussion, and that it is introduced only for bad party purposes.

The State Legislature has the power to constitute tribunals to ascertain and determine the state of the vote. It may make the deciscertain and determine the state of the vote. It may make the decision of such tribunal either prima facie or conclusive evidence of the title to an office. If such tribunal is vested with the power by law to ascertain and decide the legality or illegality of the vote cast at a polling-precinct, no one can question the decision except in a tribunal created by the State for that purpose. The Constitution declaring as it does that the Legislature may direct how the electors shall be appointed, no one can deny the right of the State Legislature to direct their appointment by the majority of votes as finally determined by any tribunal it may designate. It will not do to say that because the tribunal has reached a wrong conclusion that therefore the electors designated are not lawfully appointed by the State. To deny their lawful appointment would unsettle all rightful authority and leave every man to act on his own judgment. It would lead to anarchy. It would destroy all constitutional government. The argument that a would destroy all constitutional government. The argument that a decision is wrong and hence is not binding, is not lawful, unsettles the very foundations of government and strikes a fatal blow at the social compact. The majority of the States believed the decision in the Dred Scott case was not correct, and yet all yielded obedience to it. To have resisted it would have been a crime. All tribunals may err. They may reach a conclusion unfounded in law and unsupported by evidence; it must be respected and obeyed until reversed. The decision is the law of the case. It is the voice of the State expressed in the only mode the State can speak. It is binding on us if binding in the State. The Constitution (article 4, section 1) implies as much:

Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State.

The acts and proceeding of each State being entitled to full faith and credit in every State, are entitled to the same faith and credit here. The acts and proceedings of each State bind every man in every State, and every right affected by them, as fully and completely as they bind the people of the State. It is the law of comity sanctified by the voice of the Constitution.

The Congress can go no further, without lawless usurpation, than to inquire what direction the Legislature has given; to see whether the tribunal empowered by law to decide has decided who have received a majority of the lawful votes of the State. When Congress ascertains what that decision is it is the end of controversy, because the State has so determined.

I shall not discuss the law under which the board in Louisiana acted. It is sufficient to affirm, as I do affirm, that the Legislature of the State gave it ample power to hear and determine all the questions passed upon by it; and that the supreme court of that State has decided the law constitutional and the decisions of the board as to the true state of the vote conclusive and final.

These conclusions seem to me to be the true principles deducible from the Constitution:

1. Congress may by appropriate legislation supervise and regulate the count of the electoral vote.

the count of the electoral vote.

2. Whenever Congress fails to exercise its appropriate jurisdiction over the subject of the count, the President of the Senate may lawfully open the certificates, count the votes, and declare the result.

3. When Congress provides for supervising and regulating the count by legislative action, it cannot reject any electoral vote except by the separate concurrent vote of both Houses.

4. In examining the question of the appointment of electors by a State the inquiry must be limited to an ascertainment of the direction of the Legislature on the subject; and whenever the Legislature has of the Legislature on the subject; and whenever the Legislature has imposed upon any officer or tribunal the duty of counting, canvassing, and declaring the state of the vote, that is the end of the inquiry, so far as Congress is concerned.

The application of these principles will demonstrate that Hayes and Wheeler have been legally elected as President and Vice-President of the United States, as I have no doubt they have been honestly and fairly elected. Limiting the inquiry in the manner above indicated leaves the vote of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana where they lawfully belong, to be counted for the republican candidates. The same rule will give the vote of Oregon to the same candidates. The law of that State provided for the appointment of electors by popular vote. It directed that the persons having a majority of votes should be elected. It directed that the votes of the several counties should be elected. It directed that the votes of the several counties of the State when canvassed should be transmitted to the secretary of state, and that he should compile the votes and ascertain and declare the persons who had received a majority of the votes. His dnty was solely ministerial. The public records of the secretary's office furnish the evidence provided by the Legislature for ascertaining who were appointed electors in Oregon. This public record shows that the republican electors received a majority of votes, and hence they were appointed, as the Legislature directed. The act of the governor in attempting to defeat the will of the people is unavailing. It would be an everlasting reproach if the dark and perfidious scheme of defeating the will of the people by a plain defiance of the law should succeed. The attempt to obtain success by nullifying the plain and unambiguous direction of the Legislature of Oregon will plain and unambiguous direction of the Legislature of Oregon will stand out as a blot upon the history of our times. Nor will it do to attempt to draw a parallel between Oregon and Louisiana. The giving of a certificate to Cronin was in defiance alike of the clearly ing of a certificate to Cronin was in defiance alike of the clearly expressed will of the people and a plain and positive statute. The decision of the returning board was justified by the law, even if the facts were found on insufficient proof, which is denied. In Oregon the democratic governor gave a certificate to Cronin in defiance of law and popular vote. The returning board at most only rejected votes the legality of which they had a lawful jurisdiction to decide. The governor of Oregon acted without any authority of law; the returning board had a clear warrant of law for everything it did.

Beligving as Ido Lean see no precessity for greating a commission out.

Believing as I do I can see no necessity for creating a commission ontside of the Constitution and foreign to the genius of our institutions to settle this question. If we cannot agree upon the mode of counting the electoral votes, let them be counted as they have been counted on like occasions, by the President of the Senate. The power to count and to pass upon every question lawfully arising in connection therewith, it is everywhere agreed, is vested by the Constitution either in the President of the Senate or in Congress. Whether vested in the one or the other, it is a delegated power, involving the exercise of judgment and discretion.

In considering the propriety of creating a commission to decide upon the questions to be committed to its decision, four questions are necessarily involved:

1. Can we constitutionally delegate this question to such a tribunal?

2. Is the commission fitly constituted for the safe settlement of the matters confided to its decision?

3. Is its jurisdiction defined with apt and sufficient clearness?

4. Are the modes of its procedure sufficiently defined?

I have not sufficient time to enter at large upon these questions, and shall content myself with a brief statement of my conclusions

1. Can we constitutionally delegate the question of settling disputed votes to such a joint commission? Whatever power we possess over the subject of the counting of the electoral vote is a delegated power. It is a familiar principle that where a power involving discretion and judgment has been committed to any body, it cannot be by that body delegated to another. The body in whom the trust or power is confided must execute it, and none other can lawfully do so. power is confided must execute it, and none other can lawfully do so. Congress, then, cannot transfer this duty to another tribunal newly created, a stranger to the Constitution. Besides, this bill proposes to give a power to this commission to bind by its decision the judgment and conscience of either House. Its decision, except in the contingency that both Houses concur in reversing it, is final and conclusive. The reasoning which will sustain the creation of a tribunal vested with such a power would sustain the creation of a tribunal whose dewith such a power would sustain the creation of a tribunal whose decision should be final and conclusive on Congress and every other decision should be final and conclusive on Congress and every other de-partment of government. It would make the secret judgment of such a tribunal the final arbiter as to who should be the executive head of this great nation. I should be pleased to have the friends of this measure point out the clause of the Constitution authorizing Congress te farm out the discharge of its high functions or any of them to such a secret conclave. I do not propose to discuss, but only to state the constitutional difficulty. I affirm my belief that whenever we go outside of Congress to get any man or set of men for the purpose of deciding this dispute, we go outside of the letter and the spirit of the Con-

2. Is the commission fitly constituted for the safe settlement of the matters confided to its decision ?

It is safe to say that our country has never witnessed the estab-It is safe to say that our country has never witnessed the establishment of a great court on such principles. Five Senators are to be designated by the Senate by ballot. These men may all be taken from one political party or they may be chosen from each. It is probable, but not required, that there will be an equitable division between the contending parties. If this should occur, then these five members of the commission would be chosen from political considerations. The same observations would apply to the choice of the five members from the House. Here then we have ten members of the commission chosen confessedly on account of their known partisan associations and bias. But this feature in the mode of creating the commission is not the most obnoxious.

It provides for the appointment of five associate justices of the Supreme Court as members of this commission. It purposely excludes the Chief-Justice of that court as not a fit person to become a mem-ber of this new court. I look upon it as an odious and unjust reflection on a great and upright magistrate. Had the commission been composed of ten Senators and Representatives, equally divided po-litically, to be presided over by the Chief-Justice, with a right to vote on questions on which the members of the court were equally divided, it would have been more satisfactory. In addition to this the mode of choosing the judges is calculated to derogate from the weight of their opinions. Two of them are named evidently because of their being known to be democratic in politics, and the other two because of their being known to be republican in politics. The pretense of selection from geographical considerations, I may be pardoned for saying, is too puerile to deceive any one. If the distribution was to be made on geographical grounds why evaluate all that was section be made on geographical grounds, why exclude all that vast section of country stretching from the Alleghanies to the Mississippi, and from the lakes to the Gulf, from this commission? This selection is most unfortunate and unwise. If the aid of the justices of the Supreme Court were at all to be invoked, the whole court should have been selected. The fifth justice will doubtless be selected by lot. Thus the question as to which of the great political parties shall have a political majority on the commission is to be settled probably by chance. Neither party can trust to the honesty of the members of the other, and hence the question of advantage is given over to chance. How sad and humiliating, to be driven to invoke blind chance as a settlement of the grandest question ever submitted to human

Is it fit to abdicate our judgment and invoke chance in settling the gravest duty which can be devolved on Congress f I should consider the precedent a most unhappy one indeed, injurious to that great tribunal the Supreme Court and unsatisfactory to the people.

3. Is the jurisdiction of this commission defined with apt and sufficient clearness and certainty?

It is too plain to require discussion that one of the most important rinciples involved in the creation of any tribunal clothed with judicial powers is to define its jurisdiction with clearness and certainty. In a government proceeding according to settled principles of fundamental law, it is too clear for argument that nothing can be more perilous or fatal to constitutional liberty than creating a tribunal whose jurisdiction is left solely to its own discretion. Now what is the jurisdiction conferred on this commission? What is to be the scope of its investigations? It is to have all the jurisdiction possessed by Congress, or either branch of it. This is as indefinite and uncertain as human language can make it. Congress cannot agree on its own jurisdiction. We therefore shirk our duty to decide the question. We call in five judges of the Supreme Court, selected as I have shown, to aid our ten Senators and Representatives to decide a question which we are unable to decide. But suppose they fail to ascertain what our jurisdiction is. Suppose they err, as well they may.

This attempt to define the jurisdiction is novel and unheard of. Whatever the commission may think is the jurisdiction of Congress, that is the measure of their jurisdiction. It is limited by no boundaries except the opinion of a bare majority of the commission. Bound by no limits except the opinions, feelings, or caprices of a majority, the jurisdiction of this commission is as absolute and boundless as that of the autocrat of Russia or the Tycoon of Japan. I cannot believe it wise to create a new master, vested with autocratic power to settle disputes whose solution has been wisely placed elsewhere.

4. Are the modes of its procedure sufficiently defined?

Here we find more vagueness and uncertainty, if possible, than on the subject of jurisdiction. The bill seems to me like a carefully de-vised scheme to so fix the instruments to be used in evidence as to open the whole question of the State vote, to require the commission to go behind the decision of the State canvassing boards, behind the scal of the State, behind every act of State authority, and in effect to overthrow the authority and independence of the States.

The bill provides that the commission "may take into view such

The bill provides that the commission "may take into view such petitions, depositions and other papers, if any, as shall by the Constitution and existing laws be competent and pertinent" in deciding what persons were duly appointed, that is elected, as electors. The word "may" take into view such petitions, &c., in such a statute must be construed as imperative. The question that is to be decided by this bill is what persons were duly elected as electors. The Constitution and existing laws referred to are the Federal Constitution and laws. The commission is not bound to pay any regard to State constitutions and laws. It can do with them as it players so far as any witutions and laws. It can do with them as it pleases so far as any express limitation upon this power is concerned. The commission may use petitions, depositions, and papers as instruments of evidence. Why allow petitions and papers other than sworn testimony to be used unless it is proposed to try the title to the office of an elector, not by the law and decisions of the State, but by affidavits, petitions, papers, depositions, in short anything and everything human ingenuity can suggest? Where can the power be found to anthorize any human tribunal to settle the title to the great office of President by depositions? How can this great question be settled by competition in multiplying and heaping up petitions and depositions. No, no; the election is to be determined by counting the votes of the electors appointed by the States, and not by the weight and number of affidavits and depositions which may be taken by the rival parties. Such inquiry is unwarranted by the Constitution, degrading in its character and, I fear, fatal in its endencies. When we come to that time when faith is so far lost in the rectitude of the decision of State tribunals that we may overhaul them by considering conflicting affidavits, we shall have seen the end of constitutional government on this contiwitutions and laws. It can do with them as it pleases so far as any nent. This bill seems to me to vest this fatal power in the hands of this commission.

If this measure shall be defeated, I cannot believe that Congress is so madly partisan, so reckless of constitutional obligation, that we cannot provide for a lawful and constitutional count of the votes. And should we fail in doing our duty in this regard, then there yet remains the President of the Senate, who may, in the absence of legislation, count the votes and declare the result. I believe in any event the count will be honestly and lawfully made, and the duly elected President and Vice-President will be peacefully inaugurated. elected President and Vice-President will be peacefully inaugurated. I doubt not that in this, as in all former times, men will be found whose patriotism is so exalted that a happy issue will come to our troubles. And may a beneficent Providence grant that now, and in all the coming ages, men may be found in public and private life penetrated by sentiments of patriotism so profound, of statesmanship so enlarged, and wisdom so exalted that the life-time of the Republic may be contained in the control of the public may be contained to the control of the republic may be contained to the control of the republic may be contained to the republic may be contained to the control of the republic may be contained to the republ

Mr. WATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with attention to whatever has been said on either side of the House touching this most important question. I have done so not merely on account of the distinguished character and talents of the gentlemen who have preceded me, but because, entertaining a distinct opinion of my own, I have been curious, not to say anxious, to discover how far that might be altered or curious, not to say anxious, to discover how far that might be altered or modified by the reasoning of those who have made the consideration of problems in constitutional law the business of their lives, and who are therefore able to bring to this present inquiry the severe training and copious information of professional experience. Being a layman purely, and having no fuller or larger knowledge of such concerns than should be possessed by every citizen who loves his country, and who, valuing its free institutes, has sought to compass the spirit and forms under which they exist, I shall make no pretense of adding to the law of the case. I would not trespass upon the time and courtesy of the House at all, but that, intertwisted with the legal points submitted to us, are a multitude of practical, every-day suggestions bearing upon our whole political economy and affecting this immediate issue beyond the scope and power of technique. For behind this conflict of jurisdictions are arrayed the forces of half a century of sectional agitation. The conflict itself is based upon the disputed votes of one northern and three southern States. These latter bring before us the results of a vast scheme of reconstruction, while upon the final us the results of a vast scheme of reconstruction, while upon the final issue another reconstruction may depend. Not merely the rights, powers, prerogatives, and duties of the two Houses are involved therefore, but the existence of political society in certain parts of the country and a just understanding between the people in every part of it, all referable more or less to the action of the proposed commission, as bound up in the administrative policy to flow from the selection of the one or other contestant for the office of Chief Magistrate.

A PERILOUS OUTLOOK.

That the situation is something more than critical; that, with reference to the present, it may involve a perilous exigency, while with reference to the future it does involve a vital principle in republican government, will hardly be denied by any thoughtful person. It must also be admitted to be an extraordinary circumstance that an organic question of such magnitude and moment as that embraced by a series of disputed matters of fact and law in the count of the electoral vote, and behind that of the popular vote for President and Vice-President, should be the occasion of so little tumult. In the dead of a winter of unusual rigor, thousands of people begging in the streets of the great cities for bread, thousands of people everywhere out of employment, the business of the country prostrate, what do we see? The rich man hugs his millions in security, while the people, clasping their free fabric to their bosom, conscious alike of the danger which menaces it and of the hardships which press upon of the danger which menaces it and of the natusings which press upon themselves, pursue the even tenor of their way in a manner conserv-ative enough to satisfy the most infatuated believer in Napoleonic ideas. I shall take leave in the remarks which I have to offer to go outside the record of tittle-tattle which has constituted so large a outside the record of little-tattle which has constituted so large a portion of our discussions—nay, outside the record of the written law, which is not always a certain panacea—and ask your consideration of some odds and ends, partly of belief and partly of observation, picked up in the course of considerable migration between the blue bird and the brown, between war and peace, the North and the South, during the stress of weather encountered by our peculiar system the last two decades. Conceiving that these may not fall in precisely with the conventional routine of debate, I venture to hope that they may give on this floor some partial expression of that whimsical love of country and kind which warms the Anglo-Saxon heart in the United States to deeds of gentleness and violence, verifying the lines of our republican poet-laureate:

The bravest are the tenderest, The loving are the daring.

THE HOMOGENEITY OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

Sir, the American people are a brave and loving people. The two sections of our Union, never quite married, originally held together by strong ties of natural affection only, got on well enough until the stronger, as is wont to be the case, pressed for a closer relationship, and with more power became more exacting. The weaker resisted, incantiously of course. She resented, passionately of course. The open rupture came, whose end was a matter of course, for the weaker always goes to the wall. And now we behold in our public affairs, what we often see in private life, that, because submission and affection have not proved to be convertible terms, unwise and dogmatic power would smirch the character, as well as blight the future, of the victim. Mr. Speaker, as we say to our little ones "easy is so much better than hard." To-day it is the South which represents the woman in the quarrel. To-morrow it may be the East. Why is it that where the woman cannot be debauched she must be destroyed?

But we are told that "nobody wants to destroy the South." tainly not; because, apart from considerations of a sentimental sort, the prosperity of the whole country depends upon the well-being of each of its sections. Baleful as I think the republican policy has been and harshly as I sometimes feel toward the authors of that policy, I shall not allow myself to believe the republican mas policy, I shall not allow myself to believe the republican masses so deliberately malignant as the results of eleven years of maladministration would make them, could they have foreseen its consequences. I take it that they have been honestly mistaken as to the true nature of the case, and shall try to show before I sit down some of the causes which have misled them. Whatever its origin, all of us should desire to have done with disturbing criminations and recriminations, which can bring profit only to such as trade upon the ignorance and passions

It used to be urged that the soldiers of the two contending armies in our sectional war would be able to make a speedy and lasting peace if they were given the opportunity. The same may be said of the whole people. If the people of the South could traverse the pleasant highways and byways of New England, if they could behold the adnighways and byways of New England, if they could behold the admirable public and domestic economy that prevails there, if they could have personal knowledge of the still more admirable hospitality and geniality which warm the true New England heart, they would recognize in the mingled obstinacy, narrowness, and goodwill of the New Englander much of their own exuberant spirit of provincial defiance. On the other hand, I maintain it to be true that wherever the New Englander has gone South with a fair purpose he has encountered an honest welcome and has found a race of men and women kindred to his own. There is no sectional line, no air-line or water-line in this country, east or west or north or south, which marks off distinct and separate species. There are local peculiarities everywhere. The habits, customs, and manners of the people in Maine and Mississippi differ certainly, but not more than those of the people in Arkansas and South Carolina. Take two communities lying along-side, like Kentucky and Tennessee, and we find each pursuing its bent, having ways of its own not shared by the other. There is no natural having ways of its own not shared by the other. There is no natural antagonism between any of those States. But it is easy enough to raise up artificial antagonism. "How great a flame a little fire kindleth," hate begetting hate as love begets love. The process is as old as the world, familiar to all mankind. In this place and at this time I wish to deal with it only as it concerns ourselves.

My reading of American history may not be very close or deep or accurate, but if it tells me one thing more than another it is that the American people are a homogeneous people, and that if they can once more establish themselves upon the home-rule principle of the Constitution, which leaves each section and State to settle its domestic affairs in its own way, we shall see the dawn of an era of solid progress and power hitherto undreamed of by the most ardent. To the ress and power interto undreamed or by the most arent. To the policy of interference, the spirit of intermeddling, we can trace all our ills, for we may be sure that so long as the politicians in one section are able to make capital off the conditions prevailing in another section there will be misrepresentation, the party holding the General Government holding the whip-hand of prejudice and passion. To-day we have merely a reversal of the forces which filled the land with darkness twenty years ago. The lines may be deeper, the portents more ominous; but the spectacle of intolerance is just the same.

THE BLACK PROBLEM.

No fair-minded man can say, and no honest historian will record, that our great sectional conflict was one-sided; all the right here and all the wrong there. The North found out very early in the race that slave labor was not profitable. So, consulting a prudent sagacity, it sold its slaves, never failing to put the money it got for them in its pocket. That was a long time before the morality of slavery entered into our politics. Nay, for a quarter of a century thereafter the slavery question was remanded to the custody of a handful of enthusiasts who were hardly more odious in the one section than in the other. At length the politicians, seeing in it the materials for agitation, seized it, and for another quarter of a century, and on both sides, much perverted it. The calm reviewer of the future, be his predilecmuch perverted it. The calm reviewer of the future, be his predilections what they may, will peruse those old debates with mingled curiosity and contempt; passionate declamation everywhere, each party for itself, the unhappy cause of disturbance being slowly but surely ground between the upper and nether mill-stone. Sir, that is the spectacle in this country to-day, particularly as to the black man. During all these years he has been the one patient, unoffending sufferer. When he was a slave his lot was made harder by the war which was levied in his behalf. Now that he is a freeman, a new contention has arisen which makes it harder still. His real interest has been and is the very last thing considered. And yet, seeing that his existence has proved almost as tormenting to the white man as to himself, one would be led to ask why he is such a favorite with partisans of every description, if all of us did not know that it was at the first and is now and will always be as long as the race question is continued in our politics—to use the homely but expressive phrase of Hosea Bigelow—

To git some on 'em offis an' some on 'em votes.

The black man is a freeman, a citizen, and a voter. If these pos.

The black man is a freeman, a citizen, and a voter. If these possessions do not protect him, no more can troops of laws or troops of soldiers. But they are ample to protect him, and they do protect him, wherever they are left to their natural operation.

Take, for illustration, the States of Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri, which did not pass through the ordeal of reconstruction, and compare the condition of the negro therein with his condition in Louisiana and South Carolina. I can speak with some assurance for Kentucky, and I ought to be held to be a competent witness, for I have given proofs of being a steady friend to the black man. At the close of the warit was my belief that, since there was no way to supply ourselves war it was my belief that, since there was no way to supply ourselves with another labor system, our interest, as well as our duty, was to improve such as we had; to make the best of a bad bargain; to take the negro in his rags, ignorance, and squalor, and try to make a man of him; to protect him, educate him, elevate him. A movement in this direction was bound to meet resistance and obstruction. But, step by step, within the good old Commonwealth of Kentucky, and within the democratic party which controlled Kentucky, the fight was made. There were no trumped-up legislatures imported from alien made. There were no trumped-up legislatures imported from alien regions for hostile purposes, seeking to do by force that which was destined to be done by simple, popular arts. There were no belicose proclamations from bogus governors, saddled upon the people by martial appliance, intended to incite violence in order that arbitrary power might secure its pretext for renewed exaction. The Federal authority happened to be exercised with moderation through officials, who, whatever opinions they may have had, were responsible men. Kentuckians to the manner born. There were conflicts of jurisdiction, undoubtedly, and wherever these appeared they retarded the forward march of events. But they were not sharp enough to stop it. Thus, by easy stages, and by the consent of society, the negro presently found himself vested with such legal rights as the States have exclusive power to give; he was established in the rights which the excusive power to give; he was established in the rights which the General Government had given him; he was made secure in his home, and he is to-day surpassed by no laboring-man in any part of the world in the advantage which he enjoys for getting on in life. He is sought by all parties—a very popular person indeed with candidates for office. In the city where I live, his churches and schools are numerous, well ordered, and well attended. He has no conflicts with the whites. In a word, he is a freeman, a citizen, and a voter.

That is the solution, as it is the history, of the black problem submitted to natural laws. If the negro cannot be protected by the domestic system under which he lives, far less is he likely to be protected by misapplied and misused Federal agencies. The conservative forces of society, however, when left to their particular accountability, will always assert themselves. They have an interest at stake beyond all other interests. It is when society has been overawed and silenced, when irresponsible men have been put above it, as in Louisiana and South Carolina, that we see physical disturbance and com-

CONCERNING THE PECULIAR CIVILIZATION OF THE SOUTH.

The plea that there is an exceptional civilization and humanity in the South ineradically opposed to the negro is false. There is no more hostility toward the negro in the South than in the North; if I spoke my full mind I should say that there is less. Precisely the same system of civilization and humanity exists in the one section that exists in the other. Its manifestations differ merely as I have said. The vicious elements in an old-established body-politic are less violent than in a newly-settled community. The educated rascal in New En-gland who forges paper and raises checks finds his counterpart in the Southern swashbuckler who wears a ruffled shirt and is handy with his revolver. Each, taking his one from the conditions around about his revolver. Each, taking his one from the conditions around about him, engages in that department of crime which he thinks safest. Thus the one or other becomes the fashion among rogues. An ancient, thickly populated region finds it necessary to hold life by its surest fastenings. Its laws against murder are, therefore, rigidly enforced. Bad men turn their attention to less dangerous pursuits and murder is left to ruffians, who are too ignorant or too hardened to have the fear of the gallows constantly before their eyes. Life hangs more loosely in new communities and murder is at once cheaper and easier. But crime is crime the world over—acts perpetrated by bad men—and it is as fair to judge New England by her Winslows and Pomeroys as to judge the South by such examples as are paraded in support of the argument touching her peculiar civilization. No society. roys as to judge the South by such examples as are paraded in support of the argument touching her peculiar civilization. No society, however, should be judged by its baser elements; for they do not rule. The better elements of society govern in the South as in the North, whenever society is put upon its responsibility. Suppose, to take a ready example, that after Tweed and his followers had got possession of the city of New York they had been supported in their predatory work by the Government of the United States. Suppose the great body of the people of New York had been disfranchised. Suppose every peaceful effort at relief had been met by troops sent by orders from Washington at Tweed's call. Suppose for years the majority on this floor had extolled the Tweed system and the Tweed operators, and had described the mass and body of society in New York as rebels and traitors, having two rights only, the right to be hanged and the right to be damned, what would the result have been † I ask any candid man whether he thinks it would differ materially from the existing state of affairs in Louisiana and South Carolina, even as that is depicted by the unfriendliest hand? It would be the same, believe me, for New York and New Orleans, Boston and Charleston, are made up of the same race, moved by the same interests, stirred by the same passions. Those who seek to create a different impression have either learned nothing by their experience or are consciously and purposely malignant. National gatherings are constantly illustrating the absurdity of such partisan outgivings. Church assemblies, trade meetings, educational and scientific and political conventions, made up of delegates from all the States, come together year after year, and there is no sign whatever of a diversified humanity and civilization. On the contrary, there is fellowship, thorough and complete. But when it suits a body of partisans to do a job of work of which they have reason to be ashamed, then we hear the sectional tocsin sounded, appealing to passions of the baser sort. Sir, the American people have listened to that unreasoning clangor for five and twenty years, and they are tired of it. They want a rest on it. The men of my generation were in no wise responsible for our sectional war. They can be fairly were in no wise responsible for our sectional war. They can be fairly said to have no political antecedents. They are competent to utter the things they will about that war as well as about passing events, and they ought to do so freely and fully, nay, the better souls and better nature of the country wish them to do so. Such controversies as we have should be settled in our day and by ourselves. They should not be committed to our children, to rankle in their hearts, planting all over the land the seeds of future disturbance.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

Less than this as to the circumstances which have produced the present complications and their underlying cause I could not say. It may not be true that we stand upon the brink of civil war; but it is true that grave dangers stare us in the face, threatening every public and private interest. I wish to inveigh against no party, to abuse nobody, but that a well-organized conspiracy exists to put a President in the White House who in my judgment was not elected by the people, I do not doubt. Nor is this the worst of it, for it has long seemed inevitable, embodying a peril which the wisest have feared might be inherent to our system. The demogratic party of a feared might be inherent to our system. The democratic party of a by-gone era was strong enough to make its exit from power the signal for a sectional war. The republican party of this present day, equally strong and arrogant, regards itself as holding the Government in feestrong and arrogant, regards itself as holding the Government in fee-simple, and, using the sectional question as the democratic party formerly used the slavery question, it is able, through its leaders, to precipitate the country into civil war. The transfer of power by peaceful process from one great party to another is an unsolved prob-lem in the practical operation of domestic government. Therefore, I have looked to the present crisis for years with misgiving, conceiv-ing that sooner or later it would surely come. Nor have its dramatis personæ, its implements and resources, surprised me. They are large and potent. It is even claimed that they are sufficiently equipped to be more than a match for the unorganized messes of the records to be more than a match for the unorganized masses of the people. We may as well talk plainly of things as they are. The republican party, intrenched in its position, is compact and united. If it is magnificent in nothing else, it is magnificent in its organization and handards. The democratic party is as one who has his right arm tied behind him. If forced into civil war, it would proceed under the greatest possible disadvantage. I speak thus not merely because I wish to be clear in my line of argument, concealing nothing, but bewish to be clear in my line or argument, concealing nothing, but because there are evils to be more dreaded than civil war. Rather than see a cabal of party managers using the power placed in their possession as a supreme party to seat a usurper in the Chief Magistracy, the people would, after having exhausted peaceful agencies to prevent it, be justified in a resort to stronger measures. In this connection I may say that, dreading the arrival of this exigency, I have from the first urged upon my political associates proper agitation as to the danger, so that the public opinion of the time might be fully advised, and, being advised, might organize itself to avert it. fault is not with me that this was neglected until the bare suggestion came to be dismissed with alternate derision and odium, by some as a came to be dismissed with alternate derision and odium, by some as a piece of empty bravado, by others as downright sedition. I do admit that the time has gone by when the people at large could act effectively for themselves. If the two Houses of Congress fail to agree, then indeed we shall have come upon an emergency. We shall see the Senate, throwing the blame upon the House, proceed to the counting in of Hayes and Wheeler; we shall see the President of the United States supported by the Army and Navy prepare to seet them. United States, supported by the Army and Navy, prepare to seat them in office; we shall see the Chief-Justice ready to administer to them the oaths of office. The House, acting under its construction of its rights, privileges, and duties, proceeds to elect a President. Then follows either civil war or a case in law, but no matter which, continuous suspense, commotion, and discontent. Let us assume, what I believe, that there will be no war. Let us assume that the Senate, acting for itself, declares Hayes and Wheeler elected, and that upon this the country settles down into sullen acquiescence. What have we then? There are those who tell us that four years hence we shall obtain the desired change of parties in the Government, brought about by such overwhelming majorities as will leave no room for conspiracy or doubt. I think not so. On the contrary, we shall have four years of planning and disturbance, with another and a better substantial bloody-shirt campaign at the end of them; a North more prejudiced than now; a South thoroughly demoralized; no such organization, no such issues, no such opportunities as the opposition had in the last cam-

CONTENGENT PROBABILITIES.

Usurpation goes backward as little as revolution. The inaugura-Usurpation goes backward as little as revolution. The inauguration of Hayes by a process such as the extreme members of the Republican Senate will be reduced to, if the two Houses fail to agree upon a joint plan, would be regarded as a usurpation by considerably more than one-half of the people. In the South it would be universally held as a step forward in revolution. By its authors it would be taken as evidence of their ability to go ahead without fear of the consequences. Another reconstruction, justified by the condition of affairs in Louisiana and South Carolina, will loom into view. This will include Mississipni. Florida, and perhaps Alabama: and, to comwill include Mississippi, Florida, and perhaps Alabama; and, to commend itself to any approval, it must be "thorough," for the country will submit to no more half measures. Thus, already ruined in their material concerns, the southern people will be quite bereft of hope. They will have no political future, and we shall see society divided into three classes: into three classes:

First, the despairing, who will say "There is no use of voting any more, because we elected a President whom the country would not inaugurate."

Second, the time-servers, who will make terms with the republicans, and, like self-seekers in general, will become useful only for mis-

Third, the constitutional opposition, weakened in every way, and of no particular value to its fellow-class in the North.

These, Mr. Speaker, I regard as the almost certain consequences of seating a President in office by a process and on a title which a large majority of the people cannot approve, but which they will believe to be fraudulent. The ultimate end of such an invasion of the spirit of our Government must be the overthrow of the Government itself, civil war, and all the evils which such experiences entail. We, no more than other people, can claim or expect immunity from the ills which, from the beginning of time, have beset the nations of the earth. To prevent therefore a catastrophe so dire, no less than to escape the perils immediately before us, every nerve of brain and heart should be strained. I take issue with those who think that any good can flow from usurpation. Whoever succeeds to the Chief Magistracy, I want to see him seated in office on an undisputed title. This brings me to the bill under consideration.

THE PROPOSED COMPROMISE.

I have said, sir, that I shall not undertake to add to the law of the case. It seems to me that an eminent jurist in the other House, the distinguished Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS, ] has made it perfeetly clear that the bill is constitutional. I accept and adopt his view without reservation. It not only settles all constitutional doubts in my mind, but it smoothes an original objection which I had entertained to the scheme as a mere compromise. Since Congress has power to legislate in this wise the bill is not a compromise, although it accomplishes that for which compromise is usually invoked. That the proposed commission is established in accordance with law and that it is to be equitably organized, have been the only questions on which I have allowed my mind to rest. Because, considering the present state of affairs, not as I would have it, but as it is, I believe that if some arrangement be not reached between this and the middle that if some arrangement be not reached between this and the middle of February, we shall find ourselves drifting in an open boat upon a shoreless sea, compassless and rudderless, nobody to lead us whom we can trust and no concert of action among ourselves, but, in room of these essentials to useful endeavor, a desperate partisan conspiracy in front of us, armed cap-a-pie and prepared for emergencies. The sole hope of that conspiracy is the non-agreement of the two Houses of Congress. The sole hope left the people—a choice of evils, I grant—is the proposed commission. That it is to be fairly constituted, and that as made up it will compose a tribunal which men can respect, I believe, and so believing I am willing to rest the case with it. I am believe, and so believing I am willing to rest the case with it. I am the readier to do this since I regard Tilden's case as a good one; but I shall vote for the bill with the full consciousness that the action of the commission may bitterly disappoint me and those who feel and think with me. If it does, I shall still have discharged a most unpleas-ing duty in that manner which was best calculated to preserve constitutional forms and keep the peace of the country at a time when the Republic was menaced and the people were not prepared for war. Mr. Speaker, sixteen years ago the people of this country were brought face to face with an undetermined point in constitutional law touching the right of a State to second from the Union. Thousands of intelligent and honest men believed that right to exist. There was no tribunal, however, to which they could refer it. War, the result of which no one could foresee, whose consequences will outlast this and the next generation, ensued. It is idle at this late day to speculate upon what might have been if the States had possed some constitutional means of arbitration. But it is quite cersessed some constitutional means of arbitration. But it is quite certain that had they known what we know, they would have gone greater lengths to keep the peace. We now confront a dauger just as real and just as great. No less than the rulership of the country is involved. The Houses of Congress are controlled by opposing political bodies. There is confusion in the returns of the electoral vote. The terms of the Constitution lack explicitness and furnish the minds of many a reasonable doubt as to what, speaking precisely, is lawful to be done. Setting aside the passions and interests of partisans, the non-partisan classes, embracing at least one-half the total vote polled in the election, share this doubt to such an extent that they have held aloof thus far from public demonstration. They are at length making their wishes known with emphasis. They understand the danger and see in the proposed commission the means of averting it. making their wishes known with emphasis. They understand the danger and see in the proposed commission the means of averting it. For my part, if my objections were even greater than they are, I should give it to them. Let it place whom it may in the presidential office, it will, without dishonor, bring us that repose which, of all things, the country stands most in need. In other words, it is this, or the Senate, or civil war. I may not, and I do not, like it as an original proposition. I may, and I do, feel a sense of indignation that such a contingency has been forced by the operations of what I believe to be conspiracy. But, reduced to a choice of evils, I take this tribunal, entertaining no doubt that it will be composed of competent and patriotic men, by whose judgment I shall abide, something more than party being at stake. The happiness and peace of forty millions of people will press upon the commission raised by this act; its members will cease to be partisans; they will sit for the whole country; and, as they discharge their full duty, they will be honored in the land. It seems to me that, if arbitration is our only recourse, as I believe it is, that proposed is both legal and just. Upon it, therefore, good men everywhere will rest the issue, trusting that the God from whom we received our fair, free system, building wiser than we knew, will bring it safely through this present danger.

Mr. HURLBUT. It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, nor will the time allotted to me in this debate permit me, to enter at any length into the constitutional questions which have been so elaborately and fully argued by better and wiser constitutional lawyers I have no doubt than myself fully argued by better and wiser constitutional lawyers I have no

But the high contracting parties who have taken the responsibility of President-making after the event by this bill have presented it to this House, and what we have to pass upon now is the question of the merits or demerits of this bill.

It is perfectly well-known that no amendment will be entertained or permitted. It is perfectly well-known that the bill must be taken bodily as it stands. It is perfectly well known to every member here that every form of influence, in the weight of the body at the other end of the Capitol, in the reputation of the gentlemen who represent this bill have in the three required by the representation of the gentlemen who represent the best consistent of the gentlemen who represent this bill have in the three required by the result of the consistency of the gentlemen who representation of the gentlemen w this bill here, in the threats occasionally thrown out by injudicious men of possible civil war and of possible complications—all these pressures are brought to bear upon this House of Representatives to induce individual members to forego their own conclusion upon what the Constitution requires of them.

For one, I cannot yield my opinion upon a constitutional question nor my sense of duty to any question of expediency, or even of the weight of authority. I must stand in the discharge of my duty upon my own responsibility to my constituents. And, in the few minutes that remain to me, I desire to present to this House the objections that we realized to my minute against this present.

that remain to me, I desire to present to this House the objections that are palpable to my mind against this present bill.

I affirm that undoubtedly the power to count the electoral vote, in the broadest sense of the word, rests either in the President of the Senate, in one of the two Houses of Congress, or in both Houses. Now, these are the only three possible issues under the Constitution. And in every one of these cases that power, wherever vested, is a trust, a public trust, coupled with an official position, which cannot be delegated any more than the trust of a judge can be delegated.

Again, each House by parliamentary law and by the necessity of the case must be the sole judge of its own powers, privileges, and duties. Yet this bill divests both Houses, and passes upon the powers ties. Yet this bill divests both Houses, and passes upon the powers and duties of the House of Representatives and of the Senate in this question, and transfers them to another tribunal; and the decision of that tribunal, although it may overthrow the whole constitutional power of this House, can only be overruled by the joint action of both Houses of Congress

Again, the bill limits the jurisdiction of this commission only to the cases of double returns. But we know that there are other questions that will necessarily come up in cases where single returns are made. I will give you the case of Colorado. This House has not yet determined that Colorado is a State in the Union. The question whether Colorado is or is not a State is a question of a political nature, essentially to be determined upon the reception of that vote; and that question is remitted to precisely the same state of confusion which this bill proposes to remedy.

Again, I am opposed to the mode of constituting this tribunal. I do not care by what words it may be sought to be masked. It is perfectly well known to every member here, and to the country, that, so far as the judges of the Supreme Court are concerned, this commission is based simply upon partisan grounds. This committee has directed that the four judges of this commission selected by the House shall be so selected on their partisan standing. I use the word "partisan" not in an improper but in a proper sense; for I hold that every man of thorough conviction and honest judgment must be of necessity a partisan. This bill delegates that question to these four judges, and the final arbiter of the whole matter is to be selected by them. In other words, we have gravely inaugurated here the great national "game of draw." [Laughter.]

of draw." [Laughter.]
Again, I oppose the loose and uncertain jurisdiction that is given to this commission. What kind of a law is it which says that the commission is to have the same powers, "if any," now possessed by the two Houses, acting separately or together? There is neither an affirmance nor a denial of power. There is no admission that either House has power or that both have, but it is a grant to this commission of whatever power there may be in either of the Houses, and the extent of that power is to be determined by the commission it-self and not by the two Houses.

It is simply a quit-claim deed to this commission of any possible power that there might be in either House of Congress or in both together. So that the jurisdiction is unlimited, and depends not upon the law, not upon the will of Congress, but upon the construction that this tribunal itself may put upon the powers which they may decide to have been granted to it. In the end that tribunal almost necessity will be controlled, guided, directed, and handled by that fifth judge to be selected in some form or other. You create in this way a one-man power that is, to say the least of it, infinitely more dangerous than the power claimed as residing in the President of the

Again I oppose this bill because of the solemn emptiness of the sixth section. It proposes to save the right of any party to litigate in the Supreme Court the title to the presidential office; and yet it takes a majority of that court in advance and makes them commit themselves by their own finding. So that any subsequent resort must be to a court that has already rendered judgment in the matter. Again, sir, and finally, I oppose this bill because it drags into this vexed question of heated politics a body which has hitherto been rein its sphere from all that class of associations; because it seeks to bolster up the confessed incapacity or unworthiness of Congress by the credit of the Supreme Court; and the effect is not, I am sorry to say, to raise the standard of congresssonal capacity or consorry to say, to raise the standard of congressional capacity of congressional morality, but to drag the other down to the level that ill-judging men charge belongs to this political body.

Is it not cowardly to escape or seek to escape from our own just and constitutional responsibility, and to smirch the judicial ermine in the popular estimation ?

For one I will not take shelter behind the gown of the Supreme Court, but insist on the performance according to my judgment and conscience of the plain duty before me as a Representative of the

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, when this Congress assembled on the first Monday of December last, I confess, my mind was filled with apprehension for the future of the country. We had passed through one of the most bitter of partisan contests known to our history. The party fires were still at white heat. The people were almost equally divided as to the result of that heated partisan contest. The spirit of party reached to the highest functionaries of the Government, beginning even with the President, and extending, I was sorry to see, to the first intellects in this and in the other branch of Congress.

To solve these difficulties we heard the most startling and alarming propositions of constitutional interpretation known to the statesmanship of this country. It was said, among other things, that the power to count the electoral vote and determine all questions arising power to count the electoral vote and determine all questions arising upon the validity of that vote was vested by the Constitution of the country in the President of the Senate. A more untenable proposition was never announced in any country. Early in the session, with much care and reflection, I prepared an argument on that question. Owing, however, to the rules and proceedings of the House I did not have the opportunity of delivering it. I shall not do so row, because I could not do so in the ten minutes allowed me, and because, further and chiefly, it is wholly unnecessary to do so. The apprehensions and chiefly, it is wholly unnecessary to do so. The apprehensions which filled my mind at the beginning of this Congress, I am happy to say, have been dispelled; and they have been dispelled by the bill now pending and the conviction I entertain that this bill will become a law by an overwhelming majority of both Houses of Congress. This bill and its certain adoption inspires me with renewed confidence in the wisdom and patriotism of this Congress, in the capacity of the people for self-government, and in the perpetuity of our Union under our great constitutional system.

I support this bill, Mr. Speaker, first because in my humble judgment it is constitutional in character—wholly so. I support it, secondly, because in my humble judgment it is wise in its every provision—remarkably so. I support it, thirdly, because in my humble judgment it is patriotic in every purpose, and eminently so.

The bill, sir, will pass. I am therefore relieved of the necessity of arguing its merits, even if I had the time. I know apprehensions have been expressed on this floor that the high commission which will be organized under this bill will be in some degree influenced by partisan considerations. I wish to say here, in the pride of an Amer-ican citizen, that I do not believe it.

Sir, if the people of this country cannot intrust to such a tribunal Sir, if the people of this country cannot intrust to such a tribunal the adjudication of their rights arising upon a mere question of fact to be ascertained upon simple principles of law, pray tell me to what jurisdiction they could intrust the adjudication of their rights? I predict now that the decisions of that high commission, on every important question submitted to it, will be unanimous; and those decisions will be respected by the two Houses of Congress; they will give peace to the country and satisfaction to the people.

I have availed myself of the courtesy of the House to occupy ten minutes of time simply to express not my constrained support of this bill but my hearty and warm approval of it. And I trust I shall be pardoned if on this occasion I allude to the section of the country from which I come.

Mr. Speaker, I was born, raised, and educated in the South. Whatever I am, is the product of southern institutions. I have been the witness of the sorrows of that people and the willing sharer of all their sufferings. May I therefore be pardoned on this occasion for calling the attention of this House and the country to the spirit which has been manifested by that derided people during this entire controversy. On another occasion I defended their manhood, their civilization, their humanity from what I knew to be unjust charges, and while I have breath I shall continue to defend them. If the argument then was insufficient to demonstrate the truth of the proposition that the people of the South are patriotic and manly, let the answer be found in the spirit they have manifested during the last sixty days. Sir, there is scarcely a man in that country who does not be-lieve that the democratic ticket was elected, and who does not believe that the democratic ticket was elected, and who does not believe that all our people have remaining of property, of right, and of constitutional justice depends upon the inauguration of the candidates on that ticket. Yet, sir, during this whole controversy—I say it with pride and pleasure—the South has manifested but one spirit; and that has been the spirit of forbearance, of kindness, and of fairness. Neck-deep in the ashes of her property, her ambition, and her power, with the chains of the usurper still upon her limbs, with the greed of the strangers still rifling her already exhausted coffers, with the Army of the United States now scattered throughout her borders and standing sentinel for the protection of her plunderers, the South utters to those who have been her despoilers, and who now threaten to be the despoilers of each other, but one voice, that voice is "Peace! peace! Civil war redresses no wrong, preserves no right; if you to be the despoilers of each other, but one voice, that voice is "Peace! peace! Civil war redresses no wrong, preserves no right; if you doubt, look here and be convinced."

Sir, will I go too far, am I asking too much if I venture to utter the wish that hereafter we shall never again be derided with those charges of rebel and traitor solely for offering up our lives in vindication of what we honestly believed to be our rights? In the future let me express the hope that he alone will be regarded as the chief rebel, who, after the passage of this measure of peace, shall first again whisper the word of sectional hate. Let him be regarded as the chief traitor who shall again seek to breed the horrors of sectional strife. For myself I feel a pride in being able to say I can look upon every foot of soil upon the American continent and thank God it is part of my country. I can look upon every person on this continent and say foot of soil upon the American continent and thank God it is part of my country. I can look upon every person on this continent and say "this is my fellow-citizen;" and I can raise my vision to the uttermost boundaries of the Republic and say "My country, my whole country; blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee." [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, thirteen of the fourteen members of the conference committee, composed of seven Senators among the ablest and most experienced of that body and of seven among the ablest members of this House representing equally both political parties, have and most experienced of that body and of seven among the ablest members of this House, representing equally both political parties, have agreed in reporting and recommending the passage of the bill now before us as both constitutional and necessary. The whole country recognizes the importance of the measure, as is evidenced by the interest everywhere manifested. Conceding it to be constitutional, the bill is to be considered, as any other important matter of legislation, upon grounds of necessity or expediency.

While I condemn as outrages the means and measures and events which have given rise to the necessity for this bill, I give to the bill itself my hearty support, as promising quiet and peace to the country; and I feel that it is a cause for congratulation that we are about to arrive at a conclusion which will calm the waves of popular passion, already excited, and which at any moment, unless this question is adjusted, may be lashed into furious storm. But while supporting this measure, I disclaim any approval of or acquiescence in the measures and events which have made the necessity for it, and I desire now to avail myself of this opportunity to make some comments upon now to avail myself of this opportunity to make some comments upon these measures and events in connection with the subject of the late elections in the South.

I think the facts will warrant the assertion that whatever of fraud, illegality, unfairness, and intimidation existed in that section may be traced directly to the incompetency and utter worthlessness of the governments which have had their existence in some of those States, not by the will and free choice of the people, but by the force and support of Federal power, and that the present disturbed condition of the country, which renders some such measure as that now before the House necessary to give quiet and peace, is the result of an organized and premeditated plan concocted by partisans in this city to secure a continued lease of power to a certain class of politicians. I think I am further warranted by the facts in saying that this plan embraced my own State, and if it had been necessary to count her also, to secure the desired result, the charges and falsehoods necessary to that end were ready made and at hand. As these charges have been frequently made outside this Hall and have found expression on this floor, I shall say a few things in regard to them before I close.

Mr. Speaker, if we would have a republican government and have it perpetuated, we must have fair and honest elections of the officers who are to administer it—officers who shall be, not the masters but I think the facts will warrant the assertion that whatever of fraud, who are to administer it—officers who shall be, not the masters but the servants of the people, watching and guarding their interests, and so making and so executing the laws as to secure quiet and peace to the country, stimulate industry in all departments of labor and trade, thus promoting the happiness, the wealth, and prosperity of all classes of people, strengthening their love and attachment for law and order and producing that kindly feeling toward the Government that induces a ready and cheerful support. We have had a ernment that induces a ready and cheerful support. We have had a presidential election and the question presents itself in a very different aspect now from that of the campaign preceding the election. Then it was a question simply of choice, open and debatable on questions of policy and general interest upon which each elector or voter had a perfect right to the exercise of his own judgment, and party leaders in addressing themselves to popular assemblies had a right to use such arguments and to make such statements (provided they were true) as they might think calculated to influence the judgment or true) as they might think calculated to influence the judgment or choice of the voter.

It is one of the evils incident to popular government that politicians, and even those who call themselves statesmen, often feel at liberty to address themselves to the passions and prejudices of the people, and too often willful misrepresentation and base slanders are resorted to and excused upon the plea that the desirable end justifies the means, that all is far in politics. There is perhaps no practical remedy for this, except to the limited extent that popular intelligence and public virtue may hold it in check; but now, the election having been held the voice of the people having been expressed at the ballet. and public virtue may hold it in check; but now, the election having been held, the voice of the people having been expressed at the ballot-box, it seems to me not only unpatriotic, but destructive of the principles of representative government, to attempt to thwart the will of the people by false statements and misrepresentations. Before the election it is a matter of choice, after the election it is a question of fact, who has been chosen. We have nothing to do but to declare the result of the popular will. We should act as judges divested of all partisan bias, and decide as the facts and the law applicable to the facts may determine but instead of thus acting rating at the same all partisan bias, and decide as the facts and the law applicable to the facts may determine; but, instead of thus acting and thus deciding, a persistent effort has been made to influence the decision by gross misrepresentations and in many cases willfully false statements in regard to the conduct of the southern people, and this because unscrupulous partisans find it easy to re-open old wounds and re-arouse old passions and prejudices begotten of the differences and sectional hates that preceded and unhappily culminated in the late sectional war, and which must be healed if the country is again to be prosperous and happy and united in heart and spirit as well as in name. Sir, may I not say of the people of the South—I will say it with emphaous and happy and united in heart and spirit as well as in name. Sir, may I not say of the people of the South—I will say it with emphasis—that they are actuated by as sincere a devotion to civil liberty and constitutional government as were their fathers, their Washingtons, their Henrys, their Lees, their Davies, their Nashes, their Caswells, their Pinckneys, and the hosts of their heroic comrades who in the field and in counsel labored with the Adamses, with Hancock, Warren, Knox, Hamilton, and Franklin, and their compatriots of the Warren, Knox, Hamilton, and Franklin, and their compatitors of the North and East, in establishing the independence of the colonies and laying the foundation of our Government? These southern people constitute a large body of the citizens of the United States. The States of the South are States in the Union, with all the rights of States, and, though the idea seems to be unpleasant to some gentlemen, "the State of Mississippi has a right to have her vote counted side by side with that of Vermont."

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PHILLIPS] said the other day: The republican party in the moment of victory might have confiscated the large landed estates of those who had aided the rebellion and divided them into small tracts for the liberated bondsmen, first, as an act of stern justice; second, as an act of policy, on the theory that the freedman to maintain his rights must be the owner of the soil on which he places his feet.

What would have been the effect of such a policy? I will not ask what warrant or authority could have been found in the Constitution or laws for such an act, (for these questions have never bothered some or laws for such an act, (for these questions have never bothered some people,) but the effect would have been, not only the emancipation of four millions of hereditary bondsmen, whose fathers were not liberty-loving immigrants, fleeing from despotic governments to this boasted land of freedom, but were mostly barbarians seized in Africa and brought to this continent in British and northern vessels as a part of that commerce which, against the voice of Virginia, New England wished to prolong as a source of profit, and did prolong to 1808, and which constituted the germ of much of her present wealth. It was, perhaps, the misfortune of the South that a slave ever entered her borders, but I say it was the good fortune of the negro, for it is absolutely certain that nowhere else in the world has he attained to such an advanced state of civilization as in the South, and, all the absolutely certain that nowhere else in the world has he attained to such an advanced state of civilization as in the South, and, all the lamentations and horrors of our republican friends to the contrary notwithstanding, I defy them to point to a spot on the globe where any large number of the black races are in so happy a condition as they are in the South. I say the only effect that could result from the course intimated by the gentleman from Kansas would be, while enfranchising these four millions of colored people, to enslave more than eight millions of white people; the descendants of revolutionary fathers, whose blood enriched the soil made free by their courage and their heroism. Such a policy would possibly have preserved a union, but not the Union our fathers established. Such a policy would not have materially benefited the negro, for, in the light of experience, it may be safely assumed that his philanthropic brother of the carpet-bag would soon have kindly and lovingly cheated him out of his lands as would soon have kindly and lovingly cheated him out of his lands as a reward for emancipating him; and though the gentleman from Kansas says:

There are many now in our party (republican) who believed that when a State failed to maintain a government loyal to the Union, and went to war against it, there was of necessity an end to its powers as a State in the Union, * * * and that it should be treated as a Territory, &c.

Yet I apprehend no wise friend of free government would venture ret i apprenent no wise triend of tree government would venture upon such a plan, for it would involve a manifest admission of two things: first, a dissolution of the Union by the destruction of States constituting a part of it; and, second, a denial of the doctrine for which our fathers fought, "that all rightful government is derived from the consent of the governed." An Irish statesman is reported to have said that he was willing to sacrifice a part of the constitution and if necessary the whole of it to preserve the balance. It seems that many of our republican friends would be willing to blot out States of this Union, destroy the Union, not to save it, but to save the party. All the evils which have rendered the measure now before this House necessary have resulted from this idea, that the Southern States, though in the Union, are in it and remain in it by the sufferance of the republican party; that they have no rights which that party is bound to respect, and unless they will make themselves tributary to its power they must be remanded to a territorial condition. Hence returning boards; hence the intervention of troops, and hence partian commit-tees to give countenance and support to these returning boards in their illegal, arbitrary, and unjust acts. I trust there is not a man of honor who has had any hand in any way in sustaining or defending these boards who may not live to be ashamed, if he is not already ashamed, that he ever saw or heard of them; for their infamy is assured, and is already historic. It is a terrible thing to say of a man as General Sheri-dan has said of the chief of them, "He has not a friend who is an hon-
